KIMBERLEY): My Lords, in moving the
VOL. XII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Second Reading of a Bill which relates to the very important Indian question of the organisation of the Armies of two of the Presidencies, I cannot help being painfully reminded of the loss which the House has sustained by the death of Lord Derby, who was the first Secretary of State for India after the government of that country was placed under the immediate control of the Crown. We all, I think, feel that the wide experience of public affairs possessed by my lamented Friend, his extreme insight into every question which he touched, the singular impartiality of his mind, together with his, I may say, almost unequalled power of stating the arguments on both sides of any question with the utmost clearness and fairness—all those qualities made every one of his public utterances peculiarly valuable to the minds of all who heard them. There may be others more eloquent, others who have exercised a greater influence in our political contests; but I think it will be a long time before this country will find an adviser at once so wise, so calm, and so impartial,

B

My Lords, after those few words, which I could not avoid saying on an occasion such as this, I pass to the Bill to which I ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading, and I will, in the first place, give a short history of this question. Some of your Lordships are well acquainted with the various Despatches which for years past have passed backwards and forwards between India and this country on the subject; but many of your Lordships may not have been attracted by the very bulky Blue Books which have been laid on the Table, and therefore I shall state exactly what has occurred. In 1879 a very important Commission was issued to inquire into the whole question of the organisation of the Indian Armies. That Commission was proposed by the Government of India when the late Lord Lytton was Viceroy, and the issue of that Commission was cordially approved by the noble Earl opposite, who was then Secretary of State for India. The succeeding Viceroy, my noble Friend below me, sent home a Despatch in April, 1881, in which he recommended that the proposals of the Commission should be adopted. Those proposals were of a far-reaching character, dealing as they did with the whole question of the organisation of the Armies in India. It fell to my lot about two years afterwards to answer that Despatch. Your Lordships may perhaps remember that two years ago there was some discussion in this House upon that subject, and reference was made to the Despatch which was sent out by me and which did not approve of the proposals of my noble Friend's Government. The reasons were very fully stated in that Despatch, and I do not think it is necessary that I should go into them now at length. The objections we raised were, shortly, that we thought it was desirable to continue what were commonly termed the water-tight compartments of our system—namely, the separate organisation of the Bombay and Madras Armies, under the Bombay and Madras Governments. We doubted also the financial saving which my noble Friend anticipated; but I confess I was also greatly influenced by the fact that, having consulted the best military opinion I could obtain from a number of officers well acquainted with Indian military affairs, I found that their opinions were so nicely balanced that I did not think I could go before Parliament and ask for effect to be given to the proposed legislation for the government of India. I will recur, in a moment, to the position I then took up. But, to complete the history of the matter, I may mention that in 1885 another Despatch on the subject came from the Government of India, repeating its application to the Government at home to deal with this matter; and Lord Randolph Churchill, the then Secretary of State for India, made answer that he did not see his way to legislate on the subject. But the Government of India was not to be deterred, and they returned to the matter again in 1888, when Lord Dufferin was Viceroy. In 1889, also, when Lord Lansdowne was Viceroy, another Despatch was sent home, repeating the application, and from these Despatches, which have been laid upon the Table, I will read one or two extracts. I will not go so far back as the Despatch of my noble Friend the Marquess of Ripon; but, in 1888, Lord Dufferin wrote thus—

“It will be seen that only a small remnant remains of the old Presidential system; nevertheless, as far as it exists, it is harmful. . . . We submit to your Lordship our earnest and deliberate opinion that the time has come when what still remains of the Presidential system should be finally abolished.”

And he ended by saying—

“We desire to re-assert in the strongest way our sense of the importance of maintaining the separate constitution and segregation of the different local Armies” —and showing that it was not their intention to remove the safeguards which existed under the present system. Lord Lansdowne in his Despatch was not less urgent. He had brought the matter before the noble Viscount, who was my immediate predecessor, and the noble Viscount in a Despatch, to which I will presently refer, found himself unable to accept the proposals made to them. The noble Viscount (Lord Cross) found himself unable to accept the proposals made at the time, and he wrote as follows in a Despatch of May 30, 1889 :—

“Though I am unable to give effect to the measures proposed so as to fully meet this evil, I am far from ignoring it, and am desirous of affording a cordial support to your Government in endeavouring to reduce it to a minimum.”

The noble Viscount then suggested various minor changes which might be made, which would remove some of the difficulties which arose from the existence of the Presidential system as it is termed, and many of those changes have since been carried into effect. At that time the noble Viscount recommended, I think, that the Clothing and Commissariat Departments should both be placed under the Central Government, and also, possibly, the Military Works Department. The noble Viscount added, with reference to the measures proposed—

“I believe they go far towards that consolidation of military control which, as distinguished from mere centralisation, I conceive to be necessary for the full and adequate employment of Her Majesty's forces in India.”

On receiving that Despatch, Lord Lansdowne, on July 5, 1889, wrote as follows :—

“We desire once again to place before Her Majesty's Government our conviction that it would be a misfortune of the greatest moment if this amendment of the military administration, which we consider to be essential to the efficiency of the Army of this country, should not be carried out in the breathing time of peace which we fortunately now possess.”

I have referred to those reiterated statements, because they show that the Government of India have held the strongest opinion that the proposals of the Commission of 1879 should in some form or other be adopted. In the 26th paragraph of the Despatch, which has been laid upon the Table, your Lordships will find that the Government of India say—

“We have already indicated that the administrative departments of the Army have been organised in anticipation of the change,” and state that the Military Accounts, Ordnance, Commissariat, Military Works, and Clothing Departments are now organised for the whole of India. They also recommend that the Medical Departments should be amalgamated. Therefore, your Lordships will see that it is but a remnant of the old system which yet exists. I had myself suggested in a Despatch to Lord Ripon that it might be possible, without adopting the whole of the proposals of the Commission, to minimise the evils complained of by amalgamating some of the Departments. That policy has been proceeded with since; and the result is, that now practically all the different Departments are placed under one administration, always, of course, reserving the genera control over the Army possessed by the Madras and Bombay Governments. But the evil has been brought to a minimum, because all the Departments are now under the control of the Central Government. It now only remains, to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission, that we should pass the necessary Bill in order to take from the Governments of Bombay and Madras their separate power and control over the two Armies. The evils of that separate control had been set forth, as I have stated, by Government after Government as well as by the Commission. They may have been exaggerated, but that they exist there can be no doubt, because every order which has to be given has to go through the Governments of Bombay and Madras, and I need scarcely say that that gives rise to a considerable amount of delay and friction. It necessarily greatly impedes the speedy transaction of business, which is perhaps more important in reference to military matters and dealing with an Army than in any other Department of the State. The measure which I have laid on the Table is a very simple one. It proposes to repeal those Acts which give the control of the Armies of Bombay and Madras to the Governments of those Presidencies, and, with the exception of one clause, the whole of the Act consists of that repeal. I know that it has been thought by some that this may result in centralisation of an objectionable kind. I will point out to my noble Friend below the Gangway (the Earl of Northbrook), who has, I know, this question in his mind, that in some instances of administration, such as Courts Martial, there is in the Army Act power given to the Commander-in-Chief to delegate to the officers who have command at Bombay and Madras authority to exercise all the powers that would belong to him after this Bill has passed. There is, therefore, no special reason to take objection on that ground, but I shall be quite ready to meet any further points that may be raised in this respect when the Bill reaches the Committee stage. There remains one other clause to which I ought to refer, and that is the clause which prevents the officers in command of the Bombay and Madras Armies from being any longer members of the Council. The Government of India have varied in their opinion on this matter. Originally, the Commission of 1879 recommended that those officers should not sit in the Council. Subsequently, Lord Dufferin gave expression to the opinion that he saw no reason why they should not sit in the Council, and your Lordships will find the same opinion expressed in the Despatch laid on the Table. I may naturally be asked, therefore, why this clause is to be found in the Bill. My answer is, in the first place, that I find that the whole of my advisers, both civil and military, are strongly of opinion that it is undesirable the Commanders of the Armies of Madras and Bombay should continue to sit in the Council. They consider it would have no beneficial effect, inasmuch as the Governments would cease to have control of the Armies, and they are of opinion that much friction might from time to time be occasioned from the presence of the Commanders of those Armies in the Council. On the whole, I thought the arguments predominated on that side. Your Lordships will see that if this new state of things is to be created there is really no more reason why the Lieutenant Generals commanding the Bombay and Madras Armies should sit in the Bombay and Madras Councils than the Lieutenant Generals commanding the Armies in Bengal or in the North-West Provinces should sit in the Councils in those places. We therefore considered that it was better to put all the Lieutenant Generals on the same footing; and for that reason consulted the Government of India as to whether they felt any strong objection to this change, and the answer I have received by telegraph is that they have none. That being so, I placed this clause in the Bill. Your Lordships will naturally ask why, after having myself, in a very fully-argued Despatch, which was to a large extent prepared by that very distinguished officer Sir Henry Norman, in answer to that of my noble Friend (Lord Ripon), stated strong objections to the proposed change, I now submit it to the House. In the discussion which took place here three years ago I ventured to say that if the noble Viscount were to bring forward a measure similar to the present I should not make any objection, and I think there are several reasons why Her Majesty's Government ought now to yield to the pressure of the Government of India on the subject. I say yield to the pressure, because, in my opinion, the pressure of the Government of India is a very important element in the matter. They are the Government on the spot, and are immediately responsible; and when your Lordships find that all the successive Viceroys during the last 10 years have pressed the Imperial Government in the strongest manner that this measure should be adopted, it seems to me that now the greatest responsibility would attach to us if we refused any longer to accept their proposals. I do not say that that is a sufficient reason, but it must be obvious that there are other matters as regards the condition of India to be taken into consideration, seeing the great changes which have taken place in recent years. Railway and telegraphic communications have been made between the different parts of India, and have wholly changed the conditions, so that the whole matter has been rendered exceedingly different from what it was in old times. Besides that, there is also to be considered another reason of extreme importance which your Lordships will find in the Despatch, and I have no doubt that this reason has had great influence on the Government of India in the conclusions at which they have arrived—I mean the approach to the frontiers of India of another great European military Power. I would not lead your Lordships to suppose that at the present time there is any special reason to anticipate unfriendly relations with that Power, or to apprehend danger from that quarter. On the contrary; our relations are of a friendly character, and Her Majesty's Government hope that matters which are now the subject of negotiation with respect to an approach to some portion of the frontier of India will be brought to a happy conclusion. There is no reason why we should not continue to maintain cordial relations with that great European Power. But we cannot calmly shut our eyes to the fact of the near approach of one of the greatest military Powers in the world to our Indian Empire. We have acknowledged that fact by the construction of a most important system of frontier defence, and we must seek in the organisation of our Indian Army to place ourselves in the very best state of defence in order to be able to meet any possible emergency should the calamity of war arrive. The state of affairs in India renders it absolutely necessary that our Armies should be not only capable of dealing with the internal conditions of India, but also able to defend the country if need be from foreign aggression. Your Lordships will see from the Papers laid on the Table that the Government of India have laid great stress on this consideration in support of the proposals they have made. I will say at once that that is 'one of the principal reasons which have led me to change my opinion, and to believe that the time has come for a greater concentration of the military command in order to secure the complete efficiency of our forces in India. Those forces, though I hope they are entirely sufficient for defence, are not of a very imposing character in point of numbers compared with those kept on foot by the great European Powers; and therefore it is the more necessary that we should have the most complete control over those forces, and should be able to use them in the most speedy and expeditious manner. The Government of India have come to the conclusion that, in order to secure this, the old Presidential system should be abandoned. In favour of this change we have the authority of two of the most distinguished men who have commanded our Armies in India—Sir D. Stewart, and that most able and distinguished soldier who was now about to return from India, Lord Roberts, the late Commander-in-Chief. The new Commander-in-Chief, who has just gone out to India, I am able to say, is also in favour of the change, for I have had the advantage of communicating with him on the subject. Those reasons will, I hope, convince your Lordships that the time has arrived when it is absolutely essential that this matter should be dealt with on the principles laid down by the Commission which was issued by Lord Lytton and approved of by successive Viceroy's whom I have mentioned. There is yet another matter which I cannot with propriety pass over. Your Lordships will have read in the interesting and important Despatch which Lord Lausdowne has sent home the scheme which the Government of India proposes for the reorganisation of the Indian Armies. It is important that the House should know what view Her Majesty's Government take of those proposals. I may say at once that we have not arrived at a final decision on the matter, and we shall not be able to do so until we know whether Parliament accepts this Bill or not, but I may intimate what our decision is likely to be. The proposals of the Government of India have somewhat varied from time to time on the question of reorganisation of the Indian Armies. In the first instance, by the Commission of 1879 it was proposed that there should be four Armies for Bombay, Madras, Bengal, and the Punjaub, and also to maintain the existing system under which Beloochistan and Scinde were comprised in the Bombay command, and Burmah was included in that of Madras. The present proposals vary from these. It is proposed that Madras should be deprived of Burmah, and Bombay of Beloochistan and Scinde. Your Lordships will see that therein lie questions of very great consequence. As far as I am able to judge, it is not likely to be the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that it would be desirable to adopt the whole of the proposals put forward exactly as they have reached us. With regard to the Bombay and Madras Armies, I say at once, speaking generally, we consider that those Armies will be maintained separately, but they will be commanded by Lieutenant Generals, under the immediate control of the Commander-in-Chief. As regards the Bengal Army, we do not view with favour the proposal to place practically the whole of our fighting regiments in one separate Frontier Army. We consider there are elements of considerable danger in such an arrangement. We should also deprecate the severance of the Bombay Army from all frontier service, the necessity of which we do not see. We approve of the division of the Bengal Army, because it is so large that for it a division of command would be necessary; that is to say, there would be two Lieutenant Generals commanding the two sections of the Bengal Army, but we do not entertain the idea of making so complete a severance of those two sections that there would be no interchange between them. We think it better to leave power to the Government to make such interchange of regiments as they may wish and not to completely sever that Army into two parts. As I have said, we think it not desirable for many reasons to form one single Frontier

Army containing the whole of our fighting regiments in India. With regard to Madras and Burmah, that matter stands upon a somewhat different footing. There is no doubt a good deal to be said in favour of not connecting Burmah with the Madras command, but there are also good reasons on the other side. We have not formed any strong opinion or come to any actual conclusion upon that point. There is another remark I have to make. I think your Lordships will have seen with satisfaction that all the Governments of India successively have had clearly before them the paramount necessity for such a segregation of the different elements of our Indian Armies as will conduce to the safety of the State. That segregation has hitherto been provided by means of the Presidential Armies, although, at the same time, from the fact that many of the warlike races on the frontier are recruited into the regiments, the segregation has not been so perfect as it might have been; and in any proposals the Government of India may entertain, it is their strong determination to have such a segregation of the different elements in the Armies as will afford the security which is to be derived from the varied races in the Indian Empire. Looking to all the different interests we have to deal with, that is as absolutely necessary now as in former times. I hope no Government in India will ever lose sight of that most important consideration. We must not forget that we have not to deal there simply with military organisation as it might be dealt with in Germany, or France, or in this country; we have to deal with an Empire, not only of immense size, but of a most multifarious character, governed by a people on the other side of the globe, and presenting many different considerations from those attaching to a people homogeneous with its Government. I have a firm belief in the loyalty of the Indian Princes, and of the good feeling towards us of the vast populations of India; but, notwithstanding that, and notwithstanding all the advances which are being made in good government, and that there is a growing sympathy between those peoples and ourselves, we must remember the history of India. We must remember our duty to India; and it is our duty to India, for the preservation of the peace, in the highest sense of the word, of that vast Empire, to see that our military organisation is such that that peace is not endangered, and that we shall not incur such dangers as have befallen us in past times. For these reasons, I repeat that I trust this system of segregation, and a due regard for the differences of race in the elements composing our Indian Armies, may never be lost sight of. If that be remembered, I see nothing in this measure in any respect to cause alarm. On the contrary, I believe it will strengthen our position in India, and will enable us to make the best use of the warlike elements among the native races which are a source of strength to our Armies; and I hope there will be laid in that way the foundation of a military system so strong that, whether as regards internal administration, or external aggression, we may have nothing to fear.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

VISCOUNT CROSS: My Lords, I cannot enter upon the subject-matter of the discussion before us to-night without first endorsing every word that has fallen from the noble Earl with regard to my old Friend and Colleague the late Lord Derby. It had been my good fortune to be acquainted with Lord Derby for more than half a century, and to work with him at many periods of his life. I can, therefore, bear my personal testimony to Lord Derby's absolute worth, to his strong sense of public duty, to his constant desire to do everything for the public and nothing for himself, and also to the strong, straightforward, common-sense which he brought to bear upon every subject. Lord Derby's death is a serious loss, not only to your Lordships' House, but to the country at large. With regard to the Bill which has been brought before us to-night I would venture to say a few words to your Lordships. There can be no doubt that the question with which the Bill before us deals is a question upon which there has been very great difference of opinion, whether looked at from a political or a military point of view. It will be found, I think, by those who have studied the subject that it is the older military men who have been strongest in favour of maintaining the Presidential system, and that it is the younger generation, so to speak, who have been anxious to see it done away with. Such well-known military authorities as Sir Frederick Haines, Sir Henry Norman, and Lord Napier of Magdala strenuously opposed the policy of abolishing the Presidential system in Madras and Bombay. Nor do I think it unnatural that you should find those opposing opinions between different sets of military officers. The system was generally supported by the older officers who had had experience of its value during the Indian Mutiny, and who felt the necessity for some safeguard to prevent anything of the kind in the future. On the other side, officers whose attention had been chiefly directed to the defence of the North-Western Frontier against a foreign foe favoured the proposal to concentrate the Army under one head. I am far from saying they may not be right from that particular point of view. In Lord Lansdowne's Despatch the different views of the two schools of military thought are expressed. In paragraph 6 your Lordships will find Lord Lansdowne points out—

"One lesson to be learned from the Mutiny, apart from the necessity of maintaining a due proportion of British troops in India, is the danger of allowing any one part of the Army to attain a vastly preponderating strength over the others ;"

and in paragraph 12 he says—

"The expansion of the Empire and its advance beyond its old limits involve the necessity of enlisting in our service the people of the new countries which have come under our rule. The necessity for this is now brought the more prominently before us, in view of the possibility that the next great operations our Army may be called on to undertake may be against a more formidable enemy than it has ever yet encountered."

When this matter was brought forward by my noble Friend in 1881, I ventured to state to your Lordships that if the Bill which was then proposed was to encounter great opposition in Parliament, as at that time I expected it would have done, upon those two subjects—the Indian Mutiny and a foreign foe—a public discussion should rather be avoided, as they were likely to raise disputes upon the one side and the other. The noble Earl has said that four Viceroy's have been strongly in favour of the proposal embodied in the Bill. That is perfectly true ; but, on the other hand, four Secretaries of State have taken the other view, and have abstained from acting upon the opinion of the Viceroy's. It is worthy of consideration that these four Viceroy's had all been influenced by the Military Department in India, which has been stirring throughout the whole of this matter since 1879. Their opinion, therefore, ought to have hardly as much weight as if it had been formed independently, and had been quite free from the bias of that Military Department. I stated at that time in the House that I was quite ready to carry out almost everything the Commission had recommended with the exception of this one point now before us. The noble Earl has stated what has been done in this direction in reference to the Military Accounts, Ordnance, Remounts, Commissariat, Transport, Clothing and Military Works Departments. A great deal has been done in preventing friction and to lessen the amount of correspondence which formerly took place, when everything had to go first to Madras or Bombay, and afterwards to the Governor General or the Commander-in-Chief. We have now before us a proposal to do away with the last remnant of the Presidential system. I am not inclined to oppose a Bill dealing with a subject to which so much consideration has been given by successive Secretaries of State in Council, and now that the responsible Government of the day has introduced it, I trust that they will persevere with it and determine that it shall become law, for it is very undesirable to cause uncertainty in India by introducing Bills affecting that country and then dropping them time after time, so that no one knows what the future may be. Therefore, I press upon the noble Earl that this measure should now be carried into effect with as little delay as possible. Before I make any observations upon the Bill, I should like to ask one question upon the 2nd sub-section of the 1st clause, for I cannot help thinking there is an error in it—a printer's error, I hope. It provides that—

"The military control and authority exercisable by the Governors in Council of the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay shall cease to be exercised, and all things which by or under the Army Act are required or authorised to be done by, to, or before the Governor of the Presidency of Madras or of Bombay, shall or may be done by, to, or before the Governor General of India"

—not to the Governor General of India in Council. That must surely be a mistake.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Certainly I should think so, speaking off-hand; but I should like to consult a draftsman. It cannot be intended to give special powers to the Viceroy.

VISCOUNT CROSS: Of course not. It is a matter of vital principle; and if it were brought before us in that shape in Committee I should certainly take the opinion of your Lordships upon the question, whether it should not be Governor General in Council. The Despatch we have in our hands is dated November 2, 1892, and, therefore, the Government has had ample time to consider it. I am bound to say that, I think, before we were called upon to consider this Bill a Despatch in answer ought to have gone out to the Government of India, because there are a great number of questions in connection with the subject about which we know nothing. The noble Earl has told us a most elaborate scheme has been sent home in answer to my own application when in Office as to the way in which the details of this plan were to be carried out. There is a great deal which is objectionable in that scheme. Paragraph 17 in the Despatch says there are three main principles which the Government of India have in view—

“First, to frame the division of the Indian Army in large military commands, so as to allow the changes, which will probably come within the next few years, to find a proper place in the new system.”

I should like to have seen the Despatch of the noble Earl on that point, because the Government of India has presented one or two totally different schemes in this matter. I am glad to hear from the noble Earl that, in his opinion, the Armies of Madras and Bombay ought to be considered and maintained as separate Armies. I entirely agree in that. I am very strongly of opinion that the Armies of Madras and Bombay should have the opportunity of frontier service, and that those parts of India should not be cut off from them. We ought to have heard something about this matter, because it is quite evident that what the Government of India are pressing upon the Government at home is that the scheme should be so framed as to give very great elasticity to the Government of India in forming these great demands. We ought to know what the view of Her Majesty's Government is upon that matter, and I trust that before long we shall have a Despatch written showing what their view really is. Now I come to the second principle. The second principle which the Government of India has in view is that of decentralisation. I am glad to hear what fell from the noble Earl on that point, but as the Bill is drawn it is a purely centralising Bill. There are no safeguards in the Bill for securing decentralisation. There was no safeguard taken in any Despatch to secure decentralisation. So far as the Bill is concerned, these two offices are entirely abolished, and the entire Government of the whole of the Indian Armies is at once placed in the Commander-in-Chief under the Governor General in Council. It is not the time now to discuss this question in detail; but if noble Lords will go through the Schedules of the Bill and compare them with the Army Act, they will see that they do strip the local Commanders-in-Chief of every vestige of the primary duties of a Lieutenant General and centralise everything in the Commander-in-Chief in India. The third principle was the maintenance of the segregation of races. I am very glad to find that it is to be maintained, but I should like to have had it more fully stated not by word of mouth only, but in some Despatch to the Governor General of India. Paragraph 26 in the Despatch says—

“We base our proposals on the foundation upon which successive Governments of India have advocated the change for the last 11 years, that the reform which we again submit for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government will conduce to the more efficient and economical administration of the Armies of India.”

I think some information might have been given us upon that subject by the noble Earl. I do not quite understand how economy is to be effected by this change. I have never seen any satisfactory Report from India as to how the financial burdens are to be diminished by this change. I fear that the financial arrangements of a large scheme like this will be anything but economical in the long run. There is another part of the Bill to which I should like to call attention. The third paragraph of the 1st clause says—

Viscount Cross

"The officers holding at the commencement of this Act the offices of Commanders-in-Chief of the Forces in the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay shall cease to be Members of the Council of the Governors of Madras and Bombay respectively."

I must say I object very strongly to that paragraph. I see no reason for it, and I see very great harm in it. The noble Earl, so far as I understand, has brought forward no authority from India on the point, except some telegram which we have not seen.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I will lay it on the Table.

VISCOUNT CROSS: I should like to remind the House of the views the Government of India has held, at all events, since 1888 as expressed by the Viceroy. On June 1 of that year Lord Dufferin wrote—

"We would add that the present holders of these offices might retain the title of Commander-in-Chief, nor do we see any reason why they and their successors should not continue with advantage to be Members of the Local Councils."

On October 15, 1888, Lord Dufferin, in answer to my request, wrote again—

"It is to be understood that the position and authority, the privileges and titles of the present incumbents of the offices of Commander-in-Chief of the Madras and Bombay Armies respectively are to remain, as far as possible, unaltered."

On February 26, 1889, Lord Lansdowne wrote—

"It is not proposed to remove those officers from the Local Councils. We are of opinion that their retention in Council is desirable, because questions of general military and political policy would still have to be dealt with by Local Governments, just as the Lieutenant Governors of the Provinces of Bengal, the North-West Provinces and Oudh, and the Punjab have to deal with questions of the distribution and strength of the troops and the maintenance of order in their respective Provinces, and it would be advantageous that Local Councils should have the advice in such matters of the senior military officer serving in the Provinces."

Now I come to the Despatch which we have just received, and in paragraph 22, page 8, we find Lord Lansdowne still pressing the same point. He says—

"As to the Commanders-in-Chief of Madras and Bombay, we propose, as we did in 1888, that the position, authority, privileges, and title of the present incumbents of the offices should remain unaltered. Their successors would be Lieutenant Generals commanding the Armies of the south and the west respectively; but, as recommended in 1888, we see no reason why they should not be Members of the Council of the Governor of their Presidencies."

So that we have had four Despatches from India all strongly in favour of retaining the Lieutenant Generals as Members of the Councils. If they were deprived of that office, I cannot help thinking they will not be looked up to in the same light as in their present position as Members of the Councils, and it would lessen them in the eyes of those who served under them. I see no possible advantage in taking away from them duties they have so well performed. But, my Lords, I see another great disadvantage. Last year an Act was passed which enabled the Indian Councils to be very much enlarged, and I hope that by this time several Governments have promulgated orders by which the numbers are to be increased. If you take away the Commander-in-Chief from the Council of the Governor, you will deprive him of the advice he very likely might want in military matters, and you will also take away one of the members nominated by him and destroy the balance at present established. I cannot imagine what has induced the noble Earl to strike these officers off the Councils. I hope some of your Lordships will take that view of the case, and that we may be able to persuade the Government of India to leave those Commanders as Members of the Local Councils. I will not detain the House with any observations on the general condition of India, but I believe one of the greatest duties we owe to India is to maintain an efficient Army there. It is essential that we should be strong, and that the natives should have a knowledge of our strength. It is our strength and justice together that promotes the happiness of India, and I believe that the condition of the people of India, though it may be slowly, is certainly steadily improving, and that from one end of India to the other they do believe not only in our strength, but also in our justice.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I deem it my duty, if your Lordships will allow me, to say a few words upon this important Bill, for it is an important Bill. Though personally, unfortunately for myself, I have never had any experience of India by residence in that country, I have, during the long time I have had the honour of being at the head of the Army, had constant opportunities of hearing the opinions of the most distinguished officers, both of our Imperial Army and of the local Army who have served in that country during that period. Up to the present time I must frankly admit, as it is well-known to both sides of the House, I have consistently had one opinion on the matters embodied in the Bill. I have held that opinion because I have heard from men like Lord Napier, Sir Henry Norman, Field Marshal Haines, and others that they strongly objected to any change being introduced in the distinct commands in that country. They have always said that the interests of the Indian Empire being very vast, and the numbers of the Armies being so great, each should have a chief of its own, and that it would be impossible for one individual to grasp the whole question in operations connected with that great Empire unless there was a division of authority to some extent. Besides that, they also strongly impressed upon me the fact that for all military practical purposes the power of the Commander-in-Chief in India as a Member of the Council of India under the Viceroy was such that he could at any moment employ any portion of the troops in any one of the three Presidencies to any extent necessary. However, so strong became the pressure that this change should be made, and so strong was the opinion of Lord Roberts, and I believe others, that I could have no hesitation in withdrawing any opposition that I might have offered on this question. To my mind, the time has come when the change should be made, and the sooner it is made the better, because doubt and hesitation are most objectionable in military affairs. There are, however, some points in the Bill on which I should like to make a few remarks. In the first instance, I entirely agree with what has fallen from the noble Viscount, that the withdrawal of the two Generals from the Council of their respective Presidencies is undesirable. In my opinion, it is essential that there should be some military authority in direct and close and intimate relationship with the Civil Members of the Governments of those Presidencies. There is no doubt that the Government of India itself is quite prepared to agree to that; not only so, but they absolutely suggested it, and it would be a great advantage to the local Army if it were done. I do hope there may still be time to arrange the matter in such a way that this change will not be required by the Bill before the House. Another question of great importance is with regard to service on the frontiers of India which are dangerously situated. Their defence is to be absolutely in the hands of one single Army—that of Bengal; and the Armies of Madras and Bombay are to be cut off from the frontier where service is looked for, and where service alone is really valuable. I think it a misfortune that the Madras troops have already had too little opportunity of qualifying for service by having been for years entirely kept to local duties. Bombay has had a little better chance, having had Scinde. I cannot see why Madras troops should not be employed in Burmah or on that frontier side. This is really a matter of internal arrangement, and I hope any arrangement which is to be made under this Bill will not prevent the local organisations being so managed as to allow portions of every one of the Armies being occasionally employed on the frontier, whether at Burmah, Beloochistan, Scinde, or elsewhere. It is desirable that every portion of the Army should occasionally come in contact with hostile or dangerous elements, and not simply be called upon to do home police duty, which, of course, is necessary, but which, still, is not calculated to create that spirit which is so necessary in the Army. As regards the efficiency of the troops, I will give an instance when the Indian Contingent was in the Soudan. I can say that no troops could have behaved better than the Native Bombay Regiment. I cannot conceive why all the strong fighting elements should be in one Army Corps. I think that would be a great misfortune, and objectionable in a military point of view, and I hope some system of organisation will be carried out which will meet any serious trouble that may arise. I felt bound to point out what I think the very serious inconvenience which may arise under the Bill as it now stands; and I hope that before it is passed some reconsideration will be given to what I consider, from a military point of view, most important questions.

*THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK desired, before he dealt with the Bill, to refer both on his own account and on behalf of his noble Friend the Duke of Devonshire, to the late Earl of Derby, in respect of his connection with India, and the loss which the House and country had sustained by his death. The late Earl was in India before the Mutiny, and he filled for the last time the office of President of the Board of Control. It was under his auspices that the Act for the Better Government of India was passed, which transferred the Government of India from the grand old East India Company to the Crown, and he became the first Secretary of State for India. He (the Earl of Northbrook) could well remember, as a young man in the other House, being struck with the tact, ability, and thorough knowledge of the subject which the Earl of Derby displayed in passing that very difficult Act. He had also been struck with the singular power which the late Earl possessed of seizing the main arguments upon any question, however complicated and difficult, and placing them lucidly, tersely, and fairly before the country. With regard to the Bill, he shared with the illustrious Duke and the noble Viscount doubts as to the policy of the change. At the same time, he thought with them that, under the circumstances in which the Secretary of State was placed, it would be impossible for him not to accept the proposals of the Government of India in respect of the main change—namely, to bring the control of the Armies of India under the Viceroy in Council and the Commander-in-Chief in India. He was sorry that the House had not before it in some more complete shape the views of Her Majesty's Government on this matter. The plan submitted by the Government of India was not in all respects satisfactory, and he thought that in this interval which had elapsed since the scheme was sent out there had been time for the Government to have gone carefully into the matter, and to have given the House the benefit of the observations of the Secretary of State for India in Council, so that they might have known what was the actual plan which they were asked to sanction. He wished to impress upon their Lordships the absolute necessity of taking care that the administration of these separate Armies should be decentralised. An opinion to the same effect had been expressed by the Government of India and by the Secretary of State, and they ought to guard, by distinct instruction, against the danger of centralisation. It was important, also, to consider whether it was not desirable that Lieutenant Generals commanding the newly-constituted Armies should be Members of the Councils of Bombay and Madras. There was great advantages to be gained from their connection with those Councils, and he saw no reason why they should not remain Members. The Secretary of State had said that the whole of his Council were in favour of removing these officers from the Councils of Bombay and Madras. Those Presidencies were very inadequately represented on the Councils, and he would like to know whether the noble Earl had any other Despatches from the Presidencies on the subject to lay on the Table, and whether he had consulted Lord Reay, who had lately filled the office of Governor of Bombay; Sir Grant Duff, who had recently returned from Madras, and whether he had taken the opinion of the illustrious Duke on the Cross Benches (the Duke of Connaught), who had recently held an important command in India as to this proposed change? If the Bill passed on the lines named in the Despatch he feared the tendency might be to diminish the power of the Civil Authorities in the Punjab, and to place the whole of the frontier policy in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief in India, which might be a very disadvantageous arrangement. There was a paragraph in the Despatch which made him apprehensive as to what was meant in this matter. Paragraph 21 said—

“We should insure that unanimity in our military action towards the tribes on the North and North-West Frontiers which is so desirable,” and that seemed to indicate the change he feared that was the withdrawal of the late system of management of those tribes by the Civil Authorities, and putting it into the hands of the General Officer commanding the Army of the North, in immediate communication with the Commander-in-Chief in India. The opinion of the Civil Authorities on that matter of the management of the tribes was of the greatest importance, and should not be passed by. Arrangements should be made to enable that opinion to be conveyed to the Governor General in Council and military measures should only be taken after careful consideration of it by the Governor General in Council. In the Despatch he saw nothing about economy; but, on the contrary, various indications that, unless a careful check were kept by the Secretary of State in Council and by the Government of India, the effect of the proposals would be to increase still further the growing military expenditure of India. When the Secretary of State wrote his answer to the Despatch which was now on their Lordships' Table, he trusted he would take care to provide as far as possible that the change about to take place by a redistribution of the forces or by raising more troops, of which he saw some indications, should not still further increase the very heavy charges which now fall on India in respect of military expenditure. There were several minor questions connected with the Bill which would be more appropriately discussed in Committee; but he would make no further observations at present, and would conclude by trusting that as the Secretary of State had at last introduced a Bill of this kind he would in his instructions to the Government of India take care that the points referred to, which he believed the noble Earl most thoroughly appreciated, and which were of great importance, should be carefully guarded in order that no mischief, either administrative or financial, should occur in consequence of the change now proposed.

LORD CHELMSFORD would only add a few words to what had been said upon the subject of this Bill. In the course of his long service in India he had seen most of the troops in both Presidencies. Having been much impressed with the amount of petty detail thrown upon the Commander-in-Chief and his staff, and the fact that they were really precluded in consequence from taking part in the larger questions which were continually pressing for attention, he framed a scheme for the abolition of the minor Commands in Madras and Bombay. That scheme differed from the present one in this particular—that instead of dividing the Army of India into four Commands he divided it into eight. He forwarded that scheme to many influential persons, and it was, on the whole, very favourably received, although he was bound to confess his own Commander-in-Chief did not approve of it. He was surprised to hear from the illustrious Duke that Sir Henry Norman had expressed an opinion adverse to that scheme, because he had at home a letter from that gallant officer expressing entire approval of it, and saying that he had had a consultation with the lamented Lord Mayo, and he thought it was very desirable such a change should take place. Of course, in a scheme for the abolition of Commands, everything depended on how the details were carried out. Having studied the despatch laid on the Table very attentively, he was much struck with the tone of depreciation of the different parts of the Army of India except that which was recruited from the Punjaub. Now, they all knew what gallant service the Sepoys of the Bengal Army had rendered, with the assistance of British troops, in defeating the Sikhs; and now, with their discipline infinitely improved, he was quite certain those regiments, if properly handled and distributed, would do right good service, supposing at any time we had to defend our frontier from a determined attack by a formidable European Force. The Bombay native troops behaved well under Sir Hugh Rose, and Lord Napier of Magdala had borne testimony to the gallantry of the Madras troops in Abyssinia. The Armies of Bombay and Madras had not had the same advantages of reorganisation as the Bengal Army, but their record was not less creditable. Running through the whole of the despatch, too, lay the presumption that if we were to meet a formidable European enemy on our frontier we must go outside the frontier to do so. He believed that would be a fatal mistake to make, unless it could be absolutely proved that by stepping outside we should find a better fighting position than inside our own country. But he contended, after studying this question very closely for a great number of years, that the North-Western Frontier, which was the only strikable frontier for a European Force, was as strong as it possibly could be made. It was only 500 miles in length, and along it ran an absolutely unfordable river. A formidable defensive position existed at Quetta, which he trusted would be supplemented at some future time by another at Peshawur. We, in fact, possessed what was so necessary on a frontier, the absolute command of both sides of the river, and we had now strategical railways which enabled us to send troops to any point required. There are only two main lines from which India could be attacked : one from Cabul and the other from Candahar. The latter was now absolutely blocked by the forts at Quetta, and the line of attack would have to be thrown higher up in the direction of Ghuznee. In the circumstances he trusted the Bengal troops might be allowed, as hitherto, to occupy posts in the Punjaub mixed with Punjaubees. Their martial spirit would be repressed if they were completely separated from that frontier. If we were to yield to those who were so persistent in advocating a forward policy, it would be seen, he believed, that they were doing a great injustice to the natural features of our own frontier and risking the loss of our Indian Empire.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Marquess of RIPON): My Lords, I need scarcely say that I have listened with great interest and, if I may be permitted to say so, with great satisfaction to the discussion which has taken place upon this Bill. It is now 12 years ago since I, taking up this question from the late Lord Lytton, who left it to my Government, have been advocating the principle which animates the present Bill, and to that principle no opposition has been offered. Some criticisms have been directed against details of the Bill which can best be dealt with in Committee; but I have no doubt from the course of the Debate the Bill will now be read a second time without opposition, and that the principle which four successive Governor Generals of India and Governments of India, one after another, have been urging, will be passed by this House, and will become law. The noble Viscount opposite will, I hope, permit me to say that I cannot altogether admit the fairness of the charge which he brought against the Governments of India in regard to this matter, that they were solely inspired by the Military Department of their Government. My noble Friend must remember that this question took its rise not from the Military Department, so-called, of the Government of India, but from the most important and weighty Commission of 1879. That was the origin of this matter. The Report of that Commission was reviewed by Lord Lytton, but his Government, as your Lordships know, had not time to complete the consideration of the subject. Lord Lytton himself recorded his strong opinion in favour of the proposals of the Commission; but he was obliged to leave the matter to those who followed him, myself, Lord Dufferin, and Lord Lansdowne. We all took the same view, and pressed the matter with the greatest earnestness. I am glad to find that we have been able to bring conviction to the minds of those who doubted for a long time, and that at last the principle of this Bill will be passed. The truth is that the Presidential system in India has been broken down. No one was a greater destructive in that matter than the noble Viscount opposite. He did a great deal to break it down, and it only remains now to take the ultimate logical step of abandoning the last remnant, and reorganising our Indian Armies so as to suit them to the requirements of the present time. Before I go further, I should like to say a word upon a matter which has received attention from some of the previous speakers, and that is the question of the segregation of the native elements of the different Armies. Throughout this discussion we, who have been advocating this arrangement from India, have found, to our surprise, that there is a great deal of distrust of us in this matter of segregation and centralisation. It has always been supposed that the object of this change is centralisation. That, certainly, has not been the object with which this arrangement has been proposed by any of the Governments of India who have urged it; and I beg to express my entire concurrence with my noble Friend below me (Lord Northbrook) in thinking that the principle of segregation in the Armies of India is of the greatest value. And I go further, and say that from my own experience I believe that principle of segregation will be better carried out under the system proposed by this Bill than it has been under the system existing in former years. The noble Viscount seemed rather to expect that there would have been in this Bill some more minute regulations given with regard to the general question of the reconstitution of the Indian Army. I am sure the noble Viscount will agree with me in thinking that it would be very undesirable to lay down regulations of that kind in an Act of Parliament. We have suffered somewhat in India from having to deal, in respect to Army organisation, with the provisions of an Act of Parliament. Nothing could be more unwise, in my judgment, than to lay down the system of our military organisation, even in its main lines, in the imperative terms of an Act of Parliament. All we wish to do by this Bill is to remove the difficulties from the new system which the existing Act of Parliament imposes, and that is all, I venture to submit, which any Act of Parliament ought to do. Something has been said about the want of a despatch dealing with the new organisation as sketched out in the last despatch from the Indian Government. I know very well that that despatch makes proposals which are different in certain respects from those put forward in the Bill; but that, as Lord Lansdowne and his Colleagues say, is the result of the changed circumstances of India at the present time. It is, as I reminded your Lordships just now, more than 12 years ago since this question was taken up. Things in India have been a great deal changed from what they used to be. Many things have occurred in India in those 12 years, and I am not at all surprised that the Government of India should have proposed some changes in the detailed proposals which had been previously submitted to the Secretary of State. But then it is urged that my noble Friend ought to have laid before your Lordships a despatch upon this question at the same time that he brought in this Bill. I understood my noble Friend to say that we ought to take the opinion of Parliament upon the principle of this change, and then afterwards carry out the details in consultation with the Government of India when we have matured the plan. Your Lordships will have observed that in what fell from my noble Friend there are points upon which he hesitates to accept the views of the Government of India as laid down in that despatch. My noble Friend's course before he comes to a final conclusion upon those points will naturally be to consult with the Government of India, and to hear what they have to say upon them; and though this is a perfectly arguable matter, I venture to say that I think the course which my noble Friend has taken is the best that could have been adopted, and that it would have been a mistake to incur the delay in introducing this measure which might have followed from a prolonged discussion with the Government of India at so great a distance in regard to its details. For I entirely agree with what fell from the noble Viscount opposite as to the importance of settling this question, so far as this Bill can settle it, at once and without delay. Everything that the noble Viscount said upon that point was, I think, most just and most important; and I can assure him that Her Majesty's Government will do all that rests with them to get this measure passed by Parliament during the present Session. Now, my Lords, I come to what, I think, is the principal objection which has been taken to the details of the Bill before the House—I mean the question whether the Lieutenant Generals who are to be at the head of the Armies of Madras and Bombay should or not also be Members of the Councils of the Governments of those Provinces. I will merely say that my own opinion has always been that the proposal of the Bill is the right one. That was the opinion of the late Lord Lytton. No doubt the noble Viscount was able to quote on the other side the opinion of Lord Dufferin, and to a certain extent the opinion of Lord Lansdowne, though, of course, from the telegram which has been communicated to your Lordships to-night, it is obvious that is not a point—I will not go beyond that—to which Lord Lansdowne attaches much importance. Now, my Lords, the main difficulty which I have always felt in regard to this matter is this. The system which was contemplated by the Commission of 1879, and which the successive Governments of India have desired in these respects to adopt, was a system which provided that under the Commander-in-Chief in India there should be four or five Lieutenant Generals upon an equal footing; and I have been unable to see why you should put the Lieutenant Generals in Madras and Bombay upon a different footing from the Lieutenant Generals in Bengal and the Punjab. That is the view I have always taken in the matter. I do not want to press it too far. I entirely admit there is much to be said on the other side, but I am bound to tell your Lordships frankly what is the view I have been led to take. My noble Friend behind me said it was very important that the Governments of Madras and Bombay should be in immediate communication with the officers commanding the troops. I entirely agree with that—it is absolutely necessary; but I do not see the least in the world how that will be rendered difficult by preventing the Commanders-in-Chief from serving on the Councils. If a time of trouble and difficulty arises it is necessary that the Lieutenant Governors in Bengal and in the Punjaub should be in the closest possible communication with the officers commanding the troops in those Provinces; and I fail at the moment to see why it is more necessary in Madras and Bombay than it is in Bengal and the Punjaub. That is the view I have always taken, I confess, in this matter; and it is some satisfaction, I own, to me that that view was unanimously taken, as my noble Friend has told us by his present Advisers on the Council at the India Office. Those Advisers include Sir Donald Stewart, as we know, whose acquaintance with every detail in every branch of the Indian Army is surpassed by no man living at the present time; and the experience of the noble Earl's other Advisers is very great; so that, at all events, whether the view I take be right or wrong, it has considerable weight of authority to support it. I think, my Lords, I have touched sufficiently upon the main points which have been raised in this discussion, simply in the way of discussion, for there is no opposition to the principle; and I should be wrong in taking up your Lordships' time in arguing that principle at length. I did so two years ago when the course of the Debate, although not favourable at the moment to the view I entertained, led me to look forward to the time when those who opposed me would come round to my view, and when the proposals would ultimately be carried out. I certainly hope, my Lords, that the Bill, at all events in its principle, will be passed speedily by both Houses of Parliament.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I am not entitled to make any reply; but, as I have been asked two or three questions, perhaps I may be allowed to answer them. In the first place, I wish to make one remark with regard to the point which has been touched upon by the noble Marquess, and that is the great objection which has been taken to that part of the Bill with regard to the exclusion of the Generals commanding these Armies from the Madras and Bombay Councils. I can only repeat that I have taken the advice which I am bound to take, and which is provided for me as Secretary of State. A strong and unanimous opinion was expressed by my Council in favour of the clause in the Bill. I had the advice upon my Council of civilians who had sat in the Councils both at Madras and Bombay, and who were, therefore, competent to give me advice upon this matter. The advice given me, was, therefore, not that of military men alone, but was given by competent Civil officials also. I need scarcely say that that clause is not a cardinal principle of this Bill, and whatever objections may be urged against it will be arguable in Committee. Then, with regard to the finance question, my noble Friend asked for a statement of the financial saving. The matter stands, believe, as nearly as possible in this way. It was originally hoped that there would be savings to a considerable amount. They have amounted, I believe, on the whole, from the various changes made in the direction mentioned by the noble Marquess, to about £500,000 a year. Those changes have been made already, and of course, in that respect, the matter is discounted. But, as coming from this particular measure which I am proposing, there is no immediate expectation of any considerable amount of saving, though there is hope on the part of the India Office and Indian Government that eventually, when the reorganisation is completed, a more economical system will be created. That is all I can say upon the question of finance. My noble Friend also referred to a matter which it would be out of place to discuss now—the importance of always consulting the Punjaub Government and the Frontier Authorities upon all questions relating to the frontier. I simply wish to say that I entirely agree in what my noble Friend has said. I think it is of the highest importance that the Government immediately on the frontier, who are well acquainted with frontier questions, and have long experience with regard to them, which cannot be the case with the Central Government, at all events in the same degree, should be consulted on questions regarding the frontier. I will not say anything further, except to express my satisfaction that the general principle of the Bill is accepted by your Lordships, and to add that when we reach the Committee stage I shall, in regard to details, be ready to give whatever further explanations may be required.

*THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT : My Lords, this is the first time I have had the honour of addressing your Lordships, and I should not have risen but for the deep interest I feel in the subject under discussion. During the time that I was Commander-in-Chief in Bombay I was in frequent correspondence with the Indian Authorities on this subject, and also with the noble Viscount (Viscount Cross), as he will remember. I have always felt certain, from what had taken place, and from the result of the previous Commission of 1879, a very important one, as the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India said, that it was inevitable that a Bill somewhat on the lines of the measure now submitted by the Secretary of State for India should follow, and, as far as I am concerned, I concur in the general principle of the Bill. I wish, however, to point out very strongly that I think the Secretary for India has not recognised what a great loss it will be to the Native Armies of Bombay and Madras if the Commanders-in-Chief or Lieutenant Generals, as they are in future to be termed, were no longer to be Members of the Governors' Councils. I see that in one part of the despatch it was stated that the Sepoy did not at all understand the changes that would be likely to take place. I venture to think that the Sepoy, though he may not understand the nature of those changes in the same manner as we do at home, is a very sensible man for all that, and fully appreciates all that goes on. There are a large number of vernacular newspapers read either by these men themselves or read to them, and they take a deep interest in all matters which concern the prestige of those under whom they are serving. I wish your Lordships to understand that I have no present interest in those Armies ; but I desire to defend the interests of those who followed me, and I think it will be reducing them to the position of Divisional Generals when they are no longer taken into Council, and have no longer the right of sitting in the Governors' Councils, a right which is highly prized by everybody of position in these Presidencies. I wish also to point out, with regard to the recruiting for the Bombay Army, that the new Orders which are to come out will be severely felt in that Army. We had when I was in command of that Army a certain percentage of foreigners, Sikhs, Pathans, and others I know that this was most distasteful to the Government of Bengal. They looked upon it as an infringement of their rights ; but, at the same time, it was an enormous advantage to that Army in stiffening it up, if I may say so. The ordinary Bombay Sepoy, recruited from the Mahratta, the Konkarie, and other parts of the Deccan, are not at the present day of the physique they used to be. The Mahrattas are much better off than they were. They have taken so much to agriculture, and have filled so many appointments in Bombay and other places, that, as a fighting element, they are not what they were in old days when they rendered such gallant service for the British Government. Therefore, should they lose any other element than those I have mentioned, I feel certain that the Bombay Army will, as regards martial spirit and physique, deteriorate ; but I am happy to think that the Secretary of State, from what he has said, is in favour of sending these troops to their respective frontiers, Beloochistan and Burmah, for service. I am aware that the health of the Bombay troops does suffer. There is no doubt that the Bombay Sepoy is less capable of resisting the rigours of the climate than his northern brothers ; but, at the same time, there is an important prestige attaching to the right of going to the frontier and of taking part in the little frontier wars that occur. I think, especially for the officers, it would be a very serious matter if they never had a chance of those frontier experiences which are so important in keeping up the martial spirit of the Native Armies. Your Lordships have heard many important speeches from those who preceded me that I feel it would be quite out of place on my part to take up any further the time of your Lordships' House. But I do hope the question of the retention of the Commanders of the Bombay and Madras Armies in Council will be carefully considered. They have always sat in the Councils ever since the formation of these Armies of the two Presidencies. I trust, therefore, this question will be re-considered on its own merits.

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 16th instant.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION) BILL [H.L].—(No. 33.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said, the principle of the measure was to permit parents of a sufficient number of children attending Board schools to make application to have separate religious instruction given to them in those schools, provided they did not put the ratepayers to any expense, and provided they did not interfere with the efficiency of the schools. It was, he imagined, a principle of the Common Law that the faith of the father was the faith of the children, unless there was a special understanding to the contrary. At present, unfortunately, the children of parents who belonged to the Church of England were not instructed in the Board schools as devout parents would wish them to be. The hard work and general conditions of life of the parents prevented them from themselves teaching their children. The result was that the children went in herds to the Board schools, where there was but little religious instruction, as Churchmen understood it, and where parents were not consulted as to the character of the teaching given to their children. In many such schools there was, indeed, no instruction of the kind at all. He did not wish to make any attack upon the School Boards, which, in many instances, did their best in the difficult position in which they were placed. He thought, however, that it would be a very good thing to stimulate them a little, so as to induce them in all cases to use their powers to the full extent. Even the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments were not taught in Board schools as a rule, notwithstanding that promise had been made by the Department in 1888. The case of children of Jewish parents had been met by the London School Board by the adoption of a special syllabus of religious instruction. He rejoiced that this consideration had been shown to the Jews ; but he might point out that, if ever there was an infringement of the Cowper-Temple Clause, it was this syllabus. He would, however, be the last person to invoke the interference of the Education Department in the matter. He did not wish to level down the excellent religious teaching given to Jewish children, but he did maintain that the Christian Church should be allowed to level up the religious instruction given to Christian children. He moved the Second Reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Bishop of Salisbury.)

THE EARL of CRANBROOK : My Lords, I am quite aware that the details of the Bill will require a great deal of consideration. Its principle, however, I strongly approve, for the time has I think come when we ought to "take stock" of what is going on around us. In London a great controversy has recently arisen. The question now is, not whether an emasculated Christianity only can be taught in Board schools, but actually whether it is competent to teach doctrines adverse to Christianity, and to tell children not to believe certain things. In the case of Roman Catholic children and Jews concessions have been made to the religious views of parents which are withheld from members of the Church of England. Let it be fair all round. In The Times of that morning there appeared a very remarkable letter from Dr. James Martineau. He said—

"The error of the past has been the attempt to fit one uniform system of religious instruction to the wants of so variegated a whole as the population of a London school district. If you satisfy the ecclesiastical standard, you wrong the miscellaneous host of unattached yet not irreligious people. If you insist on the latitude necessary to make the best of their religious proclivities, you disappoint the genuine Church disciples of the indispensable nurture of their piety. The simple remedy is to recognise the different requirements of their consciences and make distinct provision for each. In any school already worked under the 1871 rule this may be done by adding a department to the religious teaching conformed to Mr. Atherton Riley's restrictive condition, without prejudice to the freedom established elsewhere. I do not see why he and his friends should not have all that they desire, provided they are content with the consideration justly due to their own consciences, and refrain from all unfriendly attitude towards the different ideas and usage of their co-partners. If, in deference to the special requirements of the Jews, arrangements of different type have been thought admissible in different schools, there seems nothing to forbid the co-existence of similar though minor varieties within the same school. It would imply, of course, the presence of a more or less mixed staff of teachers, in order to conduct with intelligence, sympathy, and sincerity both the dogmatic and the undogmatic instruction. But, at all events, in the large London Board schools, I do not think that this would occasion any difficulty."

This is a remarkable admission. It is an admission that the difficulty cannot be met by a system of undogmatic religion, as Dr. Martineau calls it. In principle there is no such thing as pure and undogmatic religion. It is impossible for a teacher, if he is deeply imbued with certain ideas, to avoid communicating them to the children he is teaching. If you bring the instruction down, you must bring it down to a purely secular education. That being the case, are your Lordships prepared to eliminate religion from schools altogether? If so, you will be adopting a system which is being opposed in every country in Europe. It is the case now both in France and Belgium. The Bill of the right rev. Prelate proposes one way of meeting the difficulty, and it is a way which well deserves consideration. Why cannot religious education be provided without injury to the conscience of anyone? Without dwelling too long upon the topics involved in this subject, I wish merely to say that that which is given to the Jews is demanded by Roman Catholics and by Churchmen alike, and I contend that that demand ought to be conceded.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, it is difficult to exaggerate the importance of the question raised by this Bill. The noble Earl who has just sat down has protested against the elimination of religious teaching from our schools; but I am of opinion that the most decided step that could be taken

(the right rev. Prelate will forgive me, but I say it in all seriousness) towards the ultimate elimination of religious instruction from our Board Schools would be for your Lordships to adopt the principles laid down in this Bill. I desire to speak with the greatest possible respect of the motives which the right rev. Prelate has in bringing forward this Bill, and I desire to speak with the greatest respect for, and most entire sympathy with, those who desire that their children should receive religious instruction; but the unfortunate experience of the past, and the bitter discussion, after which the matter was settled by the compromise known as the Cowper-Temple Clause, should lead us to be very cautious in re-opening that discussion. The difficulty is an immense one. If it were possible that the various religious denominations of the Kingdom could lay aside their rivalries, no objection, I suppose, would be raised to the Bill; but we know perfectly well that nothing of the kind can happen. The Bill will constantly raise the most bitter controversies. The matter would not be left entirely in the hands of the parents, but they would be stirred up by the ministers of every denomination for the purpose of raising controversy, and the end of that would be, in my opinion, a far stronger movement in favour of secular teaching than has ever been experienced. It is for that reason that I object altogether to the Bill now before the House. With regard to the teaching of Jewish children, if what has been stated is correct, I should say there has been a distinct violation of the Cowper-Temple Clause, but I have not yet received full accounts of what has been done in that respect. We are face to face with an enormous difficulty; face to face with a problem which we have not the means of solving. I do not believe that the parents of the vast majority of the children of this country are so devoutly attached to the inculcation of particular religious dogmas upon their children as is supposed by those who teach those dogmas; and not having the means of solving the problem before us, and looking at the friction and contention which apparently the noble Earl opposite himself does not desire to provoke, I so strongly object to the passing of the Bill that I am obliged to move that it be read this day six months.

The Earl of Cranbrook

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : My Lords, I am entirely unable to agree with the noble Earl opposite that the Cowper-Temple Clause has put a stop to the controversy on this question. The Cowper-Temple Clause has been an absolute failure, and has not introduced what it was expected to introduce—namely, free religious teaching with simple setting aside of particular religious formulæ, such as the Catechism. On the contrary, in a very large number of Board schools it has had the effect of banishing all definite doctrinal teaching altogether, and has produced either no religious teaching at all, or merely reading of the Bible without note or comment. And that has not produced religious peace. The movement which is now going on in London shows that it has not produced religious peace. The efforts of denominations, like the Jews and the Roman Catholics, to escape from it, clearly show that it has not produced religious peace. In every part of the country there is still the greatest strain on the part of the clergy of the Church of England, and a very large proportion of the laity, to escape from the danger of the Board school, lest restraint, which you call a compromise, should be imposed on the consciences of the children of the Church of England. I support the Bill, because I believe, without in the least committing myself to details, that it constitutes the only eirenicon which we can contemplate, and is the only prospect of peace between multifarious conflicting religious bodies. The noble Earl fears great religious turmoil in the various bodies who are each to provide at their own expense during a fixed hour of the day a place where a man paid by themselves can teach the religion which the parents prefer to have. What is there controversial or quarrelsome or dangerous in that? I cannot help thinking that we are under a disadvantage in arguing this question precisely from the fact that there is a limited sympathy with religious teaching on the part of those who are opposed to us. If I were arguing in a Japanese Assembly I should be certain of carrying my point.

It is because noble Lords will not detach themselves from their own convictions on the point, and will imagine they can force upon others the views they entertain upon religious education. My contention is that they have no right whatever to attempt to force upon either children or parents their own views as to what religious education is. The parent alone has the right to determine what the religious education of his child shall be; and what we have to do is, so far as material conditions will permit, to take care that the parent shall always have his wishes in that respect properly observed. What we have to suffer from is that the noble Earl will not treat us as if we were Jews—he will not treat us as if we were Roman Catholics. The Church of England is, I admit, deeply divided upon this point. Almost all the clergy and a large proportion of the laity believe in what, for shortness, I will call the teaching of doctrinal religion. On the other hand, a large number of the laity advocate the teaching of a non-doctrinal religion; or, at all events, the elimination of all doctrine upon which anybody disagrees with anybody else. I do not believe in that any valuable residue would be left; but I do not wish to pronounce any judgment upon the point. What I ask for is the recognition that there is a very strong body of belief in the Church of England that doctrinal teaching is necessary to religious education. If you once grasp that fact—you may differ from it and may wish it were altogether otherwise, but, at all events, you will see that you cannot trample down the convictions of a very large and earnest body of men, and you must give your attention and your efforts to the means of providing in the best way possible for the religious teaching of these children of the Church of England, and also of the many Nonconformist Bodies who have, as an article of belief from which they will not be forced, the conviction that doctrinal teaching is essential to the teaching of religion. I do not wish to argue for a moment that that is true or false; within these walls that is a wholly immaterial consideration; but I wish to show that that doctrine is extensively held, and the view is that it is not satisfied—that it is outraged by the Cowper-Temple Clause—as at present in practice, and that some measure such as that of the right rev. Prelate is necessary in order to re-introduce peace into the Church community upon the subject. I do not pledge myself to all the details of this measure; but in recognition of the fact that there is a very difficult problem in face of us, with which we have to deal, and that the present state of things satisfies no earnest person whatever, I must certainly vote for the Second Reading of the Bill.

*LORD NORTON called attention upon this subject to a movement lately started in Birmingham of the success of which he had just received information from the Bishop of Coventry. The Birmingham School Board had already granted all that the Bishop of Salisbury's Bill aimed at by permitting clergymen who undertook the task to give lessons in the Board Schools of definite religious teaching without any of the restrictions which the Bill imposed. They all had one object in view—namely, that the children attending the schools should have such definite religious teaching as their parents desired. There were only two modes of arriving at that object, either by arrangement with the Board Schools to give religious instruction more explicitly than they now did, by what was generally called a religious syllabus, or through permission to the parents of different religious denominations as the Bill proposed. In refusing either alternative they must make up their minds to allow our whole national system of education to become merely secular, and to trust to religious instruction being found elsewhere from those schools. The noble Earl opposite said the adoption of this proposal, which would be sure to break down, would only end in a purely secular system. That, however, was, in their opinion, the probable result of doing nothing. Under the Act of 1870, no doubt clergymen might have assumed the religious teaching in all the Board Schools by general consent; and it was merely because they objected to the system, and most unwisely held themselves aloof, that they had lost the position they were now seeking to recover. The Bill proposed rather liberally that the parents of any five children in a Board School should be able to demand that religious instruction should be provided for those children.

The Marquess of Salisbury

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY :
They pay for it themselves.

*LORD NORTON said, the parents would call upon the Board, and the Board would immediately entertain the application and provide an instructor at the expense of the parents and not out of the rates. The object of the Bill was good, but the mode of carrying it out was utterly impracticable. Suppose that in a large school, say of 1,500 children, several groups of five children demanded religious teaching, an instructor would have to be appointed for each group. Again, the children in the group would not be of the same age, and more than one instructor would be required because of the different ages. Obviously such a plan could not possibly work. He asked the right rev. Prelate to consider whether a parent who was so anxious for the religious education of his children, and was ready to pay for it, would not be likely to give his children religious education at home? There were many people who thought that school teachers were not the proper people to teach religion. This was a matter that should be dealt with by private agreement rather than by an Act of Parliament. It was impossible to frame a measure for carrying out such a proposal without infinite difficulty. There was not a line in the Bill before the House that would not provoke opposition, and it contained hardly a provision that could not easily be evaded. At the present moment, as he had pointed out, the object in view was attained by private agreement in Birmingham. The School Board there arranged with the clergy that on two days in each week half-an-hour should be given to Clergy in all Board Schools for the teaching of religion. He understood that that plan was working satisfactorily, and he asked if it would not be a much better way of arriving at the object they all had in view than by a measure such as that before the House?

*LORD PLAYFAIR said, this Bill broke down the compromise of 1870, which he aided Mr. Forster as much as he could in obtaining; and he thought their Lordships would be extremely disappointed with the result if it were passed. In the first place, if they carried out their principle that the parents of any five children in any school having a particular form of religion should have the right to demand to have them taught in that form of religion, the first thing the public would ask was that the same right should be given in denominational schools that was now sought to be forced on Board Schools. They would say that there being five Dissenters in one of these schools, which might be the only school in the parish, the Nonconformist minister should have a right to enter and give religious instruction in it. In 1870 there was a large body of educationists who desired that all schools should be secular, but that religious education might be given out of school hours. Their Lordships would, by passing this Bill, be giving a great impulse to that movement. There were many enemies of denominational schools, and when the Bill passed to another House, they would find that the compromise of 1870 would be further broken down by many with great willingness in order to introduce a system of secular education, which personally he thought would be a mistake. He was, therefore, sorry the Bill had been brought forward, and would vote against it.

*LORD COLCHESTER desired to say a few words as the only Representative of the London School Board in their Lordships' House. The Cowper-Temple Clause might mean almost anything, and those who construed it most strictly took the view that the unsectarian teaching required by that compromise was not the exclusion of the doctrinal teaching of particular sects, but the exclusion of all religious teaching whatever. The great point on which there had been so much discussion recently, was whether the religious education should not include the teaching of the Divinity of Christ. That had been denounced "as in the interest of Episcopacy" — why, it was difficult to understand. There was a strong feeling throughout the country that religious education should be given. He was sure that was the feeling in the Metropolis, for the candidates at the recent Election who advocated religious education met with great support. He would not say that the particular terms of this Bill should be carried out, or that the parents of so small a number of children as five should be allowed to do what was suggested. Still, if it could be done, it might be very successful. If the rate-payers were anxious that their children should receive religious education they ought to have it. For those reasons he hoped their Lordships would consent to the Second Reading of the Bill, as it was generally admitted some change was required.

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY could not, even at so late an hour, allow such a discussion to pass without saying a few words upon the subject before the House. He assured their Lordships that this Bill originated in the conviction, widely entertained, that unsectarianism was very fast becoming a religion in itself; that it was advancing into families which accepted definite doctrine, and would, if it continued its advance, change the religion, first of individuals, then of families, then of parishes, and then of the country. The noble Earl was much mistaken if he thought that the Bill was clerical or ministerial in any sense. The convictions of parents upon the subject of religion were becoming much deeper than ever they had been before; in fact, he did not believe those convictions were ever more deeply rooted throughout the country than at the present time. It was a great mistake to suppose that a spiritual or religious movement would produce a reaction, and that a secular condition of things would not. Secular education had been tried. It existed in America and in France, and was in both cases producing the widest and deepest reaction. Over the whole of France a large number of private religious schools were springing up, and while some of the unsectarian schools were poorly attended, the private religious schools in the hands of the clergy were full and flourishing. A book published by the late head of the Police Department of France, giving a narrative of the greatest crimes committed in the country during many years past, contained in its last pages a tremendous denunciation of the system of secular education in France, and traced the crime, which had been so greatly increasing, to the fact that such an enormous mass of young people were brought up without any sense of the Being to whom they were accountable or of a future. He was anxious, however, that there should be no violence of feeling in the matter. Whatever was done ought to be done quietly, gently, in the most Christian spirit; but he could not see that any measure could move more gently and Christianly in the direction of obtaining for children an education such as their parents desired them to have. What could be more simple than that the parents should be allowed to go to the Board Schools and say—"If you will give us three hours in the week and a roof, we and our friends will provide a religious instructor to teach our children in the religious principles in which we desire them to be taught"? Such instruction would be given without cost to the ratepayers, and it was not to interfere with the arrangements or discipline of the schools.

On Question whether ("now") shall stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 32; Not-Contents 21: Majority 11.

Resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

APPOINTMENT OF MAGISTRATES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Lord Chancellor if he would have any objection to laying on the Table a Return of the Magistrates, with their names and the places of their jurisdiction, appointed by himself and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster within the last six months? He said that, in the recent discussions on the appointment of Magistrates, all who had spoken seemed to have lost sight of the change made by Mr. Ritchie's Local Government Act; when Magistrates exercised administrative functions there was sense in asking that political Parties should, as far as possible, be balanced, but now that Magistrates were restricted to judicial functions only, character and education ought to be the principal, if not the only, elements to be considered in the selection of Magistrates. He was most anxious to avoid making any insinuations against the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, neither would he venture to accuse the last speech on the subject from the Woolsack of being inconsistent and contradictory; but he thought he might call the attention of the noble and learned Lord to what a Justice of the Peace of 25 years' standing had written to The Morning Post in this respect. That letter, after stating the denial of the noble and learned Lord of "having been actuated by any desire to serve any Party end," went on to quote later passages from the same speech in which the noble and learned Lord complained of the very limited number of Liberals having been upon the Bench when he came into Office, and that, in short, he had tried to balance Parties. The noble and learned Lord had put a mechanic on the Bench at Crewe, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster appeared to have put 58 or 59 working men on different Benches, merely because they were working men. He would not go into the question of whether the status and education of these men fitted them for these positions, or whether the placing them there was part of the general attempt by the Government to catch votes at any cost; but it could not be denied that this was a novel experiment, and he, therefore, would make to the noble and learned Lord the request on the Notice Paper, in order that the country might be able to watch and follow the experiment of the Government, and see how these new Magistrates conducted themselves. He did not see how the noble and learned Lord could well object to this without admitting that he had not confidence in his own nominees; it could not be said either that it was invidious to the new occupants of the Bench, since their name and new positions were already known in their own localities, and such a list would have a good effect of an incentive to these new Magistrates to acquit themselves well, and to feel the responsibilities of their new position. He would now put a case before the House which showed how necessary local knowledge and trustworthy information was to prevent the occupants of the Woolsack from being deceived, and that they could not rely upon Chairman of Election Committees. He was not disposed to be very severe upon this dirty Election trick, as such often happened; but it became important when the person who perpetrated it was put upon the Bench. As he had given a local newspaper with full details to his noble and learned Friend upon the Woolsack, he need not give names of persons or places. Last July, just before the Election, a person in a borough got a leaflet printed, which contained a gross libel on the Conservative candidate for the division; and on the 4th November this person was put upon the Bench of the borough by the noble and learned Lord. Before that date, soon after the Election, and before the Long Vacation, the libelled candidate, who had become the Member for the division, discovered who had set the libel going, proceedings were taken against him in the High Court, with the result that this person wrote an abject letter of apology, and paid the costs. This occurrence gave rise to the fear that other persons, equally indiscreet and unfit for the Bench, might have found their way there; and the worst of it was that ignorant persons who knew little of the occupants of the Woolsack might wrongly imagine that this Magistrate had been put upon the Bench as a reward for his partisan services. On this account the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack surely had a solid grievance against the person or persons who recommended to him the appointment of this Magistrate, and who kept the noble and learned Lord in ignorance of the facts which would have prevented such a nomination.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSHELL): My Lords, I do not propose at this time of the evening to enter again upon the question of what considerations ought to guide the appointments of Justices, beyond saying that I entirely dissent from the idea that there is more reason for a Return of Magistrates appointed during the last six months than during any other term when anybody else was concerned in the appointments. With regard to the question on the Paper, a Return such as is asked for has been moved for in the House of Commons in continuance of a previous Return, and is now in course of preparation. I have no objection to that Return being laid on the Table of your Lordships' House. As to the case to which the noble Lord alluded, I must decline to take any action or accept as a foundation for action a paragraph in any newspaper. The appointment in question having been made, if there were anything in it sufficient to be dealt with, it would have to be considered upon any suggestion that the gentleman was unfit and ought to be removed. That, however, is not a matter for debate in this House. The removal of any name from the Commission is a matter to be dealt with judicially. I think the noble Lord has interpolated something into the statement in the newspaper. The gentleman referred to said that he was not the author of the libellous document referred to, and that when he handed it in to be printed he did not know the contents. The noble Lord has said that that was not believed; but that is only the statement of the noble Lord. What the gentleman had done, no doubt, might technically render him liable to an action in point of law, but it did not indicate any moral fault on his part. Those are all the facts I have before me, and upon them there seems to be not the slightest ground for interference.

QUESTIONS.

IRISH LAND PURCHASE RETURNS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the Returns required from the Land Commission under Section 33 of "The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891," which are prescribed to be made as soon as possible in April of each year, will be issued?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I understand that the Return is already at the Treasury, and that it will be presented in the prescribed manner in a few days.

THE INDIAN TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India with reference to his recent statement that the scheme adopted by the Government of India for classifying and grading the officers of the Indian Telegraph Department had been approved by the Secretary of State, whether the effect of the classification and grading now instituted by the Indian Government has been that contemplated by the scheme authorised by Lord Kimberley, and ordered by Lord Cross to be carried into effect in 1887; whether, when an officiating appointment occurs in the first grade of a class, it is filled up from the second grade, and if in that case the officer remains in the same class without any increase of pay for the higher work; whether he is aware, as stated in The Pioneer, that recently cases have occurred where every (telegraph) officer in the country in the second grade of a class has been officiating in the first grade for months together, bearing additional responsibility without receiving one rupee of extra pay; if so, whether there are other changes advantageous to officers which the Secretary of State has sanctioned to outweigh the loss sustained by the officers under this state of things, and what the alleged advantages are;

and whether it was intended by the Secretary of State that in Classes V. and VI. men should be drawing less pay now than they would have done under the old rules?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): Yes, Sir; but certain modifications were made in the original scheme by the Government of India with the sanction of Lord Cross. With regard to the second and third questions of the hon. Member, the answer is that officiating promotions from grade to grade have been abolished, though not from class to class. The officers concerned receive benefit from the special terms of retirement offered to increase the flow of promotion; and those in the four assistant superintendent grades receive personal allowances. The Secretary of State is not aware whether the statement quoted from The Pioneer is correct. The answer to the last question is, No, nor is the Secretary of State aware that any such cases have occurred.

THE OATH IN IRISH COURTS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. J. A. Smith, of Brookboro', County Fermanagh, after being sworn before Mr. Molony, R.M., at Newtown Butler on the 3rd inst., with uplifted hand, was asked whether he held that form of oath binding on his conscience; and if there is any legal warrant for asking members of the Presbyterian Church such a question?

*MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that the Resident Magistrate did make this inquiry, which I understand is not unusual in Courts of Justice in Ireland. There is, of course, no legal warrant for putting the question, and the Resident Magistrate's attention has been drawn to the matter.

THE IRISH EDUCATION ACT.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, owing to the passing of the Irish Education Act of last Session, a large number of clerks in the Education Department have been compelled to work overtime without any remuneration; and whether, seeing that a request for consideration has been met by a threat of dismissal, he will allow a further statement to be made to him on the matter?

*MR. J. MORLEY: The Commissioners of National Education regretted they had no funds at their disposal out of which to give extra remuneration for the additional work imposed upon their staff consequent on the introduction of the Act of 1892. The Commissioners are now preparing a scheme for submission to the Treasury which would enable them to award extra remuneration in certain emergencies. It is not true, I am informed, that any threat of dismissal was ever made to a clerk under the circumstances mentioned.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS IN IRELAND.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when he proposes to place upon the Notice Paper the clauses rendering the Registration of Electors Bill applicable to Ireland; and why, as in the case of Scotland, a separate Bill has not been introduced?

*MR. J. MORLEY: I can only say that ample notice will be given before the House is asked to consider the clauses. As to the last part of the question, I do not know of any reason except want of time.

DISTURBANCE AT CLOGHEEN.

MR. O'NEILL (Antrim, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that, on the night succeeding the passing of the Second Reading of the Home Rule Bill, a Nationalist band paraded the streets of Clogheen, County Tipperary, and stopped and played opposite the residence of Dr. Richard Walsh, a medical gentleman, who had not illuminated his windows, and that stones were thrown through the windows of that gentleman's house; and will he state what steps have been, or are being, taken by Her Majesty's Government to protect loyal citizens in that neighbourhood?

*MR. J. MORLEY: This account is a very highly-coloured narrative of what actually took place. I learn that one stone was thrown at Dr. Walsh's house, and broke one single pane of glass. No one has been made amenable, but the police are giving the matter their attention. I am informed that Dr. Walsh is himself a Nationalist.

THE COASTGUARD SERVICE.

MR. E. H. BAYLEY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is the total number of men employed in the Coastguard Service, the rate of wages, and the total annual cost; whether they could be advantageously employed in manning steam life and salvage boats for which they are qualified; and whether a percentage charged upon the salvage would fully cover the cost of the undertaking?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): The number of petty officers and seamen in the Coastguard Service provided for this year is 3,879; their wages and allowances vary from 2s. 11d. to 4s. 6d. a day, and the total amount of wages and allowances is £150,956 for the present year. It would be highly inconvenient to divert the Coastguard men from their regular duties for the purpose suggested. The saving of life and property from wrecks is already an important part of their duties.

THE LANCASHIRE CHANCERY COURT.

SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is aware that the accumulations of the Suitors' Fund in the Chancery Court of Lancashire amount to £130,000; and if the Government will consider the advisability of devoting such accumulations or part thereof to providing a better system of administration of justice in Lancashire?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The amount of the accumulations of the Suitors' Fee Fund will be found in the Return very recently presented to Parliament at the instance of the hon. and learned Member for Harrow. At the end of last year it was (as in that Return mentioned) £12,400 in India Three and a Half per Cents. and £127,558 11s. 5d. in New Consols. This accumulation belongs in right of Her Duchy and County Palatine to Her Majesty, who was pleased in 1876 to direct, by order, its appropriation to the exclusive use and purposes of the Chancery Court of the County Palatine. Owing to considerable reductions in the scale of fees and to other causes, the increase of the surplus has in recent years been comparatively slow; and if further modifications in favour of the suitors, which have been suggested, are carried out, the whole income of the fund will not, having regard to various contingencies, be more than sufficient to provide for the expenses of maintaining the Court in efficient working. I should be very glad to do anything coming within the scope of my office to promote a better system of administering justice in Lancashire, but do not think that this particular fund can be diverted from the Lancashire Chancery Court.

THE MONEY ORDER CLERKS AT COLDBATH FIELDS.

MR. GRAHAM (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there has been a large increase of sickness among the Money Order clerks since the removal of this branch of the Service from Aldersgate Street to the disused prison in Coldbath Fields; and whether the removal of this branch to Coldbath Fields, which was stated to be temporary four years ago, is now intended to be permanent; and, if not, when will it be removed from the disused prison of Coldbath Fields?

MR. HANBURY (Preston): At the same time, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the largely-increased amount of sickness among the Money Order Office clerks since their removal four years ago from St. Martin's-le-Grand to the old chapel in Coldbath Fields Prison; whether he will at once take steps to remedy the existing insanitary conditions there; and what was the Report of the independent sanitary expert who inspected this office in 1891?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): With reference to the Money Order Office at Mount Pleasant, I have given to this matter considerable attention. I have visited the office myself, as did both my predecessors, and I have received several Reports from the Medical Officer of the Department and also from the Office of Works. I have come to the conclusion that there is no real ground for regarding the premises as insanitary. The branch was transferred to Mount Pleasant four years ago, in 1889, and since that time the average sick absence has not been abnormal except during the last two years, when there has been an increase, similar to what has taken place in other branches, and which has been due to the epidemic of influenza. There was no Report of an independent sanitary expert in 1891. There was a Report by the Office of Works dated 13th November, 1891, in which it was stated that the sanitary arrangements were in good working order, and that there were no grounds for an independent examination of the premises. If either of the hon. Members can furnish me with evidence in support of their statements I will gladly examine them.

RAILWAY WHISTLES.

MR. GRAHAM: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the nuisance of railway whistles at night from the coal traffic on the London and North Western and Midland Railways in Camden and Kentish Town; whether he would endeavour to put a stop to the practice; and whether any accident has ever been reported as having taken place in consequence of the whistling having been temporarily suspended?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): The Board of Trade have no authority, and it would not be compatible with the necessities of railway working, to stop the practice of whistling on railways. I have communicated with the Railway Companies concerned, and I am assured there has been no unnecessary whistling. In the case of an accident at Finsbury Park, 10th February, 1886, Major Marindin, the inspecting officer, who reported on the circumstances, states that the "driver of one of the trains concerned in the collision had not, during the time he was standing waiting for the signal to start, sounded his whistle, and had it not been for an order to avoid any unnecessary whistling in consequence of complaints of the nuisance caused thereby he would have been greatly to blame for not doing so."

THE DELAGOA BAY RAILWAY.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any information about the progress of the Arbitration upon the claim of the Delagoa Bay Railway Company against the Portuguese Government for the forcible seizure of their property some three years ago?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The Arbitration is proceeding at Berne before the tribunal instituted for the purpose. At the request of the company, the Court of Arbitration recently granted them an extension of three months—namely, to June 30 next, for the presentation of their reply to the Portuguese counter case.

DISTURBANCE AT DOON.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, early upon the morning of Sunday, the 23rd March last, the house of Patrick Maguire, at Doon, Derrylin, in the County Fermanagh, was fired into by some persons armed with firearms; what is the alleged cause of this attack; and have any of the persons employed in it been apprehended?

MR. J. MORLEY: The outrage referred to was committed on the morning of the 24th April. One arrest has been made in connection with the occurrence, and, pending the hearing of the case, it would not be prudent to disclose the motive assigned for the crime.

TOBACCO DUTIES IN IRELAND.

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the annual sum received by the Customs Authorities in Ireland upon manufactured and unmanufactured tobacco?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): The net amounts of Customs Duties in each of the last two financial years are as follows:—March 31, 1892—manufactured, £1,418; unmanufactured, £1,437,340; 1893 — manufactured, £1,528; unmanufactured, £1,469,341.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman yet in possession of the actual figures of the receipts and expenditure in Ireland for the last financial year?

SIR W. HARCOURT : I am not ; but rapid progress is being made with the preparation of the Return.

STILL BIRTHS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state when the Return of "Still Births in England and other Countries," for which an Address was voted by the House of Commons on the 9th May last on the Motion of Viscount Grimston, will be issued to Members?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) : I understand that the delay in presenting this Return has arisen from the necessity of obtaining some of the information from foreign Governments ; but that it is now in the hands of the printers, and will shortly be presented.

HEALTH MATTERS IN ROSS-SHIRE.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been drawn to a report of the recent meeting of the Ross-shire County Council, by which it is shown that health matters in Ross-shire are in a deplorable condition ; and whether he will cause immediate inquiry to be made into the actual condition of things by other than a member of the Board of Supervision?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) : On inquiry I am informed by the County Council of Ross and Cromarty that they know of no such meeting or report as mentioned in the hon. Member's question. As to health matters being in a "deplorable condition," I am informed that the rate of mortality on the landward part of the Lewes is exceptionally low—under 16 per 1,000. I have a telegram from the Council to say that nothing has occurred which could give rise to the report.

MR. WEIR : Then I will let the right hon. Gentleman have further particulars.

Mr. Sexton

DISTRESS AT ULLAPOOL.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the fact that in and around Ullapool a large number of families are absolutely without seed oats and potatoes, and are unable to find employment at or near their homes, and have no means to go elsewhere in search of work, he will place at the disposal of the Scottish Office sufficient money to provide employment for these persons on public works, or re-consider his decision with regard to granting a subsidy for the construction of the Garve and Ullapool Railway, or make other provision to open up communication with this populous and inaccessible district?

SIR W. HARCOURT : I will ask the hon. Member to address these questions to my right hon. Friend the Secretary for Scotland.

MR. WEIR : I will do so, Sir.

SIR G. TREVELYAN : I am prepared to answer this at once ; £400 has recently been sanctioned for road making in the district of Loch Broom, in which Ullapool is situated. The Board of Supervision send in fortnightly Reports of the state of destitution in the Western Highlands and Islands, and none of them contain any allusion to distress at Ullapool. Under these circumstances, the Government does not consider it necessary to take any further measures. In any case, the question of whether or not a great subsidy should be given for the construction of a railway would have to be considered apart from the question of finding work to meet temporary distress.

THE THAMES CONSERVANCY BOARD.

MR. H. L. W. LAWSON (Gloucester, Cirencester) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that his Predecessor declared it advisable that there should be a Parliamentary inquiry into the composition, constitution, and powers of the Thames Conservancy Board ; whether he is aware that the London County Council is seeking representation on that Board under its General Powers Bill ; and if he will move for a Select Committee to consider the whole question?

MR. MUNDELLA : There is a Bill at present before Parliament promoted by the London County Council which proposes to give representation to the London County Council on the Conservancy Board. If that Bill is carried, I assume that the object will have been attained. I shall be quite prepared to consider the question of the appointment of a Select Committee if necessary.

BRITISH PICTURES AT THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to some letters by Mr. James Orrock in The Westminster Gazette, in which the increasing deterioration of the British pictures in the National Gallery, more especially those in which asphaltum has been freely used, is described; and whether, in order to counteract the dry heat which hastens this decay and causes the panel pictures to shrink, he can arrange some convenient process by which the air may be moistened by steam?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I am informed by the Director of the National Gallery that it is not correct to say that certain British pictures in the National Gallery show increased deterioration. He states that the evil effects of the use of asphaltum by Sir Joshua Reynolds and other painters of that period could not be averted by additional moisture in the atmosphere. As to the heating, the temperature of the rooms in winter is not allowed to exceed 56 deg. or 58 deg. Fahr. In the galleries containing the panel pictures of the old masters, the experiment of placing shallow water tanks over the hot-water pipes, in order to mitigate by evaporation any excess of dryness in the air, has long been tried. Although the late Dr. John Percy, after careful investigation of the hygrometric condition of the air, pronounced it to be normal, the use of the tanks has been continued, with other precautions.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN THE COLONIES.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will submit the Postal Convention of 1891 to the consideration of the Law Officers of the Crown, with a view to determining whether there is anything in its terms or provisions that would prohibit or prevent the adoption of a penny postage rate between the British Isles and the Australian Colonies?

MR. A. MORLEY: I do not think it is necessary to submit the Postal Union Convention of 1891 to the Law Officers of the Crown with the object named in the question. As I explained in the Debate on the 28th April, and as was stated by the Prime Minister on the same occasion, the main obstacle to the adoption of Imperial penny postage is to be found outside the Convention itself—in the covenant entered into by all the members of the Union with the Australasian Colonies as to the conditions on which the latter should enter the Union.

MR. LAWSON: May I ask if it is true that Germany is at present arranging a postage at about 1½d. to her Colonies?

MR. A. MORLEY: I have no information as to that.

INCOME TAX STATISTICS.

MR. LOGAN (Leicestershire, Harborough): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to Table 14 of the Statistical Abstract for the United Kingdom for 1892, compiled by the Commercial Department of the Board of Trade, in which, while the income from land subject to Income Tax is stated to have decreased in England and Wales to the amount of £10,432,645, and in Scotland to the amount of £1,314,854, between the years 1877 and 1891 inclusive, the income from land subject to Income Tax in Ireland has increased by £3,687 during the same period; and whether he can state the class of land to which this increase is due, and say in which portion of Ireland it is situated?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue are endeavouring to procure this information; but, as they have had to issue circulars to various officers in Ireland, there has not been time to collate the replies. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would put down the question for Monday week.

POLICE COURT BAIL.

MR. CAINE (Bradford, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the present method of testing the bona fides of persons offering themselves for bail at the North London Police Court, as disclosed before Mr. Justice Mathew in the case of Richard Hall, he will take steps to insure the adoption of such procedure in all Police Courts and police stations as will prevent any such mistake as was disclosed in the case of Richard Hall ; whether he is now aware that Richard Hall, although protesting that he had been personated by some person unknown and was being wrongfully imprisoned, was nevertheless imprisoned without any opportunity being given to him of proving the truth of his story before any Court or Judge ; and whether, in view of the fact that Richard Hall was wrongfully imprisoned as a Crown debtor from the 15th March, 1893, to the 21st April, 1893, any compensation will be given to Richard Hall ?

MR. ASQUITH : From the inquiries which I have made, it appears that the case of Hall is unique, no similar instance being known to have occurred of a mistake in the identification of bail. This appears to show that the existing practice has worked satisfactorily, but the case of Hall undoubtedly shows a possibility of abuse which ought to be guarded against, and I am considering the best means to be adopted for the purpose. Since notice was given of the question, I have received a Memorial from Hall's solicitors, accompanied by affidavits in which all the circumstances are gone into and a claim for compensation is set up. The matter requires and will receive careful examination, and I am not yet in a position to give a final reply.

FREE EDUCATION AT PIMLICO.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has received a large Petition from Pimlico calling his attention to the want of free school places in that neighbourhood, and asking that they may be supplied ; and whether he can state what action has been taken on the Petition ?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) : The Department has received a Memorial signed by about 600 persons calling attention to the want of free school places in Pimlico, which was referred to the School Board for London on March 11 with a request for full particulars as to the accommodation available for this district. After more than five weeks had elapsed the Department wrote to the Board pressing for an early reply ; they stated in answer that their School Accommodation Committee were collecting particulars which would be laid before the committee at an early day, and thereafter reported to the Board. More than a fortnight has elapsed since, but the Board's Report to the Department has not yet been received.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) : Are we to understand that the determination of this question rests solely with the School Board ?

MR. ACLAND : It is the duty of the Board to provide a sufficient number of free places, and before that can be done the Board must have the Report of the Committee. I very much regret the delay that has taken place.

THE TROOPS AT HULL.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (West Ham, S.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a resolution passed by a numerously attended public meeting of the inhabitants of Hull requesting the Government to withdraw the troops ; and whether he will comply with the request ; and, if not, whether he will cause an independent inquiry to be made as to the reasons for the continued presence of the soldiers and gunboats ?

MR. ASQUITH : No such resolution as that referred to by the hon. Member has been received at the Home Office from any meeting of inhabitants at Hull ; but as I have already informed the House on more than one occasion, so long as the Local Authorities are of opinion, and I see no sufficient reason to differ from them, that the presence of the forces is necessary for the maintenance of order, they will not be withdrawn. There has been no collision of any kind between the forces and the people, and I am satisfied from the reports which reach me daily that their presence has been attended with beneficial results.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST CHOLERA.

MR. HARRY FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that Dr. Copeman recently paid a visit to Lowestoft as a representative of the Local Government Board, in order to instruct or advise the Port Sanitary Authorities as to the steps to be taken by them for providing against the importation of cholera; that he advised a large expenditure in fresh sanitary arrangements, the purchase of a steam launch, and the increase of the salary of the medical officer and his staff; and, on being pressed by members of the Town Council as to how the expense was to be met, replied that the Local Government Board would not contribute a farthing towards the cost unless the recommendations were carried out in their entirety; what office Dr. Copeman holds in connection with the Local Government Board; whether Dr. Copeman has made similar statements to other Port Sanitary Authorities in the Kingdom; and what course he proposes to take to secure to the Lowestoft Port Sanitary Authorities repayment of the money spent by them on the representations of an officer of the Board?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): Dr. Copeman, who is one of the Medical Inspectors of the Local Government Board, visited Lowestoft in March last for the purpose of advising the Port Sanitary Authority as to the steps which it was desirable to take with a view to providing against an importation of cholera. He made certain recommendations to the Port Sanitary Authority with regard to the maintenance of precautions which he already found in operation to some modifications that were, in his opinion, desirable, and to certain additional inspection of vessels which might have to be put into operation if need should arise. The arrangements actually in operation at the date of his visit were held by him to be in the main satisfactory, and he had, therefore, no occasion to advise a large expense in further arrangements. He did not urge the purchase of a steam launch, but suggested some arrangements with owners of steam tugs plying in the harbour. Neither did he recommend an increase of the salary of the Medical Officer of Health of the port. Being pressed on the question of a subvention from Imperial funds, he stated that at that date no decision had been arrived at as to the applications which had been made to the Government on the subject. At the same time, he expressed the opinion that any such contribution, if made, would only be granted subject to the conditions being fulfilled which are necessary to the carrying out of the Cholera Regulations. Dr. Copeman has, in answer to similar questions, made a similar statement in one or two other port districts. The Local Government Board are not aware that the Port Sanitary Authority of Lowestoft have incurred any expenses beyond those for carrying out their duties under the Regulations.

MR. BALFOUR'S VISIT TO DUBLIN.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can say if 16 cases of persons injured during the visit to Dublin of the right hon. Member for East Manchester were treated in Mercer's Hospital; and how many of them were respectively Unionists and Nationalists? At the same time, I beg to apologise to you, Mr. Speaker, for having attempted, the other day, to put this in an irregular way.

MR. J. MORLEY: There were, I understand, more than the usual number of persons treated at the hospital referred to for injuries which were inflicted subsequently to the meeting, but, happily, none of the injuries were of a serious nature. The police have no knowledge of the politics of the injured persons. Patients are not classified on political principles.

MR. W. JOHNSTON: May I ask is the right hon. Gentleman aware that 15 out of the 16 were, as a fact, Unionists?

MR. J. MORLEY: No, Sir.

FOREIGN POSTAL RATES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether is aware that the United States Government has established a two cent. letter postage rate from New York to Alaska, crossing Canadian territory; and that Germany has established 10 pfennig letter postage from Germany to her settlements on the African coast; and under what clauses of the Postal Union Conventions these rates have been established?

MR. A. MORLEY: I am aware that there is an Agreement between the United States and Canada whereby the inland rates of each country are applicable to correspondence passing into the other country. The Governments concerned did not consult the other parties to the Union on the subject, and probably relied upon the 2nd clause of Article 21 of the Vienna Convention, which recognises the right of the parties to maintain and conclude Treaties, and to maintain and establish more restricted Unions, with a view to the improvement of postal relations. I have no information as regards the alleged rates between Germany and her African Colonies.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, at the Postal Union Conference at Vienna in 1891, liberty was conceded to this country to establish a postal rate to the British Colonies of 1½d. per letter; if not, what concession in this direction or freedom of action was obtained?

MR. A. MORLEY: The reply to the first part of the question is in the negative. To the second part I have to say nothing in the nature of a concession in the direction indicated, or freedom of action was or could be obtained in the face of the covenant agreed to by this country, and all the other members of the Union fully explained to the House on the 28th April as to the conditions on which the Australasian Colonies entered into the Union.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his Predecessor declared that greater freedom of action was obtained on the occasion of the Vienna Convention, and will he say what was meant by that?

MR. A. MORLEY: I was not aware that my right hon. Friend did make that statement. I should be glad if the hon. Member will send me the reference.

Mr. Henniker Heaton

HAULBOWLINE DOCKYARD,

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether H.M.S. Triumph, the present guardship at Queenstown, is about to be removed; and whether, in view of the dearth of employment at present existing in Cork Harbour, the overhauling and repairs which she requires will be carried out at Haulbowline previous to her departure?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: There is no idea of discontinuing a guardship at Queenstown, but the selection of any probable vessel for this duty will depend on the requirements of the Service. Arrangements have been made for undertaking such repairs to the Triumph at Haulbowline as can be conveniently carried out there.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT FOR SOLDIERS.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Committee sitting at the Treasury upon the employment of soldiers by the Departments of Government has yet reported; and what Departments have as yet offered places preferentially to soldiers?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Committee is, as I have before stated, not a Committee upon the employment of soldiers, but a Committee on the subject of messengers in Public Departments. The Committee presented its Report to the Treasury yesterday, but there has, of course, not yet been time to consider it. The two Departments which employ the largest number of messengers—namely, the War Office and Admiralty—have, the former since 1879 and the latter since 1881, filled vacancies in these posts exclusively by men who have served in the Army or Navy (including the Marines).

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay Papers on the Table if I move for them?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I will consider that.

LODGERS' LETTERS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there is any objection to a person changing his lodgings, notifying the Post Office of the change, and having his letters officially re-directed to the new lodgings, as in the case of householders?

MR. A. MORLEY: The movements of that part of the population which inhabits lodgings are somewhat eccentric, and the Post Office would find it onerous and almost impossible to be continually tracing these migratory lodgers even if a notification is supplied. In most cases no difficulty occurs now that re-direction of letters is free, and the Department has gone far to meet the convenience of these persons who make private arrangements to get their letters forwarded. Without making any strict rule, the Department will do its best to oblige lodgers where application is made.

COMPENSATION FOR POST OFFICE DELAYS.

MR. W. F. D. SMITH (Strand, Westminster): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that a parcel posted by Messrs. Minister to Mr. E. Stovel at Toronto, on the 8th April was, after some delay, returned to the senders because it was said to be insufficiently stamped, although stamped in compliance with the directions given in the current Post Office Guide; and whether, under these circumstances, compensation for the loss incurred by Messrs. Minister will be given, and in future care be taken that the directions in the Post Office Guide shall coincide with those given to local postmasters?

MR. A. MORLEY: It is the case that the parcel referred to was returned in the circumstances stated; and the postage prepaid on the parcel has since been refunded to Messrs. Minister & Company. The law does not impose on the Post Office the payment of consequential damages in such a case; nor have I any funds available for the purpose, and I regret that I cannot, therefore, compensate Messrs. Minister & Company. The mistake arose from the fact that unforeseen delay occurred in carrying out a reduction of the rate which, when the Post Office Guide was sent to press, was expected to come into force by the date of publication.

REVOLVERS AT HULL.

MR. THOMAS ROBINSON (Gloucester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has seen the statement made in the Sunday Chronicle of 30th April, to the effect that a large number of the men engaged at Hull are armed with revolvers and life preservers, in proof of which it is said the local gunsmiths have cleared out their stock of these articles several times during the present strike; and whether these persons have taken a licence to permit them to carry firearms; and, if not, what steps he intends to take in the matter?

MR. ASQUITH: I am informed by the Chief Constable of Hull that it is the fact that there has recently been a considerable increase in the sale to the inhabitants of revolvers and life preservers. The Chief Constable is not aware, and has not the means of ascertaining, whether the purchasers have taken out or possess the necessary licences. It is a matter for the officers of the Inland Revenue, who will no doubt see that the provisions of the law as to licences are enforced.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): May I ask whether, in case the Government are unwilling to protect the peaceable inhabitants of Hull, they are not right in doing their best to protect themselves?

[No answer was given.]

INDIAN HOSPITAL STAFF ALLOWANCES.

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he will lay before the House a Despatch signed by General Wilson, then Military Member of the Council of the Governor General of India, sent to the Secretary of State for India about the year 1880 or 1881, recommending the grant of the staff allowance for medical officers in charge of hospitals of Her Majesty's troops in India, with the reply thereto of the Secretary of State for India; and also the Memorials of the brigade surgeons in India to the Secretary of State for India in 1886, asking to have extra pay given on account of the onerous duties they had to perform, with the reply of the Secretary of State thereto?

MR. G. RUSSELL: The question of the pay of the Medical Staff in India is now under the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council, and it would not be desirable to present the Papers relating to this subject in an incomplete state.

REGULATIONS AS TO PETITIONS.

MR. FELL PEASE (York, N.R., Cleveland): I beg to ask the Chairman of the Public Petitions Committee if it is in Order for one individual to sign two or more Petitions on the same subject as a member of different Societies or Bodies in one locality; whether if a person signs any Petition as an individual he is at liberty to sign a Petition upon the same subject as chairman of a meeting or company; and in the event of these being answered in the negative, can any steps be taken to prevent the practice of signing duplicate Petitions?

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE (Mr. M'LAGAN, Linlithgow): It is not in Order for one individual to sign two or more Petitions on the same subject as a member of different Societies or Bodies in one locality; but if a person signs any Petition as an individual he is at liberty to sign a Petition upon the same subject as chairman of a meeting or company. Duplicate Petitions are returned to the hon. Member who presents them accompanied generally by a note indicating the particular Rule transgressed. A copy of the Rules on the subject is sent every Session to each Member for his own use and for distribution in his constituencies.

DISTURBANCES AT CLONMEL.

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a large mob paraded the town of Clonmel on the night of Saturday, the 22nd March, and stoned the houses of Protestants who had not illuminated their windows in honour of the Second Reading of the Government of Ireland Bill; has any person been apprehended; and will the Irish Government take steps to prevent a recurrence of such a state of things?

MR. J. MORLEY: The account is decidedly exaggerated. Stones were thrown on the 22nd April at the windows of the house of one person only, breaking three panes of glass. There were many other houses not illuminated, but this was the only one that suffered any damage. No one has been made amenable.

Mr. G. Russell

BOYCOTTING IN FERMANAGH.

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the wife of a man named Peter Corrigan, living near Belcoo, in County Fermanagh, is being boycotted for the taking by her husband of an evicted farm; that she has been persistently boycotted in the Blacklion market, and butter and egg merchants warned against purchasing from her; and that she was assaulted at Belcoo on the 22nd March by a man named M'Grory, and pursued by two men with blackened faces on the Ora Mountain on the 5th April, who threatened her life unless her husband gave up the land; and has any action been taken by the police authorities towards affording her protection and prosecuting her assailants?

MR. J. MORLEY: There appear, I regret to say, to be grounds for the statements in the question. Prosecutions for assault and boycotting have been ordered, and will be heard at Petty Sessions on the 19th instant.

THE ENGLISH AND WELSH COUNTY MAGISTRACY.

MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of County Justices in England and Wales; if he can state the average number appointed every year; the number of the Lord Lieutenants who at present appoint; how many of these Lord Lieutenants were appointed by Liberal and how many by Conservative Governments; and whether there are any recent instances of appointments of County Justices by the Lord Chancellor without the intervention of a Lord Lieutenant; if the present Lord Chancellor is correctly reported to have told a deputation that he was ready to assume the direct appointment of all the County Justices on the passing of such a Resolution as now stands on the Paper for the 5th May; whether he intends, in that event, to deprive the Lords Lieutenant of their present right to recommend for the Commission of the Peace; and whether the Lord Chancellor, in deciding to act on such Resolution in England and Wales, intends to have any regard to the constitution of the majority by which it may be carried?

MR. ASQUITH : The total number of County Justices will appear from the Return promised by the Home Office. Until the Return is presented, the figures cannot be given. The average number appointed every year can be ascertained from the same Return. The number of Lords Lieutenant is 60 — 24 were appointed by Liberal Governments, and 36 by Conservative Governments. There are no records kept which would show whether there have been recent instances of appointments of County Justices without the intervention of the Lord Lieutenant. What the Lord Chancellor intimated was that, if a Resolution were passed by the House of Commons, indicating that he ought not to confine himself to the recommendations of the Lords Lieutenant only in considering what appointments ought to be made to the Bench, he should pay regard to such Resolution. The answer to the last part of the question is "No."

MR. H. HOBHOUSE : Can the right hon. Gentleman, before the Debate comes on on Friday, give an approximation of the numbers asked for?

MR. ASQUITH : No, Sir; I am in no better position than anyone else.

MR. J. E. ELLIS : Can the right hon. Gentleman tell when the Return will be presented?

MR. ASQUITH : I am not able to do so.

COMMUNICATION IN THE ISLAND OF LEWIS.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the development of the fish traffic between Ireland and Holyhead since the recent construction of light railways in the West of Ireland, steps will be taken to provide light railway, or road tram communication, in the Island of Lewis for the purpose of opening out the fishing industry around the island, and placing the food supplies obtainable there within reach of the southern markets?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : I will answer this question. A new fishing harbour is now being constructed on the West Coast of Lewis, and a road is being made from there across the island capable of carrying rails should they be required. At present it would be premature to lay a railway, or until it is seen what impetus is given to the trade by the new harbour and road.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS AND CONTRACTS.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it has been reported to the Local Government Board that the Vice Chairman of the Swinford Board of Guardians is interested in the contract for the supply of meat to the workhouse; and what steps has the Local Government Board taken in the matter?

MR. J. MORLEY : A complaint on this subject has been made to the Local Government Board, who have been informed by the Vice Chairman that he is neither directly nor indirectly concerned with the meat contract; that his mother is the contractor, and that he receives no profits out of her contracts. The propriety of making further inquiry into the facts is now under the consideration of the Local Government Board.

THE RE-INSTATEMENT OF EVICTED TENANTS IN IRELAND.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the undertaking given by Her Majesty's Government to support a Bill for the re-instatement of evicted tenants in Ireland, he will inform the House whether the Government propose to give facilities for the passage of the Bill of the hon. Member for North Leitrim during the present Session of Parliament?

MR. J. MORLEY : I think it very desirable that an opportunity should be found for continuing the discussion upon this Bill; but I am not able to say when we can take it up again until we have further advanced with some of the more important Public Business.

THE MASHONALAND DEVELOPMENT (WILLOUGHBY'S) COMPANY.

MR. LABOUCHERE : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to an advertisement in the public Press of the prospectus of the Mashonaland Development (Willoughby's) Company, in which it is stated that the promoter of the company has obtained from the British South Africa Chartered Company a concession of 600,000 acres of land in any part of Mashonaland, outside a radius of three miles of any proclaimed goldfield or established township; whether the entire land of Mashonaland belongs to the Chartered South Africa Company; if so, from whom possession has been obtained; whether the vendor himself was the owner of the entire land of Mashonaland, and had a right to sell it irrespective of the assent of its inhabitants; whether this assent was obtained, and, if so, how and when; and whether such sale has been sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, whether any investigation of the title of the vendor took place, and any stipulations were made with regard to the native population?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I have seen the advertisement referred to in the first paragraph of the question. The British South Africa Company are assignees for value during a term which has 98½ years to run, of the rights of Lo Bengula to grant and lease farms, grazing grounds, and town areas, in Mashonaland, and to hold for their own benefit the rents and other profits arising from such grants. The company acquired these rights from one Edward Amandus Lippert, to whom Lo Bengula had granted them. If by "vendor" in the third paragraph of the question Lo Bengula is meant, the answer is that Lo Bengula has control, as paramount Chief, though he probably has not the sole ownership, of the lands of Mashonaland. The assent of the Mashonas was not necessary to validate the concession, as it covered only that which Lo Bengula had a right to grant. The Lippert concession and its transfer to the British South Africa Company were approved by Her Majesty's late Government. No investigation of the title of the vendor (Lo Bengula) took place on that occasion, and no stipulations were then made with regard to the native population; but Her Majesty's Government had already considered the position and claims of Lo Bengula in the Mashona country, and the right of natives in the company's field of operations had been safeguarded by Article 14 of the Charter granted to the company in October, 1889.

Mr. Labouchere

The whole Lippert concession appears to be understood by the Chartered Company as referring to unoccupied lands. I may add that the Directors assure the Colonial Office that they have no intention of interfering with native occupation in this sparsely-populated country, and that their local administrator, Dr. Jamieson, will be careful not to sanction the selection by Sir John Willoughby's Company of any blocks of land, the acquisition of which would be inconsistent with native rights under the company's Charter.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Is there no one connected with the Colonial Office on the spot to see that the Directors of the company keep their engagements?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: We have no administration in Mashonaland, and no right to exercise jurisdiction.

INCOME TAX—"SCHEDULE B."

MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what sum was collected under Schedule B of the Income Tax in the year 1892-3; and how much that Schedule is estimated to yield in 1893-4 at the proposed increased rate?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The amount for 1892-3 is £218,000. It is impossible to give the estimate for the coming year 1893-4, because it is as yet uncertain how much of that amount will remain in Schedule B or be transferred to Schedule D.

RAILWAY RATES IN THE NUNEATON DISTRICT.

MR. NEWDIGATE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can now state whether, in spite of the Railway Companies' statement that they were revising their rates so that the increase should in no case exceed 5 per cent., the rates on bricks sent out from the Nuneaton district show an average increase of 12½ per cent?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Papers submitted to me show that increases of rates are complained of, but, on the other hand, they show decreases in some of the rates for bricks charged in the Nuneaton district. I understand that the Railway Companies' Association propose to receive a deputation of brickmakers in order to discuss these complaints, and I hope a satisfactory arrangement may be arrived at.

SURGEON MAJOR GENERALS WADE AND PATERSON.

DR. MACGREGOR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will state the relative amount of foreign service performed by Surgeon Major General Wade and Surgeon Major General Paterson up to that date respectively; and whether he will state if Surgeon Major General Paterson will be permitted to return to England when he shall have completed a total of five years abroad, or whether he is to be considered as now entering on a fresh tour of foreign service in his present rank?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): Surgeon Major General Wade has had 24 years and eight months foreign service, and Surgeon Major Paterson 23 years and three months. The last-named officer will be relieved at Malta on completing five years from the time he embarked for duty at Hong Kong.

THE STAMP DUTY.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in the proposed abolition of exemption from Stamp Duty, it is intended to include the printed stamp of banking houses which is invariably affixed to bills of exchange before presentation, for the sole purpose of indicating the channel through which they have passed?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The proposed Stamp Duties do not apply to the documents to which the right hon. Gentleman's question refers.

COMPULSORY RETIREMENT FROM THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the 10th Clause of the Order in Council of 15th August, 1890, which makes retirement from the Public Service obligatory for every officer on attaining 65 years of age, but leaves power to the Treasury, at the instance of a Department, to extend an officer's employment for a further period in no case exceeding five years, whether the Comptroller and Auditor General has construed this Order as applying to all Departments of the Public Service, and endeavoured to enforce its observance upon them; and whether the accounting officers of eight Departments—namely, the Diplomatic and Consular Service, the House of Lords, the House of Commons, the Supreme Court of Judicature (England), the Courts of Session and Justiciary (Scotland), the Crown Solicitor's and Sessional Crown Solicitors' (Ireland), the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland), and the Dublin Metropolitan Police Magistrates have one and all refused to send in any age Returns on the ground that the Order in Council does not apply to them?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The answer to the first question is in the affirmative. It is also the fact that age Returns have not been received from the Departments referred to in the second paragraph. The whole subject will very shortly be dealt with by the Public Accounts Committee.

SMOKELESS POWDER.

MR. CUST (Lincolnshire, Stamford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any official of the War Office ever publicly and authoritatively stated the standard of velocity and pressure required in any smokeless powder; and whether he will inform the House what standard is required for the Government 303 magazine rifle?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not aware of any standard having been laid down as generally applicable; but, in 1890, in a programme for experiments with smokeless powders certain conditions as to muzzle velocity and pressure were fixed. The standard now required for the .303 in. magazine rifle is a muzzle velocity of 2,000 foot-seconds, with a variation not exceeding 40, more or less, and a mean pressure of 15 tons on the square inch, not exceeding 16 tons in any one round.

A NORWEGIAN ANALOGY TO IRISH HOME RULE.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg leave to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if any Reports have been received from Her Majesty's Representatives in Sweden and Norway concerning the differences which are reported to have arisen between the two Parliaments and two Governments of that United Kingdom by reason of the efforts of Norway to achieve a greater measure of independence; and, in such case, if they can be communicated to Parliament for consideration in connection with the Irish Government Bill?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): Such Reports as those to which the hon. Member refers have been received. There are two objections to producing them. In the first place, they are of a confidential character; and, in the second place, they refer to actions which are only proceeding and have not yet reached any termination. If the matter were under our own control, the time would not have arrived for communicating the documents to Parliament.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not a fact that strenuous efforts have been made by Norway for the establishment of separate Consular representation for that country abroad; and whether a deadlock has not ensued in consequence with Sweden? As the right hon. Gentleman so frequently refers to the example of Sweden and Norway—

MR. SEXTON: I rise to Order. Is this kind of political argument to be put by way of question?

MR. SPEAKER: As Notice has not been given of this supplementary question, perhaps it had better be put on the Paper.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I can say now in answer to the question everything which I could say if Notice were given. As to the argumentative part of the question, I decline to admit that there is any force or weight in it at all. It is not my direct duty to give an account of the state of affairs in Sweden and Norway; but it is the fact that there is a great controversy going on between Sweden and Norway; and the immediate subject of it is the appointment of Consuls on account of Norway and by Norwegian authority. We must all hope that the difficulties in which a friendly Power finds itself will reach a favourable solution; and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman joins in that fervent hope, notwithstanding any argument which he may think he will derive from those difficulties.

Colonel Howard Vincent

MR. JOHNSTON: Will the Prime Minister postpone the Home Rule Bill until the controversy in Norway is settled?

INDIAN FINANCE.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, considering the grave question of Indian finance, he will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the expenditure in this country which is charged to the Revenues of India?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: There is no objection to the inquiry proposed, except that we are of opinion that the time has not yet come when the idea of such an inquiry could be properly entertained. We are still waiting for the Report of the Committee which is sitting upon the subject of Indian Currency, and until that Report is in our hands it would not be advisable to take any other steps.

MR. MACFARLANE: I am afraid I did not make my question quite clear. I only intended to suggest an inquiry into the question of whether the home charges on India are excessive or not.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I perfectly understand my hon. Friend's question. It relates, not to Indian finance in general, but to the question of home charges. That is a subject referred to the Committee for examination: and until that Committee, which is now sitting, has been enabled to arrive at a conclusion, there would be no advantage in making other inquiries.

THE EQUALISATION OF LONDON RATES.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government, having brought in a Bill to equalise London rates in order to carry out the unanimous Resolution passed by the House on 24th February, propose to adopt a similar course with reference to the almost unanimous Resolution passed on 21st March in favour of reducing the excessive length of the hours of labour in shops?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have nothing to add on this subject to the answer which was given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. He acknowledged the force and weight of the Resolution unanimously passed by the House of Commons, to which, I think, the Government was a party. But he also stated that it was not in our power, at the present time, to make any addition to the engagements which we have already entered into for the purpose of bringing in a Bill on this subject of shop hours.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Are we to understand that this social legislation, which so materially affects so large a number of people in the United Kingdom, is to be postponed until the Irish Home Rule Question is finally disposed of?

THE TWELVE O'CLOCK RULE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he still proposes to put down a Resolution to-morrow for the suspension of the Twelve o'Clock Rule. I wish to ask him whether he does not think that there is considerable inconvenience in abolishing that Rule except for the purpose of finishing a great Debate or under very exceptional circumstances? I would further ask him whether he does not think it possible that all the advantage gained by the abolition of the Twelve o'Clock Rule cannot be gained equally by shortening the length of the speeches to be made? I would undertake on my own behalf—for I suppose I should have to say something on behalf of some of my hon. Friends near me—that, if the Twelve o'Clock Rule is not suspended to-morrow, I would compress such observations as I have to make into not more than 20 minutes. If that example were followed there would be time for nine speakers between 9 and 10, and that would be adequate.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I feel the force of what the right hon. Gentleman has said, and I likewise feel that there ought not to be a deviation from the usual course except as suggested by the right hon. Gentleman—that is, the suspension of the Twelve o'Clock Rule should only be used for the purpose of bringing a great and extended Debate to a conclusion. Further, there should not be any deviation from the usual course when there is any serious inconvenience involved. Particularly am I encouraged to act on that principle since the right hon. Gentleman has undertaken to set a good example to-morrow night by keeping his speech within certain bounds; but in mentioning those bounds the right hon. Gentleman probably stated the maximum and not the minimum. Under those circumstances, as I made my original announcement contingent, I think it would be wiser that I should not make the Motion, in the hope, of course, that the House may be enabled to arrive at a definite conclusion on the subject under discussion.

THE HULL DOCK STRIKE.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: I wish to ask the Home Secretary a question of which I have given him private Notice. Has the right hon. Gentleman's attention been called to the action of the police at Hull, and its effect on picketing; and will he instruct the police not to interfere with the pickets so long as they keep within the law?

MR. ASQUITH: As I only had the Notice on coming into the House, I have had no opportunity of inquiring into the allegations of the hon. Member, but I will see that inquiry is made. It is well known, by the police as well as by all persons concerned, that picketing is perfectly legal as long as it is conducted in an orderly manner and without violence.

THE EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister a question of which I have given him private Notice—namely, whether, in answer to a question, he stated, according to the report of his speech in The Times and The Daily News of the 3rd of May, that the Employers' Liability Bill would be taken on Thursday or Friday, and whether he did not, in answer to a further question, state that it would be taken as the first Order before Supply, and whether he is aware that many hon. Members who desired to take part in the Debate upon the question that the measure be referred to the Standing Committee on Law left the House, under the belief that the subject was not to be taken until Thursday, and that, in spite of this understanding, the Home Secretary, at a few minutes before 12 o'clock at night on Tuesday, obtained the decision of the House, and what steps he proposes to take under these circumstances in order to prevent what appeared to be a breach of faith with this House?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I thank my right hon. Friend for his courtesy in reference to this matter, and likewise for his assurance that the corpus of the matter in dispute was a very limited one, and that a renewed discussion upon this matter would only occupy a very few minutes. That being so, I should be very sorry to spend more than a very few minutes in making known my intentions with regard to this subject. My recollection of the matter is clear, and is in perfect conformity with that of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. After I had answered a question as to Supply, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer reminded me of the Employers' Liability Bill, and what I intended to convey to the House was that if that matter which was not likely to occupy any appreciable amount of time were not taken before it would be put down as the first Order on Thursday, I never intended to renounce the right to take it before if we could. As, however, there appears to have been some misunderstanding in reference to the subject, I am prepared, with the general concurrence of the House, to move to rescind the decision which the House arrived at on Tuesday evening, and to put the subject down again for discussion to-morrow.

Ordered, That the Proceedings upon Tuesday, 2nd May, on the Motion for Committing the Employers' Liability Bill to the Standing Committee on Law, &c., be rescinded.

Ordered, That the Adjourned Debate on the said Motion be resumed To-morrow, at Two of the Clock.—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

ULSTER AND HOME RULE.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I rise to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister a question of which I have given him private Notice. The right hon. Gentleman, in a speech which he made yesterday, said—

"It singularly happens that in 1886, in proposing the Irish Government Bill, we did face this very question, and we did state that if the inhabitants of the North-East corner of Ireland, forming a very small and limited portion indeed of the general community, were resolutely desirous of being exempted from the operation of that Act, we should be prepared to entertain a proposal to that effect, and I believe we made that declaration with the general concurrence of those who are termed the Nationalist Party."

I now desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman to refer me to any authority for that statement. In the second place, I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, seeing that Mr. Parnell, who was then the Leader of the Irish Party, repeatedly said that Ireland could not spare the services of one single Irishman, upon what basis the right hon. Gentleman has stated that the proposal to which he referred met with the general concurrence of the Irish Party.

MR. SEXTON: I rise to Order. I desire to ask whether this complicated argument of the hon. Member is a matter which can be dealt with in the form of a question?

MR. SPEAKER: I have not seen or heard the question before. I think that the hon. Member should have compressed his question into narrower limits, and should have confined it to asking the right hon. Gentleman upon what grounds he based his statement.

MR. SEXTON: Then, Mr. Speaker, will you request the hon. Member to submit the question for your approval?

*MR. SPEAKER: I gather that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister is prepared to answer the question now.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am quite prepared to answer the question. I will give the hon. Member two references. The first and main reference is Hansard, vol. 370, pp. 1,053 and 1,054, in which my statement of 1886 is contained; and, secondly, to vol. 372, pp. 1,219 and 1,220, where a passage is given in which I stated that we had never receded from that original statement. Then the hon. Member asked me what authority I had for saying that that proposal was received with general concurrence by the Irish Nationalists. I rather think that what I said was "concurrence or acquiescence," because I thought at the time that "concurrence" was a rather strong expression.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I quoted from the report of the right hon. Gentleman's statement in The Times.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am pretty certain that I used the words "concurrence or acquiescence." My impression was that the Irish Party did acquiesce in the adoption of even so extreme a proposal, provided by means of it they could open a road to peace in their country. What I understood Mr. Parnell's language to mean was an earnest deprecation of such a proposal, speaking in the same spirit by which O'Connell was always governed in his great desire to see that Ireland should move in unison. I most cordially concur in the statement that Mr. Parnell would not be opposed to such a proceeding, provided it were found that it offered concord to Ireland instead of the present painful disagreement.

MOTION.

SHIPPING FEDERATION.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON, Member for Middlesbrough, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, viz., "the contravention of certain Acts of Parliament by an organisation named the Shipping Federation, Limited, and the supplying of the Forces of the Crown on the occasion of Labour Disputes;" but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. Speaker called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen:—

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON said, the Shipping Federation was founded some two or three years ago. He was not sure whether it was a legal Association. He was sure that since its foundation it had acted in a most illegal manner in its relations with trade organisations. They were told at the beginning by the Executive Committee of the Federation that it was not founded for the purpose of interfering with Trades Unionism; that it was to protect the shipowners generally throughout the country from aggressive action on the part of organisations of workmen; but that there was no intention to deny the right of existence to those organisations, or to interfere with the wages of the workmen. They said that their sole object was to secure freedom of contract on the part of the workmen, and to protect the workmen from themselves. The first thing that the Federation did when it commenced active operations was to engage professional libellers—men whose business it was to travel from place to place libelling the leaders of Trades Unions. When those leaders took action to defend themselves, the funds of the Shipping Federation were placed at the disposal of these agents to meet the action brought against them. The second act of the Federation was to pay numbers of men to join workmen's organisations for the purpose of creating dissension in the ranks of those who belonged to them—in order to make the public believe that the workmen themselves were not all agreed on particular points. In his (Mr. Wilson's) evidence before the Royal Commission on Labour, he placed ample proof before the Commission that the Shipping Federation—this body of capitalists who had no intention of interfering with workmen's Trades Unions—did employ men for the purpose he had indicated. More than that, in 1891, when they had the first great dispute with the Shipping Federation, the Federation employed men in Cardiff to concoct false evidence. Men were paid to go into the witness box at his (Mr. Wilson's) trial in Cardiff and swear falsely to get him convicted. The case which was brought before the Court at Cardiff was not a Shipping Federation case. He was charged by certain boarding masters in that town with taking men from their boarding houses and inciting those men to riot and unlawful assembly. Very strange it was that the Shipping Federation should place their funds at the disposal of the prosecution in order to get him convicted—though he did not know that he should be sorry, because he did not feel any ill effects of it. They did not succeed, however, in getting a conviction. Since then there had been many disputes, and he was convinced that if the Shipping Federation continued to act in the illegal manner in which they were acting now, the country had only seen the beginning of many disputes which would take place in every port throughout the Kingdom, and the trade of the country, they might be sure, would not be improved in consequence. On every occasion on which a dispute took place the Shipping Federation immediately applied to the authorities for the services of the military and the navy. He did not object to the military being called in for the purpose of preserving order at any time. He believed that it was the duty of the authorities to preserve the peace, and that they would be lacking in that duty if they did not take every precaution. But he thought the responsibility for breaches of the peace should be placed on the right shoulders. At the present time it was all being placed on the shoulders of the workmen. They were told that the workmen in Hull had broken the peace, and that there had been riot and bloodshed. But there had only been three convictions in the town up to now. In spite of the fact that they had in Hull an unlimited number of policemen, there had, he repeated, only been three convictions. There could not, therefore, have been a large amount of riot and disorder. But he held that the Shipping Federation was responsible in the first place for the disturbance which had taken place. Had two or three Unionist officials representing the workmen been allowed to speak to the free labourers and put the case before them there would have been no riot and no disorder, though he was convinced there would have been few free labourers remaining in Hull at the present time. But it was part of the business of the Shipping Federation to create disorder, so as to get in the military and policemen to intimidate and overawe the workmen—that was their policy; but there was another direction in which these gentlemen acted illegally, and he was surprised that the Government did not put the law in force with regard to employers as well as workmen. If there was an Act of Parliament which made it illegal for any unlicensed person to ship seamen, the employers had no right to the liberty to break that law. The Shipping Federation—this innocent organisation which had no evil intention towards workmen's organisations—had, ever since its commencement, insisted upon sailors and firemen taking what was called the Federation ticket. They said that the ticket meant nothing; that it was simply a piece of parchment testifying that the holder, when he signed articles, would perform his contract and go on his voyage. The men would, however, resist it as long as they had any money to fight with. The shipowners stated that their organisation was not for the purpose of interfering with wages. But what was the fact? Seamen in 1891 were paid something like 3s. 6d. a day and their food. That was at a time when all the men had the Union's ticket and not the Federation ticket. Since then, however, through the tyranny of the Shipping Federation and their officials, the men had been compelled to take the Federation ticket, with the result that their wages had been reduced to 1s. 9d. a day. What was this for a seaman or fireman to maintain his wife and family upon? He could give hundreds of cases in which respectable, reliable seamen had got notice of a reduction of their wages from the captain when on the point of signing articles. On their refusal to do so the professional blackleg procurers of the Federation had got incompetent men—men who, when they got on board a ship, were sea-sick, and men who did not know the steering-wheel from a cart-wheel. Two years ago he brought a specimen of these land-sailors from Cardiff to the late President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks-Beach), and the man told the right hon. Gentleman that he had never smelt salt water in his life. These were the men on whom the Federation fell back when they could not get respectable men to accept their 1s. 9d. a day. The country paid large sums of money for the Board of Trade, and he failed to see what good that Department was so far as protecting the lives of the men was concerned. When a qualified seaman signed an agreement to go on board a ship with a certain number of other men he expected that, at least, he was going to get reliable shipmates. But when once he had signed and commenced his voyage, if he found that his shipmates were incompetent, and that, as a consequence, he had to do their work, he was practically powerless to refuse. If he did refuse the Merchant Shipping Act was put in force, and he might be brought before shipowning Magistrates who would sentence him to imprisonment of not more than six weeks, expressing regret, in some instances, that they could not go beyond that period. The Board of Trade was supposed to protect seamen from imposition, but it did nothing of the kind. Instead of preventing incompetent men being put on board ships by crimps, these officials of the Board in many ports had encouraged the crimps to get incompetent men, because these officials, when the men had gone on the voyage, were able to get a share of the advance note. It was a difficult matter for him to prove that these officials got a share of the advance note ; but, nevertheless, it was very suspicious to see Board of Trade officials going down to houses of crimps and drinking with those crimps on a Saturday afternoon at the end of their week's work. He had called the attention of the Board of Trade repeatedly to this illegal supplying of men by the Shipping Federation and by the crimps in cases of labour disputes. The Board of Trade had refused to interfere, because they said it would not be right for the Department to interfere in a labour dispute. He quite admitted that the Board of Trade had nothing to do with a labour dispute ; but if the law was broken by seaman, fireman, or shipowner, it was the duty of the Board of Trade to put that law in force. It was only a short time since he brought a case under the notice of the Board of Trade in connection with one of the Allan line of steamers, the Mongolia, where they were trying to get a 10s. reduction on the men's wages. The men refused to accept the terms. The officials of the Federation at once applied to noted crimps, who employed runners to collect hands out of the casual wards of the workhouses, from tramping dens, and from men discharged from gaols. Out of some 20 men who signed as seamen in this vessel, 16 were unable to prove one day's service at sea, and out of 30 firemen not more than five had ever been at sea. The Board of Trade had had evidence of these facts, and yet had failed to put the law in force. The hon. Member went on to quote from the 147th section of the Merchant Shipping Act to show that if any person not licensed, other than the owner or master of a ship, or some other person directly authorised by them, engaged or supplied any seaman or apprentice for a ship, he should, for every seaman or apprentice so engaged or supplied, incur a penalty not exceeding £20. The Act also provided for the imposition of a penalty on any person who employed an unlicensed person to engage seamen or apprentices. The law was perfectly clear, that no person should supply seamen for any ship, except those who were specially licensed by Act of Parliament. At one time the Board of Trade used to grant special licences to certain people ; but that practice had been discontinued. Despite the law in this respect, the Board of Trade had allowed the shipowners to start an organisation which undertook not only to supply, but to engage seamen in the United Kingdom. The Board of Trade ought to have stepped in to prevent this, because it was inflicting great injury upon the resident seamen in many of our seaport towns. Under present circumstances, if a seaman wanted to be engaged, he must go to the Shipping Federation Office. There was one in each seaport town. A condition of getting employment was that the seaman must have a Federation ticket—preference being given to the men who had that tickets. Many cases had been brought under his notice in which respectable married men had arranged to go with a ship. When they had gone to the Federation Office the agent in charge had told the captain—"You cannot take those men ; you must take these men." It was within his knowledge that certain boarding masters in Shields and Sunderland gave preference of employment to men who stayed in their houses. When the captain came to engage his crew the officers in the Federation Office pointed out the men that the captain had to take. Captains, and he should add engineers, had no choice in the matter. They said that they should be allowed the liberty to engage their own men, but the Shipping Federation said—"No, you shall not have that liberty. That must rest with the officials of the Shipping Federation." He thought that the President of the Board of Trade would admit that that was a serious hardship upon the resident seamen in our seaport towns. Why should they be elbowed out of employment in preference to men who might be supplied to the officials of the Federation by boarding masters ? These boarding masters were, of course, not particular as to who should be engaged. They preferred that the Federation should take the men who came into their boarding houses at 5 o'clock in the evening and were ready to ship the next morning. The boarding masters supplied the outfit of clothes, which cost about 6s., and were charged about £2 or £2 5s. When the boarding master, to meet this debt and the other expenses, got the advance note, the officer of the Federation came to get a share of it. The Board of Trade could prevent this at once by giving notice to the Federation officials that if they supplied men the Act would be put in force. The Board of Trade had done this before. They did it in 1890, when the Federation first started. In Glasgow one of the officials was brought before the Sheriff and fined £20, and it was only after a deputation of shipowners had waited on the late President of the Board of Trade asking that the law should be altered to allow the Federation to supply men (as they had taken counsel's opinion, which was that it was illegal for them to do so) that the right hon. Gentleman said that so far as the Board of Trade was concerned they did not intend to take action in such cases, but to allow the shipowners to supply men by the use of the Federation. The late President of the Board of Trade had no right to give that privilege. No Minister had a right to suspend an Act of Parliament to accommodate shipowners or anyone else. They were ready to put the Act into force so far as workmen were concerned. They should be ready to put it into force as regards employers. As to the dispute in Hull, it was difficult to find anyone who could give an explanation as to what was in dispute. They were told by some that it was all about a simple piece of parchment. The Federation ticket people had said—"Would it not be wise to take the Federation ticket? If the Union men take the ticket they could elbow out the non-Union men, and thus keep their Unions intact." That was all very well. Some time ago, acting on the advice of friends, he allowed some of the men he was associated with to take the ticket. The result was to enable the shipowners to get men entirely at their own price. This was owing to the way in which the competition of inferior men was brought to bear. The agents of the Federation always had a number of worthless men at the Federation Offices ready to sign on at any terms. They had heard much about sweating in the House. When shipowners compelled men to go to sea for 1s. 9d. a day, what was it but sweating? The sweating in the tailoring trade and other industries was not equal to the sweating in the shipping trade. It would not be so hard if it was constant employment which the men got; but when a man signed, say at Cardiff, for 1s. 9d. a day for a six weeks' voyage, and was discharged from his ship, say at Shields or Glasgow, and then had to pay his railway fare home to Cardiff, it would be seen that the terms were oppressive in the extreme. All this had been brought about by the Shipping Federation, and there was, therefore, every justification for resisting such tactics as they intended to do. The disturbance at Hull was a very remarkable matter, and was really due to the Federation of Shipowners. He had been watching the action of the Shipping Federation very closely, and they were informed that this Free Labour Exchange was a great combination of capitalists. It was composed not only of shipowners. They were told that it embraced a number of employers of labour; but for various reasons their names were kept quiet. They were told that shipbuilders and even coal miners—he was now quoting what had been said in employers' papers—had joined this Free Labour Exchange, and that it was their intention in every industrial centre to open a Free Labour Office, and thus compel men who wanted employment to register their name and address, and to undertake at all times to go from one town to another to take the place of men who might be out on strike either for an advance of wages, or to resist a reduction of wages, or to resist the hours of labour. He had with him one of the forms issued by this Free Labour Exchange, which was another name of the Shipping Federation, and the form they asked the men to sign was a form to be used when a labour dispute was pending or anticipated. As soon as an employer of labour connected with this Free Labour Exchange anticipated there was going to be a dispute in connection with his trade, he communicated with the Free Labour Office, who set their agents to work in every town throughout the country, and then they applied to the men who had signed on their list to go from one town to another and take the place of the men who came out on strike. If ever the employers succeeded in getting organised regiments of free labour men, to that extent he was certain that there would be serious and grave cases of disorder in this country, because when workmen found that their only means of protection—namely, their organisations—were crippled and weakened to such an extent that the employers were in a position to crush them by the unlimited supply of free labour men that they would be able to put into the market at any given time—if that state of things were allowed to exist he was certain that riot and disorder would be rampant in every town throughout the country. And it would have to be faced. He was sorry to think that such a crisis was pending; that it could only be met in one way on the part of the workmen, and that was by making our strikes national instead of local. That would be the only means by which we should be able to prevent the employers of labour from crushing our Trade Unions entirely. Where there was a dispute in one port and the employers could get such an unlimited supply of labour from that particular port, Unionists would have no other alternative but to extend the strike to every port in the United Kingdom. He said that the Government had no right to supply the employers with the Military and Naval Forces before there was reasonable ground for anticipating that there would be a riot. He ventured to say that at the early commencement of the dispute in Hull, had the military not been brought into that town and the numbers of policemen who arrived by train and marched down the streets in a body instead of coming in quietly in ones and twos to get to their hotels—that he believed they were treated very liberally—he believed that if they had come in in ones and twos there would have been very little disturbance at all. But here, in order to excite the strikers at the commencement of the strike, these men were marched down in a body, as much as to say to the workmen—"If you do not mind what you are we have all these policemen, and we will let you know what is the matter." As soon as the soldiers were brought into the town nothing would satisfy the Shipping Federation but that they should be paraded with horses and swords drawn so as to make a great show. What was the meaning of that? It was intended to intimidate the men. Why were not the soldiers kept in the barracks until they were needed? Why was there this useless parade? The first day he went to Hull the place was in a perfect state of excitement, not with strikers but with little boys and girls to see the soldiers; they thought it was some Sanger's circus or something of that kind come into the town, and crowds were parading the streets and looking at the exhibition. There was what the newspapers described as "riotous scenes," and "great scenes of disorder." He said the authorities were at fault. Had they kept their policemen indoors, and their soldiers in the barracks, things would have gone on more smoothly than they did. It was quite right to have the force at their command ready if they should be required. He did not wish to take up the House's time, but this was a very serious matter. There were 10,000 men out on strike at Hull, and there were about 20,000 people depending on those 10,000 men; but he was not alarmed so much at what was going on at Hull as he was alarmed—and the House ought to take steps to prevent it—at the disturbance and fights they might have in the future. A Committee of the House had met one of the most prominent body of shipowners and the President of the Board of Trade. He recognised the interference of the President of the Board of Trade in this matter as of the greatest assistance and the greatest value, and it was very much appreciated by the workmen of the country. What took place was that they had a conference. The hon. Member for Central Hull was a party to that Conference, and, after having discussed this question, they arrived at a basis of settlement which to all parties present appeared to be very satisfactory. The workmen gave up one great point—one that he candidly confessed he thought much of, because he recognised that it was of the utmost importance that Trades Unions should try and have every man in the Union; as long as they had men outside the Union they were a source of weakness to the cause—but the Union men were prepared to concede the point that Union men should work with Non-union men. They were told that was the beginning of the dispute in Hull—the question of the Union men and the Non-union men working together. Seeing that the workmen conceded that point, he thought that if the shipowners had not deliberately intended it matters would have been arranged. The shipowners were not agreed upon this point. He was certain that if the shipowners could get out of the Shipping Federation they would only be too pleased to do it; but the people who complained of tyranny on the part of the Union themselves caused shipowners to contribute to the Shipping Federation Fund. There were Members of the House who did not care for the policy of the Shipping Federation, but who were compelled to pay to this organisation, or otherwise their ships would not be insured. This agreement was prepared, and would have been accepted by the shipowners in Hull. He had been informed on reliable authority that the shipowners in Hull agreed to that basis of settlement, and it was only when they went to work with the shipowners, who had everything to gain by the continuation of the dispute, because the trade of Hull was being divided amongst others—it was only then that the shipowners refused to accept the outcome of this conference at Hull as the basis of the agreement which had been come to by the Committee of the House. He said that when the Shipping Federation had taken up that most unreasonable attitude it was the duty of the Government—he did not want favours from the Government—he should be the last man to ask for them—all he asked on behalf of the strikers was, in the first place, that the Board of Trade would put the law in force, and through their officials prevent the illegal supply of seamen. That was not a favour. He considered it the duty of the Board of Trade to do this without any Member of the House specially asking for them to do it. In the second place, he asked the Home Secretary to refuse to supply the Forces of the Crown until such time as was absolutely necessary in the interests of the peace of any particular district to supply them. He asked—he had a right to ask—that the Forces of the Crown should not be at the call of the Shipping Federation; that as soon as they appealed to the Crown an unlimited number of men should be sent down to parade about the place. That was all he asked. It was a most reasonable request; and seeing the attitude the Shipping Federation had taken up, and having regard to the concessions which had been offered by the dockers and rejected by the other side, he said it was the duty of the Government not to afford them any assistance, but that, so far as the laws of the country were concerned, they should be enforced impartially between employer and worker. That was all he asked, and it was no special privilege. He trusted the Government would put the law in force, and not afford the Shipping Federation any facilities whatever. He moved that the House do adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Havelock Wilson.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): My hon. Friend has said—and I agree with him—that this is a question of great interest and of general importance. So far as I am concerned, I will not enter into the merits of the existing dispute in Hull, or as to the general conduct of the Shipping Federation; but I am certain I am only giving expression to the universal feeling which prevails in this House when I say that we earnestly hope a means may be found for speedily putting an end to the dispute, and that a grave responsibility will rest on the shoulders of either party if they refuse to adopt reasonable means for that purpose. The only point I am concerned with—my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will, no doubt, say a word on the other points—the only other point I am concerned with is the question the hon. Gentleman has raised as to the employment of the Forces of the Crown in this matter. Now, Sir, the hon. Gentleman made the admission—which I was not surprised to hear him make—that the primary duty of the Local and Central Authority is to maintain order; and if for that purpose it is necessary to supplement the local police force by the Naval and Military Forces it is not only the right but the duty of the Government to accede to these demands. The hon. Gentleman seems to be under an impression that the Government have responded to some demand made to them by the Shipping Federation. I assure him, and I assure the House, that he is entirely mistaken. The Shipping Federation and other employers have applied to the Government for forces to enable these apprehended disorders to be put down. My answer—and it has been the answer of all my Predecessors—the answer to such requests has invariably been the same—my answer was, if you have any complaint of this kind to make, make it to the Local Authorities—they are primarily responsible for the maintenance of order, and Her Majesty's Government will not listen to any demand for the extraordinary use of the Forces of the Crown, unless that demand proceeds from the authority on the spot responsible for the maintenance of peace. Neither the Military nor the Naval Force, so far as I am aware, has ever been sent, nor, so far as I am concerned, will ever be sent to take part in any dispute unless the Local Authority on the spot inform me that the force is presently and urgently necessary for the maintenance of the peace. That is the course followed in the present instance. And I may remind my hon. Friend with regard to the Local Authorities in Hull that the Magistrates, who are appointed by the Crown, have been supported by the recommendation of the Watch Committee of the Corporation of Hull. The Corporation of Hull is a popular elective Body, and the Watch Committee of that Body is the Committee which is primarily entrusted with the control of the police and the maintenance of order. I do not see how we can take upon us the responsibility of rejecting a demand declared by them to be urgently necessary. It is in that spirit, and that only, that Her Majesty's Government have acted in this matter, and I trust my hon. Friend will disabuse his mind of the impression that the Government have taken, or will take, either side in the dispute.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: I did not complain of the presence of the military in Hull, but I complained of the soldiers parading round the town when there was no necessity for their so doing.

MR. ASQUITH: If the Forces are sent to a place a large discretion must be entrusted to the Magistrates and officers of the town as to the use of them. I do not know that this parading has been attended with serious consequences. My hon. Friend has said the children came out and amused themselves by watching them. But I can say this, after having made careful inquiry: that, so far as my information goes, there has not been one single case of collision between the Naval and Military Forces on the one side and the people on the other, and throughout the time they have spent in Hull they have discharged their duties—their difficult and delicate duties—with the utmost discretion. Any complaint to be made must be made to the proper quarter, and it will be most promptly attended to. I cannot forbear from expressing my admiration, and that of hon. Members on both sides of the House, of the extreme discipline and discretion shown by officers and by men during the whole of this time. I may remind the House that a very valuable service has been rendered by the bluejackets on Her Majesty's gunboats in connection with the fires at the docks. I say nothing whatever as to the cause—it is perfectly certain that the great body of strikers repudiate any connection with the fires—but the fact that these fires occurred, and there is reasonable ground for suspecting, at any rate in one instance, it is the result of incendiarism, shows that, with two hostile parties in a state of industrial warfare, with forces drawn up one against the other, there are certain to be some lawless, ill-disposed men—unconnected with either party, repudiated by the leaders of both parties—who would take advantage, unless there was sufficient force to restrain them, of violating the law. It is to prevent that state of things from arising during a period which, in the opinion of the Local Authorities, was one of emergency, that troops were sent. I trust, after that explanation, my hon. Friend will agree with me that, so far as Her Majesty's Government is concerned, they have acted with strict impartiality, and that the only interest they have to serve in the matter is keeping and maintaining the peace.

MR. KEIR HARDIE said, it was well to call attention briefly to the origin of the dispute which underlay the discussion which had been raised. It was a fight on the part of the dockers to maintain their right to combine. That was borne out by the reports which had appeared from time to time in the public Press. The Daily Chronicle of the 10th April stated distinctly that the cause of the dispute was a deliberate and systematic attempt on the part of the employers of Hull to break up Trades Unionism. The Westminster Gazette of the same date made practically the same statement. He quoted these two papers because they were supporters of the Government in power, and could not be expected to be biased in their statement against a supporter of the Government. The Shipping Federation had refused all terms of settlement and compromise; they had insisted that before a docker should be employed in the Port of Hull he should first join the Free Labour Exchange, which had been explained to be another name for the Shipping Federation. He submitted that it was an illegal conspiracy for a body of shipowners or employers to lay down a law that before a workman could find employment he must first join an organisation of which they were the head, and which had been formed for the purpose of promoting their interests as opposed to his own. It had been decided that one shipowner might not join with another to prevent a third making profits in connection with a certain department of trade. If that were so in regard to a shipowner, it ought to be equally true in the case of a docker. The fact that these men had combined to prevent the dockers following their calling made the conspiracy an illegal one. The policemen at Hull, it had been said, were not competent to maintain order there; and, like the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, he would agree in saying that there might be cases and occasions in which it was necessary to employ the Military Forces of the Crown; but he respectfully submitted that until the powers of the Civil Force had been exhausted, the Naval and Military Forces should not be called into action. And there was no proof whatever—and, in fact, the Home Secretary, in the speech he had made, had admitted that there was no evidence to show that there was any danger of serious outbreaks on the part of the great body of the strikers at Hull. The Home Secretary had said that a few irresponsible persons hanging about the edge of the crowd might commit crime; but surely the police would have been amply sufficient to keep in order all these misguided persons; and when he admitted that the body of strikers was well-conducted, he took away any case there might have been for the employment of the Military Forces at Hull. The local police had been supplemented by an addition of 324 policemen from other towns and boroughs, including 26 mounted police from the Metropolis. He believed that this was the first occasion on which the mounted police of the Metropolis had been called to do duty outside of the metropolis, save on occasions of Royal pageants. And if the Forces of the Metropolis, which, like the soldiers and the Navy, were under the control of the Government, were to be used in this way in cases of trade dispute it became a serious matter indeed for the working classes of the country. The soldiers had been called in, and it had been denied that they had taken part in the dispute. But he had in his possession letters and telegrams from responsible leaders of the dockers at Hull which went to show that the services of the military were used to aid the black-legs in loading and unloading vessels at the Port of Hull. And they had collateral evidence in support of that statement. The Commander of the troops at Hull, Major General Wilkinson, wrote to the Watch Committee of the Borough of Hull demanding that extra police should be employed, in order that the troops might be relieved of certain duties which were imposed upon them. He wanted to know from the Home Secretary what were the special duties which were imposed on the troops at Hull, from which Major General Wilkinson sought to have his men relieved? It was only when the Major General, who had some respect for the men and the honour of the Army, refused to allow them to perform the degrading work in which they were employed in connection with the strike that extra police were engaged. The complaint he (Mr. Keir Hardie) made against the employment of the soldiery was that, no matter how petty a trade dispute might be, immediately a demand was made for the presence of the military, that demand was never refused. On whose authority was it that the demand was made for the Port of Hull? They were told that the Shipping Federation applied on this or other occasions, and were refused. But the Magistrates of the Port of Hull were the Shipping Federation under another name. The Bench of Magistrates there was made up almost exclusively of ship-owners. The Watch Committee was much divided in opinion concerning the advisability of having the troops at Hull, and the Chairman of the Watch Committee (Alderman Stuart) was personally opposed to—and had given expression to his opposition—to the troops being longer maintained there. No matter how petty a trade dispute might be the military were at once applied for. If it was a case of turning a miner out of his cottage, as was the case at Durham, the military were immediately sent for to parade their power and force. If it was the case of evicting a Highland crofter from his shieling or an Irish tenant from his cabin the military were immediately brought forward, ostensibly for the purpose of preserving law and order, but really for the purpose of taming and breaking the spirit of men who, to paraphrase a well-known sentence, were rightly struggling to maintain their freedom, and to make it easier for the capitalists of the country, in their capacity as employers of labour, to break down the only strength which stood between them and the oppression of the workers—namely, the Trades Unions of the country. He supported the Motion for the Adjournment of the House in order to enter a strong and emphatic protest against this continued employment of the Military Forces in connection with trade disputes. If the Magistrates in the Port of Hull had been made up of dockers instead of Dock Directors, more consideration would have been given to the request before it was complied with; and the fact that the Government, through the mouth of the Home Secretary, had refused an independent inquiry into the case for the continued presence of the military at Hull showed they were afraid to face an independent investigation. They wanted to shield the man who sat behind them, and who was responsible for this dispute being continued. Fair terms had been offered for the settlement of this dispute. The dockers had yielded every point which in the first instance was claimed at their hands; but now the shipowners, growing bold by the backing which they had received, and by an apparent weakness on the part of the dockers, had enlarged their demands, and declared that unless the dockers submitted unconditionally no return to work would be possible. The military having been prohibited the other day from aiding the blacklegs, the police had started on a new tack, and he desired to ask the Home Secretary whether he had given any instructions to the Chief Constable at Hull to interfere with the pickets whilst in the performance of their duty? He would read to the House two telegrams which he had received that day, one of which formed the basis of a question which he put to the Home Secretary at question time. One of the telegrams read—

“Mounted and foot police last night stopped pickets proceeding lawfully, two by two, at long intervals apart . . . and turned men back.”

He wanted to know why that was done, and would the Home Secretary instruct the police that picketing was legal? That day he had received a telegram from the gentleman who was in charge of the strike at present, in which he said—

“Interviewed Chief Constable. He admitted that the police had instructions to interfere with pickets whilst walking in twos. Declines to say who issued such instructions.”

Now, he considered that was a serious matter. Picketing was admittedly legal. It had been legalised by the House of Commons. Pickets going along two by two could not be said to be an intimidating force; and if instructions were to be given to the police to interfere with pickets legally going about their business, then it practically meant that the Government of the day had declared that striking should be made illegal, because if the Military Forces of the Crown were to be called in to overawe the dockers, and if the Shipping Federation was to violate a law passed by that House, and if the police were to have special instructions to hamper and to hinder pickets in the performance of their duty, it meant that the last weapon left to workmen—namely, striking—their most powerful weapon—was being taken from them insidiously in this way by the powers that be. He trusted his hon. Friend would press his Motion to a Division, in order to test the feeling of the House in regard to the continued employment of the troops at Hull, and the policy of the Government generally in allowing the Shipping Federation to escape scot free. A more serious battle for labour was never entered upon than that now going on. If the employers succeeded, it meant that the workmen, for a time at least, would be absolutely at the mercy of the employers. That might please the Members of that House who were employers. It might please the Home Secretary, who had never failed to elicit the warmest cheers from the Party of law and order in that House; but the workers in this country wanted to know why it was that, no matter what Government was in power, the side of the employer was taken in opposition to that of the workman? They could understand the Party of law and order cheering the employment of the police and military. It was consistent for them to do so, but in the case of the Liberal Party, who had come into power as the friends of labour, it was dishonest, and it was being untrue to all the professions on the faith on which they had been returned to power. He trusted the House would give no uncertain vote in regard to their opinion concerning the further employment of the Military Forces of the Crown in connection with the dispute going on at Hull.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said, at last the House had heard from the real leader of this movement a statement of the case so far as the difficulties connected with the Hull strike were concerned. He was surprised—he did not use the term offensively—at the ignorance which the Home Secretary had just now displayed. [Cries of "Oh!"] Well, he would use the expression want of information—perhaps that would be better—in regard to what had taken place at Hull. He happened to receive from Hull—and had he known that this Debate was to take place he certainly should have brought the communication with him—a letter from a bonâ fide leader of the working classes, who was known to the President of the Board of Trade and to many hon. Members of that House, a man who was not in the habit of bolstering up his position by daily advertising himself by puffing paragraphs in the newspapers. The real leader of the working classes he referred to was Mr. Frederick Maddison, than whom no more high-minded or honourable man could be found in the Kingdom. He wrote him (Mr. Cremer), only a few days ago, statements which he thought the Home Secretary ought to have made himself acquainted with. He described the irritating effect which was produced on the starving men and women of Hull by the presence of the military in that town. He (Mr. Cremer) quite agreed with the contention urged just now so forcibly by the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, that if it was necessary that the military should be sent to Hull, they ought to have been carefully confined to barracks until occasion required that they should be brought out. Instead of that, if Mr. Maddison's statement was true, and he believed it was true—and the information was at the disposal of the Home Secretary—the military were being daily marched up and down the streets of Hull, and Mr. Maddison described the irritating effect produced on the starving men and women, and as being calculated to bring about the very result which the Home Secretary and the Local Authorities appeared anxious to avoid. He therefore thought that a strong case had been made out for the strict confinement of the military within the barracks at Hull, if their presence there was absolutely necessary, and he hoped the Home Secretary would take steps to obtain for himself definite information on that very important matter. He had not the slightest desire to waste the time of the House in further discussing this question. He believed the introduction of the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough must have a good effect upon the Government, and a soothing effect—at least he hoped so—upon the men in Hull who were contending for what they considered and believed to be their just demands. They only asked—and he thought they were entitled to ask—that the Government should preserve absolute neutrality in the dispute. They only asked that they should have fair play accorded to them; they wanted no privilege, but strict neutrality, and that fair play which always ought to be accorded by every Government whenever a struggle took place between employer and employed. In spite of the advice tendered by the hon. Member for West Ham—who never lost an opportunity of trying to inflict a stab upon Her Majesty's Government, and in his attempt to do so was always cheered by his friends on the other side of the House—he hoped the hon. Member for Middlesbrough would not consider it necessary to press for a Division on his Motion, but would consider his ends had been served, at least for the present, by having raised this very important Debate in the House of Commons.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) said, as one who had taken some interest in the Hull dispute, as one whom that House would cheerfully and willingly accord had had some experience in strikes and industrial disputes, he wished to say a few words in favour of the Adjournment of the House. He trusted the hon. Member for Middlesbrough would not follow the bad example of some hon. Members who moved Resolutions, but did not intend to sustain them by going to a Division. He ventured to say that the condition of things at Hull was only the precursor of a worse condition of things, that would inevitably follow throughout every port and industrial district of Great Britain, unless the illegal conduct of the Shipping Federation was resisted by Her Majesty's Government, of whatever political complexion that might happen to be in power, whenever those disputes occurred. With regard to the dispute at Hull and the introduction of the police and military, he wished to call the attention of the Home Secretary, and above all of the First Lord of the Treasury, to the memorable strike that took place in London nearly four years ago. They had in connection with that great dock strike in London at different periods from 50,000 to 100,000 unskilled labourers on strike for a period of six weeks. During the whole of that period there was not a single Police Court case arising out of the strike. There was no criminal outrage, and no physical intimidation of any character. If there had been any physical intimidation on the part of the strikers, he was positively convinced that the late Home Secretary would have put it down with that firmness and with that discretion which characterised the Party of law and order to which the right hon. Gentleman belonged. But what happened? In that London strike the police were kept in reserve. There the Home Secretary had some thousands of policemen in and around the Docks, but they were not allowed to go out, and by their presence to morally and physically intimidate the men on strike, who had no desire to intimidate, and who would have been kept from intimidation if the leaders could have had their way. They found that one of the biggest industrial conflicts of all time, owing to the authorities not sending the police and military to be used as they were being used at Hull, that big conflict ended satisfactorily to the men, the public approved of it, and the Forces of the Crown were not unnecessarily obtruded. The men were on their honour to behave. They were anxious not to abuse the law of picketing, and the leaders, to the best of their ability, kept the men within proper bounds; but that would have been almost impossible if the police and military had been used on behalf of the London Dock and Shipowners, as the police and military had been illegally used at the instigation of the Watch Committee of Hull, who, in this case, had been suborned by the Shipping Federation. The Home Secretary was now, unfortunately, placed in this position—that an ingenious American capitalistic creature named Mr. Laws, whose intention it was, if possible, to establish a Pinkerton police in England similar to that which existed in America—owing to the ingenuity of this American the Home Secretary had been saved the trouble of controlling and organising a Pinkerton police force. He was enabled to suborn the Watch Committee and the Bench of Magistrates, and through them the Military Forces of the Crown, to take the side of the shipowners at Hull to an extent that they ought not to have done. That was only part of the general system of intimidation that prevailed. To-day he had the pleasure of introducing to the Lord Chancellor a deputation of Bristol working men, who came to him with a Petition signed by 12,000 of the citizens of Bristol. That Petition pointed out that, in consequence of the Bench of Magistrates at Bristol being mainly composed of shipowners and men pecuniarily interested in labour disputes, law was being travestied in Bristol; and if a dock labourer got into trouble there, and if a policeman swore evidence against him, the condition of things was such through the Magistrates being industrial—Dr. Jekylls, and magisterial Mr. Hydes—that the docker would probably say "Never mind the evidence. I am only a docker. Sentence me without hearing my counsel." Not only at Hull, but at Bristol, Liverpool, Glasgow, and Swansea they found that the local police, and the Metropolitan police, as at Hull, and the military were invoked at times of labour disputes, less with the object of preserving law and order, but they anticipated a breach of the peace by bringing in foreign police and bringing in the military was to intimidate the men, and prove to them that they had better submit before the forces of the Crown were used against them. He was prepared to prove that in Hull out of 38 Magistrates four were directly shipowners, and that 19 were pecuniarily interested in the ships or in the docks. That was to say, that 23 out of 38, or a majority of four, were interested in shipping. It seemed to him that if these industrial disputes were to continue, the Home Secretary would have to adopt some means by which Magistrates, other than those pecuniarily interested in these disputes, should assume the ordinary functions of a Magistrate; and if the military and police were to be invoked, it should be done at the instance of a tribunal independent both of the employers and the men. What did they find now in connection with the agents and members of the Shipping Federation—professional agitators like himself, actually attending a meeting of Magistrates where it was decided to invoke the aid of the military forces. Let them just fancy John Burns standing in the guardroom in Wellington Barracks and taking part in a discussion as to whether the Grenadier Guards should not be sent down to the docks of London in order to chase free labour out of the docks! It was as pertinent for him to give that illustration as it was for persons connected with the Shipping Federation, men pecuniarily interested in carrying out their policy, to be present at a meeting of a Bench of Magistrates when they decided to invoke the aid of the military. They were told that that was peculiar to Hull. That was not so. At Cardiff, at Southampton, at Swansea, and on the occasion of a recent dispute at Durham, the police and military were unnecessarily invoked, and in Lancashire during the street collections the masters were not sufficiently decent to stay from the meetings when questions of street collections for the strikers were being discussed. He wished to point out that if a man made a violent speech he was responsible to the Magistrates and to the law for the consequences of that speech. If a man struck a free labourer, he must put up with the consequences of his illegal physical act; but if the masters did an illegal act, as they had done at Hull and elsewhere, in suspending the right of procession, of public meeting, and the right of picketing, then the Magisterial Bench would be brought into contempt and disrepute, and they would have English law administered, as he trusted it might never be administered, as it had been administered in the western mining towns, where the man who owned the coal mines of the district, and who held the freehold of the town, had practically the whole charge of ordering the police and military to fire on a mob simply because it was his pecuniary interest so to do. He read in The Times that morning a statement which showed the close relation which existed between the Shipping Federation and the Magistrates. The Times stated that a compromise had been reached, and the present idea was that there should be an informal conference between the sub-committees of the Shipping Federation and the Watch Committee to consider whether the work was to be carried on, and that the amount of protection necessary might be discussed. He would assume, for the sake of argument, that protection for free labourers was necessary at Hull, and that it was necessary to invoke the aid of the military. That was a matter for the Watch Committee and the Bench of Magistrates alone as Magistrates, and they had no more right to hold a conference with the sub-committees of the Shipping Federation—a party in this industrial dispute—than they would have to ask the leader of the strike at Hull, Mr. Ben Tillett, to consult with them as to whether or not free labourers should be sent out of the town under the protection of the police and military. He would go further, and would call the attention of the Home Secretary to a statement made by the Chairman of the Watch Committee. Addressing the Town Council on April 9 Mr. Stuart,

the gentleman to whom he referred, used this significant remark—

“The members of the Council were chiefly employers. Might he remind them that the display of force unhappily deprived the men of almost their only weapon, if he might say so, for protecting their interests? While it was true that they were only performing a duty in bringing the military there, he could not forget that, in the performance of that duty at Hull, they had prevented the men from using that moral persuasion which was both legal and just.”

He, no doubt, meant by that statement that the right to picket was interfered with, as was also the right of Unionist workmen to persuade and try to convert non-Unionist workmen, which was recognised by the law. In a Hull paper of April 10 he found that the arrival of the gunboats was due to the instigation of the Shipping Federation writing to the Admiralty, and not to the Watch Committee or the Bench of Magistrates writing to the Admiralty. They had heard a great deal of the intimidation of free labourers by the Unionists, most of which had been grossly exaggerated, and any of which, if it had happened, he should entirely disagree with, because he believed that the man who said that honesty was the best policy was a scoundrel, though he was right. But what prevailed in the ordinary moral sphere applied to strikes, and intimidation, in the long run, did not pay in strikes. No labour leader, as a matter of tactics, could commend it. But even in the event of intimidation occurring, it was not for the Admiralty to obey the whip of Mr. Laws or the Shipping Federation. It was the duty of the Magistrates, the Watch Committee, and the Town Council, in communication with the Home Secretary, to invoke the aid of the Naval Forces after the Riot Act had been read and there had been some preliminary disturbances which the local police were unable to deal with.

MR. ASQUITH: Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to correct a misapprehension of fact into which he has fallen? It is not the case that the gunboats were sent at the instance of the Shipping Federation. They were sent on the demand of the Local Authority, which was approved of by me and communicated by me to the Admiralty.

MR. JOHN BURNS said, he had further to point out that 23 out of 38 Magistrates in Hull were themselves pecuniarily interested in the matter, and that of the 15 members of the Watch Committee five were shipowners. That, he contended, was an abuse of the administration of the law, and the sooner the Home Secretary and his Colleagues began to alter it the better for the industrial, social, and political peace of the country. Some time since the Home Secretary, with that ability which characterised him, made an exceedingly eloquent speech, in which he maintained the right of public meeting, the right of procession, and the right of assembly in connection with political, industrial, and social questions. His (Mr. Burns's) contention was, that the position at Hull had been unnecessarily embittered by the arbitrary intervention of an outside police and military, deliberately brought there in accordance with the plan of campaign undertaken by the Magistrates at the instance of the Shipping Federation. He had held at different times of his life various opinions with regard to the law. He started with the opinion that there was one law for the rich and one law for the poor, but every time he was sentenced by English Judges he came to the conclusion that they were almost as impartial as incorruptible, and as just as it was possible for human beings to be. But if they saw in future what was taking place at Hull to-day, what took place at Bristol a month ago, what took place at Southampton 12 months ago, and what took place at Cardiff two years ago—namely, the Watch Committee, the Bench of Magistrates, and the Town Council deliberately using their position as parties in an industrial dispute to invoke the forces of law and order for the purpose of playing their game against the weaker side, against unskilled and hitherto unorganised labour—if that was to continue, there was only one thing for the unskilled labourer of England to do, and that was, to walk about as the unskilled labourer did in America, with either a knife or a revolver in his pocket—his own law and his own authority. They had the fact that free labourers, deliberately armed by the Shipping Federation, were sent from post to post with the deliberate object of provoking strikes and bringing about disturbances, with a view to breaking down the organisation of unskilled labour. This he could say, that, much as he respected English law, if it was the intention of Mr. Laws to introduce into this country what was known as the free labour police, similar to Pinkerton's police that State after State in America had to put down, he would be opening the flood-gates of anarchy and social and political disorder. Were they going to allow mine-owners, shipowners, or dock-owners to usurp the functions of the law simply because they happened to have wealth, social prestige, and power at their backs? It was because he believed the House of Commons would not allow such a thing as this to happen; it was because he believed the Home Secretary would take time by the forelock and nip this Shipping Federation conspiracy in the bud, that he had interposed in the Debate. It was because he did not desire the strikers to intimidate the free labourers that, on the other hand, he asked the Home Secretary and the First Lord of the Treasury to see that the law was enforced by impartial and honest functionaries, and not to allow either the Town Council or the Watch Committee to play the game of the Federation through the military and the police. It was the duty of an impartial tribunal to see that the law was obeyed, and, if necessary in order to enforce that object, to call in the assistance of military and outside police; but, under the circumstances detailed, he hoped the hon. Member would press his Motion to a Division, so that they could see who were the friends in that House of labour and lawful combination.

MR. CLARENCE SMITH (Hull, E.) said, that, as representing one of the divisions of Hull in that House, he should like to say a word or two, but he would confine his observations to one point. Though his sympathies were entirely with the men in their struggle, particularly since the Federation decided to hold no communication with them or offer any method of solution, he thought it only fair to say that, in his opinion, the hon. Member for Battersea had entirely misunderstood the position of the Watch Committee, who, as the Home Secretary had told them, were the popularly elected representatives of the people. He should like to say that the Mayor of Hull had been for many years a friend of labour. He was a prominent member of the Liberal Party, and labour at Hull had hardly a more trusted friend. He should like to tell the hon. Member that the Chairman of the Watch Committee, Mr. Alderman Stuart, was for many years a prominent member of the Liberal Party, and one of the most powerful advocates of the interests and the rights of labour. Further, he did not think he was exaggerating in saying that the Deputy Chairman of the Watch Committee was one of the keenest friends of labour in all Yorkshire. Under these circumstances, the hon. Member should, he thought, exempt the popularly elected representatives at Hull from the censure which he had passed upon the other Local Authorities. He had received from Alderman Stuart a communication in which he said—and he thought the House would believe every word—that it would be absolutely impossible to preserve the peace of the town with the force under the control of the Local Authorities. He thought he should not have done his duty if he had not made that statement, which he hoped would induce his hon. Friend to withdraw the words of censure he had passed upon the popularly elected representatives of the people.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) hoped he would not be accused of any want of sympathy if he ventured to submit to the House totally different advice to that which had been advocated by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Burns) and the hon. Member for West Ham (Mr. Keir Hardie)—namely, that a Division should be pressed. He had very great sympathy with the workmen on strike at Hull; for whatever might have been the origin of that strike, whether the men or those who provoked the strike were right or wrong in the course they took, he thought no one would deny that at the present time the shipowners, or, speaking more fairly, the Shipping Federation, had admittedly been—

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON (interrupting) said, he should like to make his position clear on this matter. ["Order, order!"] He was not going to make a speech, but only to explain. He was not going to divide the House on the question of the presence of the military and police at Hull, because there were two opinions on that matter; but there could be no two opinions as to the breaking of the law by the Shipping Federation in contravention of the Merchant Shipping Act, and, unless satisfied on that point, he did intend to go to a Division.

MR. FENWICK said, he was glad to have that explanation from his hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Havelock Wilson), because that considerably altered the situation. He had no doubt they would presently hear from the President of the Board of Trade some observations which might possibly lead his hon. Friend to re-consider his decision with regard to the advisability of dividing the House. If there had been a deliberate violation of any Statute Law with regard to the employment of seamen at Hull, he was confident that the President of the Board of Trade would be the very first of all men to take immediate steps to remedy the evil, and to do it to the satisfaction of all concerned. But he was observing that, whatever might have been the origin of the dispute, there was, in his opinion at least, at this moment, not the slightest doubt that the object of the Shipping Federation was to break down the workmen's Union by insisting upon registration in the Labour Bureau and the acceptance of the Federation ticket. He had never been one of those who had maintained that it was the function of a Trade Union to compel or to coerce any man, with or against his will, to become a member of that Union. The peculiarity of the situation at Hull, so far as the military were concerned, seemed to arise out of the fact that the Local Authority, who were responsible for the calling out of the military, were themselves the men who were directly mixed up in this dispute. The situation was an extremely complicated and difficult one. He could not see how the Home Secretary, when applied to by the Local Authority for additional military and police assistance, could have avoided the responsibility of acceding to the application. Had he not done so, he would undoubtedly have incurred a very grave and serious responsibility, which that House would not have been slow to carry home to him had a conflict taken place, and had he refused to strengthen the hands of the Local Authorities, who were responsible for the preservation of peace and order in Hull. On the other hand, he could not conceal from himself the peculiarity of the situation, which was this: those who were responsible for making application to the Home Secretary for additional forces were themselves the men who were in conflict with the workers. It seemed to him that the first thing the House ought to insist upon was that the military who were at present located in Hull should not be paraded before the gaze of the people. No one, he thought, would venture to submit that there was such excitement at Hull that at any moment there might be an outbreak of rioting and disturbance. No one had ventured to submit that. Then, why this necessity for display—why these parades of the forces of the Crown in the streets? Those parades were in themselves calculated to provoke a breach of the peace and bring about a disturbance. At any rate, he thought they had a right to demand from the Home Secretary, or some Member of the Government, an assurance that proper steps would be taken to ensure that the military should not be called upon to parade the streets unless there was imminent danger of a disturbance of the peace. He hoped, further, they would have an assurance from the President of the Board of Trade with regard to the alleged breaches of the Merchant Shipping Act; an assurance which would satisfy his hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, and which would remove the necessity for putting the House to the trouble of dividing upon this subject. Even, however, if that assurance was not satisfactory, what would his hon. Friend gain by putting the House to a Division? If they did divide, and the majority of the House and the majority of hon. Members were in favour of taking an evening off, what advantage would be gained? No practical advantage, it seemed to him, would be gained. But if the House did go to a Division, he should vote with his hon. Friend, though he trusted he would remain satisfied with having brought the matter before the notice of the House and of the country.

MR. LOCKWOOD (York) was glad to hear from the hon. Member for Middlesbrough that he did not intend to press to a Division that part of his Motion which related to the presence of the troops in Hull, because he was sure no one who had heard the statement of the Home Secretary could help feeling that, so far as he was concerned, he was determined to do all he could to see that the troops were strictly impartial. He did not suggest that there was any desire on the part of those in command of the forces to be other than impartial; but in the course of this very interesting Debate there had been three points made—points included in that part of the Motion upon which they were called upon to divide—which, as it seemed to him, required answering from some hon. Member on the Front Government Bench. First of all, they were told by the hon. Member for West Ham that members of the Shipping Federation had been present at the deliberations of the Watch Committee when the committee were forming a conclusion as to whether or not application should be made for forces to be sent to Hull. The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Burns) drew an illustration of the kind of effect which was likely to be produced if he presented himself at the guardroom at Wellington Barracks and made a similar application. Well, it would probably result in the detention of his hon. Friend; but, at any rate, he did not think he would gain much so far as his application was concerned. Surely, if this statement by the hon. Member for West Ham (Mr. Keir Hardie) were true, if it was a fact that members of the Shipping Federation were present in the Watch Committee at the time of those deliberations, all he could say was that they were very ill-advised in going there. He hoped some further information would be forthcoming on that matter. The second point he wished to call the attention of the House to was this: It was stated by the hon. Member for West Ham that he had received a challenge—which had never been challenged—to the effect that perfectly legal pickets had been interfered with by the police. The hon. Member was perfectly right in his statement of the law that pickets were perfectly legal pickets if they were as he had described them, and when they were not in such numbers as to constitute a force of intimidation. They were about their lawful business; and if it were true that they had been interfered with, the matter should be inquired into. The Government, which he believed was a Government favourable to labour, would be failing in its pledges if it did not do so. The third point was with regard to the practices of the military; and with regard to that matter he should like to ask the Home Secretary whether it was not a fact that the military taken to Newcastle during the Durham strike there were confined to barracks during the whole of the time? He had received this information from one of the officers of the Royal Dragoons—the same regiment, he believed, as was now in Hull. The advice as to the unnecessary parade was good advice, and he, for one, hoped that steps would be taken to prevent any unnecessary parade of the forces in the present instance. But there still remained the point upon which the House would have to divide, which was a very serious matter, and well worthy the attention of the Board of Trade. The point made by his hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough was a good one. For the benefit of hon. Members who were not in the House at the time, he would quote the section again. The Act was 17 & 18 Vict., c. 104, and the particular sections to which attention was directed were Sections 146 and 147, as to the engagement of seamen—

“The Board of Trade may grant to such persons as it thinks fit licences to engage or supply seamen or apprentices for merchant ships in the United Kingdom, to continue for such periods, to be upon such terms, and to be revocable upon such conditions as such Board thinks proper.”
 “Section 147.—The following offences shall be punishable as hereinafter mentioned’ (Sub-sections 1, 2, and 3):—‘If any person not licensed as aforesaid, other than the owner or master or a mate of the ship, or some person who is bonâ fide the servant and in the constant employ of the owner, or a shipping master duly appointed (Section 145), as aforesaid, engages or supplies any seaman or apprentice;’ or ‘if any person employs any unlicensed person other than persons so excepted as aforesaid, for the purpose of engaging or supplying any seaman or apprentice to be entered on board any ship in the United Kingdom,’ or ‘if any person knowingly receives or accepts to be entered on board any ship any seaman or apprentice who has been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of this Act . . . he shall for every seaman or apprentice so engaged or supplied incur a penalty as therein stated.”

That covered the whole ground. Who were these men? They were not ship-owners, nor were they in the constant employ of shipowners. They were the servants, for the time being, of the Shipping Federation. The Shipping Federation were not in law agents of the owners of ships for this purpose. Those persons were not within any of the exceptions named in the sub-sections to Section 147. If that were so, there had been a breach of the law, and he trusted that the present Government would have the courage to enforce the law against those who had broken it. Perhaps this would be more properly a question for the Solicitor General; but as he was not in his place, he trusted that the Board of Trade would be able to give them some assurance upon the point.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I shall be glad to explain, so far as I am able without notice—

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: I gave notice to the right hon. Gentleman three weeks ago.

MR. MUNDELLA: I received no notice that the matter was to be brought forward this afternoon. If it can be shown that the Shipping Federation or anyone else has committed a breach of the Merchant Shipping Act I will undertake their prosecution. I cannot say more than that. I have received during the last few days indignant remonstrances from members of the Shipping Federation for prosecutions which I have already undertaken under Section 148 of the Act—

“If any person demands or receives, either directly or indirectly, from any seaman or apprentice, or from any person seeking employment as a seaman or apprentice, or from any person on his behalf, any remuneration whatever, other than the fees hereby authorised, for providing him with employment, he shall, for every such offence, incur a penalty not exceeding £5.”

These clauses were framed against crimping.

MR. LOCKWOOD: Look at the preceding sections. I did not allude to Section 148.

MR. MUNDELLA: I am only stating the course which I have taken with respect to persons connected with the Shipping Federation. With respect to Section 146, the Board has not granted for years past licences to persons to supply seamen, but has allowed the supplies to come in the regular course. I find that my Predecessor was advised by persons administering the Act that the Shipping Federation, being formed by shipowners, are bonâ fide in the employ of the shipowners and could supply seamen.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: Oh!

MR. MUNDELLA: Well, the question is one of law, and, if the hon. Gentleman disputes it, he had better test it.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: It is not for a private individual to put the law in force.

MR. MUNDELLA: It is constantly done by private individuals. I have no desire whatever to shirk any duty that belongs to the Board of Trade, or to throw on the Association represented by my hon. Friend any duty which properly belongs to that Department. Only let it be made clear that there has been a breach committed by the Shipping Federation, and the Board of Trade will commence a prosecution. I cannot, however, do this in violation of the advice, not only of those who preceded me, but of those who now advise me on matters of law. To make assurance doubly sure I will, however, bring the particular portion of the Act again under the notice of the Law Officers, and obtain the very best advice as to what the state of the law really is. More than this I cannot do in face of the advice already given, that the law does not apply either to the Shipping Federation or to a combination of masters or workmen. I do not think that the hon. Member serves his cause by the statements he has made. He spoke of incompetent men being employed, and he gave an instance; but as there is, I believe, a case pending in regard to that, I prefer to say nothing about it at present further than this—that an inquiry was made into the case of the 16 men on the Mongolia, and that the Report is expected every day. I have done all I can to get at the truth of the matter, and have prepared myself to answer questions on the subject, but none were asked by the hon. Member.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: I was out of town.

MR. MUNDELLA: Very well, the hon. Member cannot blame me for any delay. The hon. Member said that the Board of Trade officials encouraged crimps and shared the proceeds of advance notes with them. That is an allegation which ought not to have been made against any men in the service of the Board of Trade unless there is abundant proof of its truth. I do not believe that statement; and it is my duty to disbelieve it, because I believe that they are honourable men, and I did not either in 1886, nor do I find during my present term of Office, that any man in that employ is capable of being bribed into neglecting his duty.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON : It can be proved.

MR. MUNDELLA : Let the hon. Member give proof of what has been alleged, and not only will the offending official be dismissed from his employment, but he will also be subjected to prosecution for corruption in the discharge of his duty. With regard to all these matters, whilst on the one hand it is said that I am not impartial in dealing with the Shipping Federation, on the other hand complaint is made that I treat it with undue severity. That is some proof that I have the balance with tolerable equality. I much regret the present dispute at Hull; I have done my utmost to bring about a settlement. It is much to be regretted that the suggestions made have not been acted upon; but if the parties to the dispute had been left alone—if third parties had held aloof—I believe the matter would have been amicably settled. It is only fair I should make acknowledgment of what has been done by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. John Burns), who, much to his honour, took a most prominent part in trying to bring about an amicable settlement. He did everything a man could do in endeavouring to narrow the area of the strife and to prevent its extension to other ports of the country. Personally, I recognise as fully as anyone can that if any Organisation sets itself the impossible task of attempting to differentiate between the members of a great Union and non-Unionists in an attempt to break up a workman's Union not only will it ignominiously fail, but it will in the attempt produce disastrous results. I hope the hon. Member will not divide the House, and ask Members, by way of expressing their sympathy, to waste the rest of the evening by a premature adjournment. He will be taunted with such a result if he should be successful, and that would not be in the interest of the cause he desires to serve. If the hon. Member will bring before me any specific case of illegal employment or illegal supply I will submit it to my Legal Advisers.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I only wish to deal with one observation of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. He said this matter was brought forward without notice. One result of that is that the right hon. Member for West Bristol (Sir M. Hicks-Beach) is not in his place, and the President of the Board of Trade appears to throw responsibility for the action he has taken on him as his Predecessor.

MR. MUNDELLA : The right hon. Gentleman cannot have heard the speech of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, to which I was replying. I took all the responsibility for what I had done upon myself, and I referred to my Predecessor only because the hon. Member for Middlesbrough complained that his action was wrong three years ago.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Then I must have misunderstood the tenour of that part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. I understood that the right hon. Gentleman was not satisfied with the advice on which he had been acting, and prefers to take other advice.

MR. MUNDELLA : I have acted upon the advice of the Legal Department of the Board of Trade, but, if the interpretation of a clause is called in question, it is open to me to take other advice.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : If that be so, the right hon. Gentleman's confidence in the advice on which he has been acting is somewhat shaken. ["No, no!"] Well, I will not go into a question with which I am incompetent to deal, but I will confine myself to what I regard as most important—the action not of the President of the Board of Trade, but of the Home Secretary, who, so far as I understood, has behaved as a man holding a responsible position ought to behave in the somewhat difficult circumstances in which he was placed. Observations have been made to this effect: "We do not expect this kind of conduct from a Government pledged to labour interests." I do not believe that this Government or any Government would deserve the name of a Government if it were pledged to either labour interests or to capital interests. Every man in the House, to whatever Party he belongs, will sympathise with the efforts the right hon. Gentleman has made. In this matter there is no question between labour and capital dividing the two sides of the House. The business of the Government is perfectly clear. They ought to maintain the most rigid impartiality in all these labour questions as between the capitalist and the labourer, and use all such forces as are at their disposal, when they may be required, for the preservation of public order and the maintenance of individual liberty. I understood from the Home Secretary that these principles guided his action in this matter. I have every confidence in the statement the right hon. Gentleman has made on the subject, and, therefore, if this matter goes to a Division, I shall be found in the same Lobby with the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) wanted to know whether they were to understand that the President of the Board of Trade would submit Clause 146 to the Legal Advisers of the Crown, and, if their view supported that of the hon. and learned Member for York, that he would take action upon it?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): The speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I trust, we may consider as one of approval rather than animadversion, and, that being so, I think there can be no hesitation on our part in commending the doctrine he has laid down with respect to the obligation of absolute impartiality in dealing with matters of this kind. With respect to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, it is the clear and manifest duty of my right hon. Friend, in the circumstances, to refer the matter of law which has been raised to-day by a competent authority in the House to the Law Officers of the Crown. It is perfectly plain that in doing so my right hon. Friend is not at all open to the observation that he has been shaken in regard to the advice he has already received. It is the established practice of a Department of the Government in a question in which law is raised to take the advice, not at once necessarily of the Law Officers of the Crown, but of its own Legal Advisers. If their advice be brought in question and impugned by persons of serious and considerable authority, such as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for York (Mr. Lockwood), it is most natural, usual, proper, and politic that the head of the Department should fortify himself with the highest authority to which he has ordinarily access—namely, that of the Law Officers of the Crown—and it imparts no imputation or suspicion on his part with regard to his ordinary Advisers that he should find it his duty to endeavour to fortify them by reference to a weightier authority. There are only two observations I have to make with regard to the matters in this Debate. I think it impossible not to sympathise, with the principle involved in the remarks made with respect to anything like an unnecessary parade of military forces. It is most impolitic, unwise, and calculated to defeat the very purpose in view, assuming that the forces have been brought upon the ground for sufficient cause. I do not at all intend to say—I have no knowledge of the facts which would justify me in saying—that there has been any such parade. I am not prepared to pronounce any condemnation upon what has been done; but to the principle and the rule to which utterance has been given I entirely adhere; and in the spirit of that rule my right hon. Friend will regulate all his proceedings bearing upon this case. There is another point mentioned which is new to the Government. It is stated that the police in Hull have interfered with what is known as the practice of picketing. Now, picketing is a matter which, in certain conceivable circumstances, may degenerate into abuse. But, apart from abuse, it is legal and has received full sanction, and the interference of the police with it would be entirely discountenanced, and so far as we have the power would be prevented and put an end to by the authority of the Government. I hope that explanation will be regarded as perfectly clear. I am almost tempted to offer a suggestion on my own part, which is this—that if you were to go to a Division the issue would probably be a false one. If the House found it necessary to go to a Division, and there was a large number against the Adjournment and a small number voting in its favour, I am afraid it might be misconstrued as showing an indisposition to listen to the claims put forward by my hon. Friend on behalf of the strikers in Hull. I hope, if this question is brought to an issue, it will be brought to an issue in some form less equivocal than a Motion for the Adjournment. I hope my hon. Friend will be disposed to be content, in the interest of those whose cause he has so ably advocated, with the result of this discussion. If he should go to a Division the result may be open to misapprehension.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON said, he had no desire to put the House to unnecessary inconvenience. He thought that the discussion had greatly benefited the cause he advocated. It had cleared the atmosphere upon the question—a question that was causing much consideration outside the House. He was not quite satisfied with the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has the right of reply—he is quite in Order.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON said, he only wanted to reply to one or two remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. He (Mr. Wilson) had endeavoured as far as he could to work in perfect harmony with the officials of the Board of Trade, but he had found some disinclination on the part of those officials to work in harmony with him. The action of the officials of the Board of Trade had been most hostile to the men of the Union. As to the statement that the Board of Trade had not put the act in force, he should like to call attention to the fact that two and a half years ago a responsible official of the Board of Trade wrote to the secretaries of the Union to which he belonged threatening them with proceedings for supplying men. As, however, they had the promise that the matter would be submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, and not the officials of the Board of Trade, he was willing to accept that assurance and withdraw his Motion.

*MR. SPEAKER: Is it your pleasure that the Motion be withdrawn. [Cries of "No!"]

Question put, and negatived.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—SITTING ACCOMMODATION.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) said, he proposed to say only a very few words in bringing before the House a matter which affected the convenience of private Members. He had intended to propose a Resolution, and had put the following Notice on the Paper:—

"On Civil Service Estimates, to call attention to the inconvenience caused to Members wishing to find sitting accommodation in the House of Commons, owing to the present arrangements of the House; and to move, That it is desirable that this House should be so re-arranged as to afford every Member a permanent seat."

He was, however, now precluded by the Forms of the House from submitting this Motion. He knew that his proposal was unpopular with, and unacceptable to, the occupants of the two Front Benches, but he quite understood how that was. There was a tendency in all men to be selfish; and as hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the two Front Benches were always sure of their seats, they were unable to sympathise in any way with private Members, who experienced great difficulty in the discharge of their duties owing to insufficiency of accommodation in the House. The principle of Parliamentary representation was this: that every Member should have a seat in the House. Every Member was returned to sit there. He was not returned to fight for his seat in the House after his return by the vote of his constituents. He was not returned to take part in a rowdy scrimmage at the door with the result that one Member might be knocked down and others injured in order that he might have a place to listen to a great speech from the First Lord of the Treasury—and this was what had happened on the occasion of the right hon. Gentleman's introduction of the Home Rule Bill. As they were a new Parliament, as this was a matter affecting all private Members, and as they were approaching another great occasion—namely, the Committee stage on the Home Rule Bill, it was desirable that something should be said on this question. He found that in all Foreign and Colonial Parliaments every Member had a place assigned to him as of right. In 1867 a Select Committee was appointed to consider this question, and re-appointed in 1868. The Resolution of the House, in 1867, was—

In 1868 the Committee reported that there were substantial grounds for the complaint that the House was defective in extent of accommodation. If that was the case in 1868, before the number of Members had been increased by the Reform Bill, and when the attendance in the House was neither so large nor so regular as it was now, he thought there was abundant reason now to declare the accommodation insufficient. The Committee had further stated that the increased accommodation necessary could be best afforded by the construction of a new Chamber. On the floor of the House only 306 Members could be accommodated with seats, the total number of Members being 670; so that less than half the Members could be accommodated with seats. In the Gallery 124 could be seated, but could take no part in the proceedings. Besides that, 263 strangers could be accommodated. Compare this with the condition of things in Foreign Parliaments. In Italy, for instance, there were 492 Members of the Chamber, and on the floor there were 492 seats, and, besides that, there were seats also for 452 strangers. Strangers in this House included the Press, and they all knew that there had been frequent and most justifiable complaints from the Press with regard to insufficient accommodation. He had been asked by one or two hon. Members how he would allot seats, and his reply was that that was a small question, which it would be perfectly easy to deal with when the proper time came. It was not necessary to settle it, now the only question they had to consider being—“Has a Member a right to a seat, and is it desirable that he should take part in a scrimmage to secure one whenever a great event happens in the House?” Some Members—like himself—were busy men, and could not afford to waste hours hanging about the House in order to secure their seats. He thought that now they had popular representation the House of Commons ought to adopt the modern practice that was in force in the Parliaments of all civilised nations—namely, to allocate to each Member a seat, which he should retain as a right in the name of his constituency. There was an impression amongst the occupants of the Front Benches that to give each Member a seat would necessitate a very considerable enlargement of the House, and compel them to adopt the system of speaking from a tribune; but he did not hold that view. Neither could he accept the argument that the question should not be dealt with this year, for the reason that the number of Members from Ireland might be reduced from 103 to 80. He did not think that a reduction of 23 Members would make any material difference in the appropriation of seats, nor did he think there was much prospect of the reduction taking place at all. Two or three good plans had been prepared, showing how accommodation could be given to the whole of the Members on the floor of the House. It would not be necessary, as he had said, to adopt the tribune, which would be contrary to the practice, the experience, and the tastes of Englishmen. If they adopted, say, an oval shape for the House, it would not be necessary to have a tribune. At any rate, something should be done to relieve Members of the necessity to struggle for seats. If there was one thing he detested more than another it was a scrimmage, and at any time he would rather forego the pleasure of being present in the House on an important occasion than go through the indignity of rushing and pushing and fighting for a seat, especially as he had a legitimate title to a seat without it. He had never been able to understand on what principle hon. Members had to obtain a fresh seat every night, and struggle to obtain it, and he thought that over 600 Members ought not to be put to the necessity of trying to obtain accommodation in a House built to accommodate 300.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) regretted that the hon. Baronet who had introduced this subject was not able to take a Division on his Resolution, though there was reason to believe, from what had happened on previous occasions, that it would not have been adopted owing to the opposition of hon. Gentlemen on the Front Benches. The Front Bench Members obtained their seats no matter how late they were in putting in an appearance, and they were also privileged in having the Table in front of them on which to place their notes and rest their elbows when making speeches. And, forsooth, because these hon. and right hon. Gentlemen suffered no inconvenience, they were not disposed to listen to the legitimate complaints of hon. Members who were not so favourably placed as themselves. The only persons satisfied with the existing state of things in the House were the occupants of the two Front Benches and the hatters—the latter not only because of the damage done to hats in the struggle to get into the House, but because, having no other place to put them, Members about to speak placed their hats on the seat behind them, and very often, when they had finished speaking, sat down upon them. Apart from the Front Bench Gentlemen and the hatters, he did not believe anyone was satisfied with the present arrangement. Visitors to the House invariably exclaimed—"What a small place it is! How do you all manage to get seats?" A Member who was anxious to secure a seat had to come down to the House sometimes as early as 6 o'clock in the morning and deposit a hat upon the Bench. He was told on good authority that in some portion of the building there was a stock of hats kept for such occasions by some hon. Members. Two or three hours before the sitting of the House one of these hats was taken out of a locker and put on the Bench, while the hon. Member, wearing his ordinary hat, marched out of the building. This, he believed, was contrary to the rule or understanding which had prevailed in previous Parliaments. In the endeavour to secure seats other hon. Members sometimes placed a card or a scrap of paper with their names written upon it on the Bench, and some used a glove, or adopted the meaner device of getting a person about the building to deposit a card on the seat. Members who attended at Committees were privileged to put a pink card in the slot to enable them to occupy the seat in front of it during the Sitting; but it frequently happened that, coming down at 11 or half-past 11 o'clock, they found cards placed on the seats, not by the Members themselves, but by other persons, the Members coming down leisurely to take their seats 10 minutes or a quarter of an hour before the opening of the proceedings. That was taking a mean advantage of Members who had been serving on Committees, and he hoped that some steps would be taken by the Authorities of the House to prevent the practice being continued. He had visited the Chambers of France, Italy, Switzerland, and the United States, and everyone who contrasted the advantages accorded to Members in the Legislative Chambers of those countries with the House of Commons must give their verdict for the proposal of the hon. Baronet. In the French Chamber every Member had a seat allotted to him, and the acoustic properties of the place were excellent. If the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works wanted a model for a Chamber, let him go to the Senate House in the Luxembourg at Paris. The difficulty of allotting the seats if the House were enlarged would not be a great one. In the United States the process did not occupy more than three-quarters of an hour at the opening of a new Congress. He thought it had been a mistake to construct the House of Commons in this longitudinal shape, and he would suggest that in any reconstruction which took place one of the walls should be carried back 30 feet, which would render it possible to construct a Chamber of a horse-shoe shape which would provide the requisite amount of accommodation. If that suggestion were adopted, the First Commissioner of Works should be assisted in carrying it out by a number of practical men especially selected for that purpose—he did not mean a Committee like that appointed in the last Parliament to consider certain alterations, which alterations had been made at considerable expense, but which, in the estimation of many hon. Members, were by no means improvements. If a Committee were appointed without a contingent of practical men upon it he (Mr. Cremer) should oppose it.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: This matter was discussed at some length on the Vote on Account before Easter, and at the close of that Debate I stated that I would consult the Government on the question. I have done so, and I have now to say that the Government consider that this is a matter for the House, and that if there appears to be a general desire that a Committee should be appointed they will not oppose it. At the same time, their advice is that the Motion for the Committee should not be brought on till next Session. And the reason for that is this: If you look back to the last six or seven Parliaments, you will see that at the beginning of every first Session there have always been many complaints of inconvenience to Members and want of accommodation, and that pressure has been put upon the Government to consent to an alteration of the House. There have been Motions made for Committees and frequent Debates; but hon. Members have always been met by successive Governments with the recommendation that the appointment of a Committee should be postponed until the next Session, and when the next Session has arrived the pressure has disappeared. I am bound to admit that in the early part of the present Session more inconvenience was felt by Members than at any time in the past; but there was an unusual number of new Members in the House who exercised their privilege of coming into the House to take part in its proceedings. That state of things will probably not continue, and, indeed, a considerable change has taken place since Easter. I have made it my business to take careful note of the attendance from time to time; and since Easter I have observed that, although there has been a number of first-rate Debates, on such subjects as Home Rule, the Budget, Egypt, and the Eight Hours Question, at no time has the House been inconveniently filled. On Wednesday there were 500 Members in the precincts of the House; but at the time when the House was fullest I counted the Members present, and there were not more than 200.

SIR J. GOLDSMID: There were over 300 at one time.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: That might have been just before the Division.

SIR J. GOLDSMID: No, it was not.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The floor of the House can accommodate 346 Members; so that, even if the hon. Baronet is right, there were 46 empty seats.

SIR J. GOLDSMID: There are only 306 seats where Members are permitted to take part in the Debates.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: There is sitting room on the floor of the House for 346 Members, and seats in the Galleries for 100. On the last night of the Home Rule Debate, just before the Division, although the two Leaders spoke, there were, excepting the last few minutes before the Division, several empty seats to be found in all parts of the House. I drew from that the conclusion that already other attractions had induced hon. Members not to crowd into the House. We shall have ample experience during the remainder of the Session, and it will be interesting to observe whether the House will be in a normal condition during the prolonged Home Rule contest. If, after that experience, there should be a general desire next Session to appoint a Committee, the Government will assent to it. As to the proposal that the House should be so enlarged as to afford accommodation to the whole of the 670 Members on the floor, I am strongly opposed to it. It may be wise to so enlarge the House as to do away with the existing inconvenience, but to enlarge it so as to provide a seat for every Member is, I think, a proposition which would not be entertained by the majority of Members in the House. I may remind hon. Members that there are very few occasions in the House when there are so many as 550 present. The House will doubtless be surprised to hear that during the present Session there have only been two occasions on which more than 550 Members have voted, and only nine where there were 500. The average number of occasions on which there have been more than 550 Members present, even for the purpose of voting, is not more than two in each Session. It is obvious, therefore, that as a rule a large number of Members are always absent from the precincts of the House. Under the circumstances it would not be wise to follow the example of Foreign Legislatures referred to by the hon. Member for Shoreditch, and provide seats for all our Members. The hon. Member asked me if I had visited Foreign Chambers. I have; and I must say I deprecate following their example. If we have to find a seat for every Member we shall have to enlarge the House to such an extent that it will be necessary to have resort to the tribune. ["No, no!"] Yes; that is my opinion. We should have to so enlarge the House that it would be impossible for hon. Members to speak in the ordinary way from their seats. We should have to resort to the practice of foreign countries. That would entirely alter the character of the House, and I should be most strongly opposed to it.

*MR. CREMER: If the right hon. Gentleman has been present at Debates in the Chamber at Washington he will have noticed that none of the Members speak from the tribune. In Continental Chambers it is optional.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID: I have frequently seen Members speak from their places in the French Chamber.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: They can speak from their places, but in important Debates they generally speak from the tribune. The difference between those Houses and ours is that in them a large proportion of the work is done in Committee and only a small proportion in the House, whilst here the bulk of the work is done in the House. It is, therefore, desirable that the Chamber in which we sit should not be very large. On the whole, I think this House fairly meets the necessities of the case. It may be too small to meet requirements in extraordinary Debates; but the question is whether, for the purpose of providing for extraordinary occasions which occur only two or three times in a Session, it is desirable to put the House to inconvenience in its ordinary and normal condition? If the experience of the remainder of the Session should show that the present arrangements are inconvenient to Members, the Government will consent to a Committee meeting this year; but, for my part, I should desire that that Committee should confine itself to the question whether there may be some enlargement of the House, with the view of meeting the special cases I have referred to, and that it should not go into the wider question that has been suggested—namely, that of providing a place for every single Member. That, in my opinion, would be altogether unnecessary, and would inevitably lead to the adoption of the tribune.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said, he could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman should want to delay the appointment of the Committee till next Session. A Committee went very fully in the matter in 1867-8, and reported that increased accommodation could be obtained in a most satisfactory manner and without interrupting the Business of the House. The Committee were of opinion that the alterations could be easily accomplished in the space of the Recess at a cost of some £120,000. The right hon. Gentleman said that since Easter the accommodation of the House had been ample. Since Easter, however, the proceedings with one exception, had not been of the interesting character that they were sometimes. Next week a very different state of affairs would be witnessed. Even that evening the House had been inconveniently crowded. There was no doubt that a large number of hon. Members absented themselves from the House, because of the difficulty they found in obtaining accommodation. That might be the "Mother of Parliaments;" but there was no Parliament House in any part of the world which was so inconvenient to Members, and also to strangers, as that at Westminster. It was perfectly disgraceful that hon. Members, the greater number of whom had other avocations to pursue, should, in order to obtain a seat on any important occasion, have to be at the House at 11 or 12 o'clock in the day and, according to the Rule, not leave the House subsequently. There were 669 Members of the House, excluding the Speaker, and there were only 240 seats from which any part could be taken in the proceedings. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see whether he could not suggest some means of improving the accommodation, and thus distinguish his tenure of Office as First Commissioner of Works.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, that might be the Mother of Parliaments, but it was a most unjust step-mother to its own children, because it did not provide room for them in its lap. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner had started a most extraordinary theory. He seemed to be under the impression that when anybody got into the House of Commons his duty was to keep out of it as much as possible. It would be interesting to know whether the Government Whip shared the right hon. Gentleman's opinion on this point. The right hon. Gentleman said he himself was opposed to any change in the House; and, therefore, on the sic volo sic jubeo principle, he would not allow the matter to be discussed. If his hand was forced on the subject, he thought that the obnoxious addition to the accommodation of the House should be limited as much as possible, and that the House should not, in any event, be enlarged sufficiently to provide accommodation for all its Members. What would be said of any County Council in the country which, being in want of a proper meeting place, calmly built up a hall in which only half its Members could find places? The Government had come into power with a great Newcastle Programme, and were always complaining of delays; and yet, when a Committee was proposed on an important subject of this kind, the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner said, "Let us put it off for a year." What would the Government say if he (Mr. Labouchere) said—"Let us put off Home Rule for a year." In view of the strong opinion which had been expressed in favour of some alteration, it was only fair and reasonable that a Committee should be appointed during the present Session. He knew his hon. Friend could not divide on the present proposal, and he had put down a little Amendment of his own in favour of reducing the First Commissioner's salary by £50. There would be two advantages in voting on that Amendment—they would get the Committee, and at the same time would save the country £50.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) was of opinion that better accommodation ought to be provided for the House. He remembered, on one occasion, Mr. Mitchell Henry making a Motion from a very effective standpoint—he was obliged to address the House from the Gallery, and he said he did so because he could not get a seat down below. It seemed to him (Dr. Farquharson) that a Committee would be extremely valuable, because they must have regard to the future, when hon. Members would be called on to attend in their places much more than they did now. It was probable that ere long they would have payment of Members, and hon. Members would then have to attend to their duties with much greater assiduity than they did now. They would have to be almost constant in their attendance, therefore they would expect to have proper accommodation. But there were only two points worthy of consideration. When the Home Rule Bill passed, whether the Irish Members were retained at Westminster or not, it was evident that they would not come here in such numbers as they did now, nor be so assiduous in their attendance. That, to a certain extent, would relieve the House. Then—and this was his second point—if they had Home Rule for Ireland it was probable that they would have Home Rule all round—Scotch and Welsh as well as Irish Home Rule. The House would then, in all likelihood, be solely devoted to Imperial questions, and the strain on it would be less even if the number of Members were not reduced. There was a good deal to be said on both sides of the question, therefore he was anxious to see a Committee appointed.

*MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.) thought that the answer of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works was insufficient for the needs and requirements of the present day. It had been decided by a Committee of the House, as long ago as 1868, that greater accommodation for Members was required, and it seemed to him that what they had to do now was to set to work and see how that additional accommodation could best be provided. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had used what appeared to him to be a very curious and, perhaps, unfortunate expression when he said that hon. Members came into the House in large numbers at the beginning of the Session because, forsooth, of the privilege they enjoyed of listening to important speeches. He had been brought up to believe that it was part of the duty of an hon. Member returned to the House to come and listen to the speeches of leading Members in order that they might form a reasonable judgment on the matters debated. It was no argument to him to say that the House was not always full, or was only sometimes full, and that, therefore, there was no necessity for additional accommodation. He knew very well from his own experience that Members were very often reluctant to come into the House on crowded evenings, because they knew they would suffer so much discomfort. It was said that if the House were enlarged it would be more difficult to hear Members' speeches. Well, he was prepared to assert the exact contrary. Members below the Gangway at present were unable to hear a great deal of the conversation which took place between the occupants of the two Front Benches across the Table; and if the House were enlarged it would be necessary that those Gentlemen should speak louder, so that everyone could hear them. There was a Committee now sitting to inquire into the subject of reporting the proceedings of Parliament, and all the evidence which had been received from the gentlemen who were good enough to sit in the House night after night reporting its proceedings went to show the difficulty experienced in hearing what was said on the floor. It would, therefore, be wise for the First Commissioner of Works to reconsider his decision, and appoint a Committee to consider the questions of the accommodation in the House and the accommodation in the Reporters' Gallery together. They might then be able to arrive at the ideal of the Secretary of State for War—solvitur ambulando.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present, AFFAIRS IN SWAZILAND.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) rose to call attention to affairs in Swaziland. He said the principal reason why he called attention to this important matter was that since 1890 the House had received no Reports on the country, and no information as to its affairs of a definite or adequate character from the Government. He thought the House should know whether it was true that a Conference had recently assembled in South Africa in regard to Swaziland; also what were the terms of the Reference to that Conference; and whether it was true, as stated in some newspapers, that the result of that Conference would be in the no distant future the handing over of this important territory—so far as it was in our power to hand it over—to the Boer Republic. Swaziland was not a very large country, being about 10,000 square miles in extent. At one time it was a portion of the Zulu nation, but now it was practically a separate and independent country. On the West it was bounded by the Drakenberg range of mountains, some 5,000 feet high, and supposed to be possessed of great potentialities in the way of gold mines; and on the East it was bounded by the Lebombo range. Its Southern limit was a line drawn by the Pingolo, and its Northern limit was determined by another artificial line which started from the Lebombo range to a spot opposite Delagoa Bay. The surface of the country was diversified by swelling grass-covered hills and valleys abounding with timber. Some people had said the country could be approached only by a balloon; but he was credibly informed that £120,000 of machinery had been taken to a mine which had been opened in the country with the greatest ease. The kernel of the country was the central plateau, about 2,000 feet high, where the Boers wintered their cattle. Indeed, the Boers, who brought nothing into the country, took a great deal from it, and the wintering of their cattle in that fashion had caused a great number of disputes with the natives. Turning to the historical aspect of the question, he would explain how it came to pass that we gave assurances to this small nationality, of about 50,000 or 60,000 inhabitants, that we would, to some extent, defend their independence. No one could deny that in 1876 the Transvaal Boers were in a hopeless state of bankruptcy, and were in great danger of being swamped by the Zulus. At that time the British Government was induced—he would not say whether rightly or wrongly—to enter into a contest with the Zulus, and he could not help regretting that we should have been forced to treat as a foe Cetewayo, who was willing, at that particular time, to be our friend. The intention then was, according to Sir Theophilus Shepstone, to protect the Swazis from being overcome by the Zulus. That had been always recalled by the Swazis.

Mr. Anstruther

They had always recalled the fact that their nationality was about to be taken away from them by the Zulus when they, to some extent, received the protection of Great Britain. When, in 1877, we lavished British blood and money in fighting the Zulus, and destroying the danger which threatened the broken-down Boer Republic on its borders, and were compelled, not without reluctance, to take upon ourselves the burden of reorganising and administering the broken down commonweal as a Crown Colony, the Boers showed their gratitude by plotting to get rid of us; and they plotted against us, he admitted, with some success. They sent a deputation to this country, who were received by the right hon. Gentleman the present Member for West Bristol (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), and the right hon. Gentleman gave, on that occasion, the only straightforward statement the House had received from either Party on this subject. But soon after that a Liberal Government, presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, came into Office in 1880. We had to reflect, with some humiliation, on the disastrous campaign in the Transvaal, ending with Majuba Hill, after which we, without due reason or due cause, give up that valuable country to the Boers. In the Treaty we then made there was a clause that we were determined to maintain the independence of Swaziland. Did the Swazis long to be annexed to the Transvaal? He had no doubt that if the Europeans in Swaziland were polled they would be found in favour of annexation, for the majority of them were Boers; but he ventured to say that the Swazis themselves were very hostile to annexation. And why should they wish to be annexed to the Boer Republic? They were, it was true, surrounded on all sides by powerful nationalities, but that was no reason why they should give up their independence. In Europe, the Swiss, a small nationality, and, like the Swazis, surrounded by powerful States, had been able to maintain their independence. He did not think it right for any Member of the House to say hard words of people belonging to another nationality, but he could not help saying that the action of the Boers towards the Swazis was not altogether of a kindly character. In fact, the Boers had treated the Swazis in the way the negroes had been treated in South America, and, furthermore, they had done their best to degrade and debase the Swazis by importing a large amount of alcoholic liquors into the country. We protected the Swazis from the Zulu power, and the Swazis did their best for us on another occasion. Their King sent 8,000 of his picked warriors—which practically meant every man in the country who could bear arms—to aid Sir Garnet Wolseley in his campaign against Sekukuni. Writing of the Swazis Sir Garnet Wolseley said—

“They went home happy and contented, having done us remarkably good service during the campaign. They responded to my call with great alacrity when I sent for them, and from the kindness with which they were treated by us, and the signal success that attended the campaign, I have no doubt we shall always be able to count upon their invaluable assistance whenever we require it to quell any native troubles in this part of Africa.”

There was evidence in the Blue Books that Sir Garnet Wolseley, Sir Evelyn Wood, and Sir Theophilus Shepstone had guaranteed the integrity of their country to the Swazis. We had not a large Army in comparison with the territory we possessed, and our supremacy rested on the fact that British honour and British promises could be relied on; that whatever was said by the British Government or by a British official was always acted on, and he thought that in South Africa it would be a grave disaster if our promises to the Swazis were gone behind. English capitalists had expended large sums of money in an effort to develop the country, and were the fruits of that enterprise to be handed over to the Boer Republic? An Englishman had no political rights at all in the Transvaal. He had about as much political right as a helot had in Sparta, and if he changed his nationality and became a subject of the Transvaal Republic he had to wait for 16 years before he had the right to vote; no foreigner could be naturalised until he had resided in the country for 16 years, and that despite the fact that the country was being opened out by British skill and enterprise. No progress had taken place in any public Department. The Boers were paramount. In 1880 we allowed the Republic, on the flimsiest pretext, to extend its borders along the Southern border of Swaziland. By an Article of the Treaty of Pretoria, 1881, the independence of Swaziland was fully recognised. In 1884 that Treaty was ratified by the present Prime Minister, and in 1890 the independence of Swaziland was confirmed by Treaty. He thought this country should be very careful to consider whether she would not be going behind those Treaty arrangements if Swaziland was allowed to drift from the practical sovereignty of the Queen to the domination of the Boer Republic. Last year the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies said he felt very strongly the duty of protecting the natives in this matter, and that he was fully awake to the duty incumbent on the Government to encourage and protect British enterprise. The Swazis wished to prolong their autonomy as a nation. He did not say Great Britain could cede Swaziland to the Transvaal. We might as well talk of ceding Afghanistan to Russia, or Morocco to France. The only part we could play in such a transaction was that of accomplices in a flagrant and perfidious act of robbery. No possible guarantee could be given that we should receive even the pitiful price for which we might bargain in return for our share in the betrayal of allies and the violation of all principles of humanity. The annexation of Swaziland by the Boers would place at their mercy the large amount of capital already invested in the country by British subjects, and would set the latter in the same humiliating and disadvantageous position as was occupied by the Uitlanders in the Transvaal. The native population would be doomed under Boer rule, their hatred of which had been plainly expressed, to slavery, oppression, and final extinction. He would like to know from the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what the Government intended to do in this matter?

DR. CLARK (Caithness) said, the hon. Member was in ignorance of the geography of the country and its history. He was utterly mistaken as regarded the geography. Swaziland was entirely surrounded by the Transvaal except on the East. It was not bounded by Natal. As to the assertion made in reference to the treatment of the natives in the Transvaal, he had never heard a more rash or untrue statement. A despatch sent to this country by the British Agent, appointed under the provisions of the Treaty of 1884, showed that he had never seen people so comfortable as the protected tribes in the Transvaal. He himself had never seen a people more comfortable, or in such a high state of civilisation, as the protected tribes. It was also amusing to him to hear that an Englishman in the Transvaal could not obtain civil or political rights, must forswear his nationality, and must have been 16 years in the country before he had a right to vote. There were two Chambers in the country, and any man after two years' residence could vote for one, and after five years' residence could vote for both Chambers. All the statements made by the hon. Member, without exception, were absolutely untrue. He wanted to know, as well as the hon. Member, what the Government were going to do with regard to Swaziland, because we had done a great deal of damage to the country by the course we pursued in 1881. The Swazis were the only race in South Africa that the Boers had never fought. The Swazis had always been the allies and friends of the Boers, and there was a great deal of sympathy between them. The condition of Swaziland had now become something terrible, and it was getting demoralised and degraded beyond conception. As we could only get to Swaziland by going through the Transvaal territory, or through Portuguese territory, he did not think there was any course open to them but to come to terms with the Boers, and to hand that country back to the Transvaal. He did not say there was no other course; but if that course should be taken he hoped they would not play the game that was always played of making this concession to the Boers in return for something else, and without regard to the interests of the natives. No settlement of Swaziland that did not give the Swazi people their own soil would be satisfactory.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. Buxton, Tower Hamlets, Poplar) said, it was not necessary for him to enter into the historical part of the question, the "ancient history" raised by the hon. Member. They had to take things as they were. Unfortunately, in this matter, they were not dealing with a clean slate, but had to bear in mind what had happened in the past. He wished to say at once that Her Majesty's Government had in no sense raised this question of Swaziland of their own accord. They had not wanted to raise the question, but they believed that they were bound in good faith to the South African Republic, if it were raised, to discuss it on friendly and amicable terms. The hon. Member opposite said he did not agree with the policy of his Party with regard to the Swaziland Convention of 1890. That might be so, but the Government, coming into Office as they did, found themselves obliged to deal with the Convention as it stood, and with the pledges given by the late Government in regard to the Transvaal. Upon that point he thought he ought to say a word or two, because he wished that House to understand that, as far as the Government were concerned, they were not wantonly raising this Swaziland question. The Convention of 1890, which was about to expire, was admittedly a temporary Convention. It was only intended to last for three years, and the South African Republic had contended that when certain matters were settled, when Swaziland was in a satisfactory state, and when the concession question was settled, they were entitled to raise the question at an earlier period than three years. When the late Government negotiated that Convention through Sir Henry Loch with the Representative of the South African Republic it was stated specifically to the Transvaal Government that when the joint Government (British and South African) was established and the Concession Clauses were settled, it would consider such questions as the Government of the South African Republic might bring before it, with a desire to meet the wishes of the South African Republic as far as possible. When this Convention was ratified by the Volksraad similar words were used by them as a condition of ratification. Further, when the great trek northwards was anticipated in 1891, Her Majesty's Government undertook that if President Krüger would prevent the trek, which would have been very dangerous to our Mashonaland possessions, they would be prepared to consider this question before the expiration of the three years mentioned in the Convention. As regarded the question of three years, he might say at once that in a sense it was immaterial, as the three years had nearly expired. But it was material in the sense that it showed throughout all the discussions that the South African Republic expected from the very beginning that when certain circumstances occurred they would be entitled to come to the British Government and say—"We have done our part; do yours. Meet us and discuss these questions on friendly terms." Under these circumstances, so long ago as 1890, the late Government agreed that Sir Henry Loch should confer with President Krüger in order to discuss the matter with a view of meeting the South African Republic as far as possible. For certain reasons not connected with Swaziland the meeting fell through; but, last February, the late Government agreed that Sir Henry Loch should meet President Krüger and discuss the question; and Lord Knutsford, in a despatch to Sir Henry dated February 2nd, 1892, said—

"Her Majesty's Government, however, have every desire to meet as far as is possible the wishes of the South African Republic, and I have now to authorise you to inform President Krüger that you are prepared to receive, as representing Her Majesty's Government in South Africa, proposals from him respecting the government of Swaziland."

He quoted that to show what was the opinion of the late Government in regard to this matter. When the present Government came into Office they found that this meeting had been arranged; and, so far as they were concerned, they had no option in the matter but to allow Sir Henry Loch to meet President Krüger and to discuss this question, with a view as far as possible of meeting the wishes of the South African Republic. He was quite sure his hon. Friend opposite would not expect him at the present moment to state what exactly were the instructions to Sir Henry Loch, or the exact conclusion come to at that Conference. But he might say that Sir Henry Loch and President Krüger met and amicably discussed the matter, and Sir Henry Loch had stated that he was well satisfied with the discussion and its results. But it was in the nature of a discussion and not of a decision, and for this reason—President Krüger, as they understood by telegraph, had no absolute powers to conclude the Convention then and there under his Constitution without reference to the Volksraad. There was, however, a very considerable exchange of views, certain bases were arrived at on both sides, which he believed would be found to be satisfactory to both parties; and later on there would probably be a further interview between Sir Henry Loch and President Krüger in order to draw up and to arrive at a final decision in regard to the matter. Of course, before any final agreement was come to, all the points would be referred home for decision before Sir Henry Loch would be entitled to sign on behalf of Her Majesty's Government. But he would say at once that, as to the rights of the whites, all their personal proprietary and political rights must be and ought to be preserved; and, so far as legitimate British interests existed, they also would be carefully and properly preserved. Further, in regard to the question of the natives, he could assure hon. Members that their interests would in no sense be neglected, and in any negotiations as to the future of Swaziland they would take care that the natives should not be coerced into coming to any agreement with the Transvaal Government if they objected to do so; and that in any arrangement between the Transvaal and England the consent of the natives should be intelligently and effectually given, and that they should not be harried, hurried, or deceived into accepting any Convention to which they might afterwards object. He would say, further, that any arrangement as between the Boers and the natives would necessarily be subject to terms to which the assent of the Government must be given, and that assent would not be given unless they had full guarantees that such native rights as did exist were properly preserved. He ought, perhaps, to say this in reference to what his hon. Friend had said as to what he had called the independence of the natives. It was perfectly true that independence was recognised, though it was not guaranteed, under the Conventions of 1880 and 1890. But it was recognised in the sense that neither party to the Convention might negotiate with the natives without the assent of the other. If it was now considered advisable that the Transvaal Government should be allowed to enter into negotiations with the natives, it would only be allowed under strict guarantees as to the rights of the natives. The hon. Member opposite said that if they allowed the Transvaal to extend to Swaziland they would extend further, take over Tongaland, and obtain possession of and accession to Delagoa Bay. In any agreement the Government would take care that the absolute independence of Tongaland as regarded the South African Republic should be assured, and that the position of Delagoa Bay would be in no way affected by any concession to the Transvaal in connection with these negotiations, and should remain in the same position as at present.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) thought the House should be satisfied with the assurances given by the Under Secretary for the Colonies. The hon. Gentleman said the interests of the natives would be safeguarded, and their wishes duly ascertained, and that they should not be coerced or harried into acceptance of Boer Government. What he wished to draw attention to was that when the Conference took place in Swaziland two years ago the wishes of the people in one particular direction, and that was, as to the encouragement of intoxication and the demoralisation of the people by drink. On that occasion he brought the matter before the House, and he read from the Blue Book the verbatim Report of the Conference that took place between the Representative of the Transvaal Republic, our own Representative, and the Representatives of the Swazi people, and he had read nothing more pathetic than the appeals made by the head men of the Swazis that we should stop the importation of drink, because restrictions were perfectly delusive. What was the result? He appealed to the hon. Member the late Under Secretary for the Colonies, and all the answer he got from the Tory Government was that the whole matter was closed, and it was impossible to reopen it. The matter was not closed so far as they were concerned. He would appeal to his hon. Friend who had charge of this matter, now that he was talking of safeguarding the rights of the natives, that he would see that the protection of these helpless individuals against demoralisation by drink was properly carried out. With reference to the arguments which had been placed before the House by the hon. Member who raised this discussion, he wondered what particular motive an hon. Gentleman on that side of the House had in raising the question. He believed he was right in saying that there were a certain clique of persons in this country interested in some of those concessions which had been friendly relations existing, as they now happily did, between this country and the Boers of the Transvaal, it was worth while to maintain those friendly relations, because every sensible man, every far-seeing statesman, whether in the Transvaal or in the Cape Colony, looked forward to the day when there would be some kind of federation of the States of South Africa, whether it was under the British or South African flag, when they would all be in harmony, and when there would be no fear of such dismal scenes as took place in the war of a few years go. He hoped, whatever decision they took in connection with this question, that good would result from it to the States of South Africa.

SCOTTISH PALACES AND CASTLES.

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) had the following Notice on the Paper:—

"To call attention to the neglected condition of the Holyrood and Linlithgow Palaces, and Edinburgh, Stirling, Dumbarton, and Blackness Castles, and to move, 'That these Scottish Palaces and Castles should be put and kept in a decent state of repair, as agreed upon at the time of the Union.'"

He said he did not propose to take up more than a few minutes in dealing with this matter. He wanted the Government to understand that these buildings were national property, and should be protected and kept in decent repair by the Government, as was agreed upon at the time of the Treaty with Scotland. The First Commissioner of Works was good enough, early in the Session, to promise, with regard to the Palaces of Holyrood and Linlithgow and Edinburgh Castle, to go and see these places later in the year. He was satisfied with that promise, and did not, therefore, propose to trouble the House with any remarks as to these places. With regard to Stirling Castle, he wanted to get some undertaking from the Minister for War. Part of the building, containing a chapel, palace, and hall, with which the Secretary for War should have nothing to do with, had been taken by the War Authorities; and he wanted to have an undertaking from the right hon. Gentleman that he would put that portion in repair and give it back to the Civil Authorities of the country. He understood that the hall and palace and chapel had been made into a barracks, a canteen, and all sorts of strange things. The Scottish Society of Antiquarians had communicated with the right hon. Gentleman, and he (Mr. Morton) would be quite satisfied if the right hon. Gentleman would say that he would give consideration to the representation that had been made by that Society and to any other representations that might yet be made by other Societies.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, his hon. Friend took him between wind and water, because he was not only Minister for War, but also Member for Stirling, and a Scotsman as well, so that he had three reasons for being very sedulous in his care of the Castle of Stirling. He did not know that the hon. Member had displayed any intimate knowledge of the subject which he had discussed.

MR. A. C. MORTON: May I tell the right hon. Gentleman that I could have done so, but I did not want to take up the time of the House.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN acknowledged the desire of his hon. Friend to spare the time of the House, and would follow him in the example he had set. He would only say that, in the observations the hon. Member had made as to what had occurred, he had mixed up one or two things which were not connected with each other. Undoubtedly Stirling Castle, which contained within the fortress—if it could be called a fortress—the old Parliament House and a chapel and other buildings of interest, had been very badly treated in past years. He had paid very close attention to it himself. He had gone over every part of it, and the general conclusion he had come to was that they had better endeavour to prevent the process of destruction and degradation going any further. As to attempting to restore what ^d ^c ^{re} was in times past, he was afraid th^t would merely let in the imaginative a^r ^t ⁱ ^t ^e ^c ^t ⁱ ^c ^t, and that possibly the so-called r^e ^s ^t ^o ^r ^a ^t ⁱ ^o ⁿ ^s might be even worse than the present condition of things. That was the general impression on his mind. As the hon. Member had said, he had received a communication from the Society that had been referred to, and he had answered them. He would keep a very close watch on the matter, and with all his heart he would be delighted to do anything to save the old buildings and the associations connected with them.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) thought that there was one thing worse than the imaginative architect, and that was the unimaginative soldier, who had had possession of Stirling and Edinburgh Castles, and had worked great mischief on both. Edinburgh Castle had been happily rescued from him. He (Mr. Smith) trusted that a certain amount of money might be found to set free the most interesting parts of Stirling Castle from the present use to which they had been turned; and that they might have buildings containing objects of the greatest historical interest in Scotland kept in a better way than they had been. If any spur were needed to induce the right hon. Gentleman to be unselfish enough to devote a certain amount of public money to this end, he might rest assured that none of them would grudge it to him, or suspect him of unworthy motives in doing that which would be to the advantage of his constituency and the country at large.

Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Clause 1 (Import Duty on tea).

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he had given Notice to move the rejection of this clause, but he was well aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not afford to do away with the Tea Duty. Personally, he should have preferred that he had done that and increased the Income Tax. But the expenditure might have been reduced by £3,500,000 if the right hon. Gentleman had had the courage to do it. He trusted during the present Session to give the right hon. Gentleman many opportunities of voting with him for the reduction of Expenditure. It might be said that the Chancellor would not have money if the duty were abolished on tea; but that was not his (Mr. Morton's) business. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could get money some other way. This was his business: the Liberal Party were pledged to do away with this tax, and, for himself, he was resolved to carry out the Newcastle Programme as far as he could. He hoped that early next Session the right hon. Gentleman would be able to announce that he intended to do away with the Tea Duty altogether.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): Like the great Don Fernando, we can "do no more than man can do." I cannot repeal the Tea Duty in the face of a deficit of £1,500,000. I am extremely anxious to reduce the duty, but my hon. Friend must feel that in the circumstances of the time it is impossible to take the course he suggests.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) said, the Government had pledged themselves to give the foremost place to the Government of Ireland Bill, and when that pledge was given they knew what they were going to do. The words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to this and other reforms in the Budget were as satisfactory as they could expect from any Minister in his responsible position. The right hon. Gentleman was in favour of imposing further burdens on the rich and of relieving the burdens on the poor; and with these pledges he thought the Committee, in present circumstances, ought to be entirely satisfied. Next year, however, they would expect from the Chancellor of the Exchequer one of the greatest Budgets brought forward for many years.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) did not agree with his hon. Friend. The difficulty would not be in carrying Home Rule through the House, but in carrying it before the country. If the Liberal Party sacrificed everything for Home Rule, and appealed to the country afterwards, he was afraid the appeal would not be favourably responded to. The Government would be told that the old story was being repeated—a Liberal Government came into power and did nothing to give effect to its opinions. He wished to point out the inequality of taxation in the Death Duties, and how the differentiation was in favour of realty and against personalty—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! The hon. Member is wandering from the point before the Committee.

DR. CLARK said, if he was ruled out of Order he would resume his seat at once.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2, 3, and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Repeal of certain exemptions from the Stamp Duty on receipts).

MR. E. B. HOARE (Hampstead) said, he would like to have information as to the meaning of this clause. It was an innocent-looking clause, but, somehow, it appeared to him to be somewhat revolutionary in practice.

SIR W. HARCOURT: A new practice has arisen within the last year or two of cheques having attached to them a receipt in regular form, acknowledging the receipt of the money. Under cover of the Act of 1891 those receipts are headed, "No stamp is required with this receipt," and the consequence is that the receipts escape the stamp. I have consulted several bankers on the subject, and they agree that this evasion of the stamp ought to be stopped. In old days these exemptions arose when the charges were very much higher. When the exemption from a receipt stamp for a cheque was first allowed in 1804 on bills of exchange, cheques were subject to an ad valorem stamp beginning at 8d. and rising to 7s., but cheques now only pay 1d. Receipts were subject to an ad valorem stamp rising from 2d. to 5s., and now they are at 1d. The hon. Member, I am sure, would not desire to see any system established that would evade the very moderate receipt stamp of 1d. The endorsement upon a cheque payable to order is a necessary part of the cheque, and is not a receipt which would require a stamp.

MR. E. B. HOARE said, he was perfectly satisfied with the explanation. He had not the least desire to countenance any evasion of the law; but he wished for an actual legal interpretation of the words, which appeared to him to be very wide. Railway dividend warrants, which were drawn with a place for the signature of the proprietor at the bottom, up to the present time bore an ordinary 1d. stamp, and were paid at once. He imagined that the Railway Companies considered they had got a receipt, but the matter, which was one of very great importance, required perfectly clear legislation.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I hope the hon. Member will take it from me that the endorsement on a cheque payable to the order of the payee is not a receipt. It is a part of the order to pay which appeared upon the face of the cheque.

MR. E. B. HOARE said, he held in his hand an ordinary stamp which was put upon cheques and other documents passing through the Clearing House by the banker who presented them. He asked whether that was a receipt?

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.), said, he thought the House would be entirely in sympathy with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in desiring to contribute in no way to the evasion of the modest 1d. receipt stamp, but he did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman contemplated that a banker's name across a cheque that he had received money in a Clearing House ought to be hereafter subject to a duty which had never before been chargeable upon cheques. If he was right in that, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether the words in the Bill would not require alteration so as to make the point clearer?

MR. A. G. H. GIBBS (London) said, he thought it ought to be made clear that receipts written upon bills of exchange and promissory notes did not require a stamp, for if they did it would be very inconvenient.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be aware that cheques drawn to order and endorsed were constantly used in the Law Courts to prove payment. He considered that the clause under discussion might be so interpreted that they could not be hereafter used in that way without an additional 1d. stamp.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): It is quite true that endorsed cheques are used as prima facie evidence that they come into the hands of the payee, but they are not receipts, although they may continue to be used as heretofore. It is only receipts properly so-called that are met by this clause.

MR. BARTLEY said, the clause ought to contain a statement to that effect?

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether transfers and conveyances can be properly receipted without a 1d. stamp?

SIR W. HARCOURT : Ordinary conveyances in the body of the deed acknowledge the receipt. For some reason or other there is also endorsed upon the deed a receipt for money. Upon the acknowledgment in the body of the deed no additional stamp is required ; but if people choose to write upon the deed a separate acknowledgment, then, no doubt, a 1d. stamp is required. The intention of the Government is to meet the case of evasion.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said, that in the City there was not the slightest desire to countenance, in any way, an evasion of a legitimate duty—of which alleged evasion he heard for the first time to-night ; but, as the right hon. Gentleman must know, it was not easy to compute the millions affected by the stamp put across a cheque by the bankers. He accepted the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman and the Solicitor General that the receipt did not require a stamp, but, inasmuch as there was a doubt on the subject in City circles, and, inasmuch as apparent evasion had been, to a slight extent, resorted to, he thought the City would welcome the concession of the right hon. Gentleman, who was well advised in undertaking not to press the clause.

MR. A. G. H. GIBBS thought that, as the clause would be open to misconstruction, it would be well to withdraw it.

MR. E. B. HOARE said, he should make no objection if the right hon. Gentleman would undertake to reconsider the matter so as to introduce a fresh clause in the Bill on Report. He gratefully recognised the right hon. Gentleman's offer to withdraw it ; but if it could be so modified as to make its meaning clear, not only to the House, but to Her Majesty's Judges, he should be grateful.

SIR W. HARCOURT : The question as to the Clearing House raises up a doubt. I do not know whether the stamp means a receipt for a balance of money, or that the cheque has been received. If it is a receipt for a cheque it is clear that it would require a stamp, but if for a balance due the case would be different.

MR. E. B. HOARE said, that every banker put the stamp "received" on the cheque when he sent it to the Clearing House. But he did not consider it a receipt for the money. The paying banker was at liberty to return the cheque.

MR. S. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid) hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would postpone the clause, because it was clear that the right hon. Gentleman had carried the matter further than had been intended by those who had drafted the Bill. The only cases in which it appeared to him necessary to have a receipt were these :—formally in the body of a deed it might have been recited that the whole of the purchase money had been paid, but, as a matter of fact, only an instalment might have been paid. But the ad valorem duty was paid on the amount of the purchase money, and it could not be intended that besides that there should be an additional receipt stamp. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not informed them whether there had been any decision in a Court of Law as to this question. If there had been there would be no object to serve in following the course provided in the Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT : As it is desirable that the Bill should pass this week, I would suggest to hon. Gentlemen opposite that they should allow the clause to pass through Committee. I will have the matter investigated to-morrow ; and if I am not able to satisfy the Committee on the subject, I will undertake on the Third Reading to recommit the Bill in order to leave out this clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Income Tax).

DR. CLARK said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to reduce the Income Tax from 7d. to 4d. on incomes under £500 a year, and to impose a graduated Income Tax on incomes above that amount, rising to 2s. in the £1 on incomes above £10,000. He proposed only to move the first part of the Amendment. Last year the hon. Member for Islington (Mr. Bartley) took a Division in favour of a differential Income Tax by which unearned incomes would pay more than earned incomes, and small incomes would pay more than larger ones. This year he (Dr. Clark) found it difficult to draft an Amendment to differentiate because A, B, C, D, and E were so mixed up ; but the question of graduation was clear, and he hoped to take a Division on it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer would require to do something in this matter if he wished to be Chancellor of the Exchequer again. He must carry out the wishes of the people to whom Parliamentary powers had been given, and who were desirous of doing what their predecessors in power had done to lighten their own burdens. Formerly, we were ruled by an oligarchy which used to look after its own interests; but we had now become a democracy, and the problem was how to distribute taxation fairly amongst all classes. We were unable to have ad valorem; and so far as the indirect taxes were concerned, the poor paid far too much. Everyone admitted that. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted it. He had attempted to put an ad valorem duty on higher class wines, and he had to take it off. It was difficult, as he had said, to do this, the law being evaded and the Revenue losing a great deal of money. They ought to try and make the burden lighter on the lower middle classes. He desired to see the Liberal Party become democratised on these matters. He would suggest that those people who derived their incomes from Stocks and Debentures should make their own returns in future, and should not have the Income Tax deducted by their bankers as at present. This would enable the Income Tax Commissioners to comply with the terms of his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 38, after the word "Act," to insert the words "on incomes under five hundred pounds the duty of four pence, on incomes from five hundred pounds per annum to one thousand pounds per annum the duty of sixpence, and on larger incomes."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I rise to Order. I submit that a proposal to increase taxation cannot be moved by a private Member. The latter part of the Amendment seems to me to be out of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is so in regard to the latter part of the Motion. I have only put that part which is in Order. The Amendment stops short at the duty of 7d., so that in no part of the Amendment before the Committee does the hon. Member propose to increase taxation.

Dr. Clark

MR. BARTLEY: Would that cut out the Amendment down in my name?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think so.

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, that what he wished to insist on was that the Liberal Party were pledged to a graduated Income Tax. It was all very well to tell them that the particular way they proposed to raise the question was out of Order. He did not care so much about that. All he wished to do was to impress on the Government that they were pledged to institute a graduated Income Tax; and although they might be out of Order in the way in which they sought to do that, it did not matter much. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen were cheering too soon. He said it did not matter much, because it was the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to object to the way in which the Amendment was put down, but to put it down the right way himself. If he understood the matter rightly, that was what they paid a Chancellor of the Exchequer for. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer endeavoured to do that they would not question the order of his Motion, but would endeavour to carry it in accordance with the principles and pledges of the Liberal Party. It was admitted by everybody that wealth ought to pay a larger share of the taxation of the country than it did at present; that larger incomes ought to pay more; and that, consequently, there ought to be a graduated Income Tax. He had listened with pleasure to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night as to another part of the matter, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman had made a very useful suggestion. No doubt there were difficulties in the way of imposing a graduated Income Tax, but those difficulties ought not to be beyond the intelligence of a Liberal, especially of a Radical, Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman might say that he had Jingo Colleagues to deal with in the Cabinet, and that they would not allow him a free hand; but he (Mr. Morton) wanted to assure the right hon. Gentleman that however it might be with the Cabinet, at any rate he would have the full support of the Radical Party. The people of the country were strongly of opinion that now that the Government was in the hands of the Democratic Party something should be done for them. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but when they were facing their constituents they did not laugh. He did not wish to drive the Tory Party altogether out of existence; but if they desired to exist they must give way to these demands, and assist the Radical Members to obtain a graduated Income Tax and other reforms. The Tory Party might rest assured that they would never get back to power without yielding to these demands. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had the figures before him which would show what would be the result of a graduated Income Tax upon the Revenue; but if he had, he (Mr. Morton) should like to see them. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had no time to deal with these matters. No doubt they had got to go on with the Home Rule Bill and finish it, and there was no one in the world more anxious to finish it than he was.

An hon. MEMBER: When?

MR. A. C. MORTON said, an hon. Member asked "When?" Well, next week. That would give full time for an honest discussion of the Bill. But the people of this country, although willing to do justice to the Irish people, required something for themselves. They required, among other things, that the taxation should be placed upon a fair basis. Up to the present time it had never been fair. The working and industrial classes had always been compelled to pay a larger share of the taxation than the wealthy classes, and they wanted that remedied as soon as possible. They now had a Chancellor of the Exchequer about as Radical as any Member of the Cabinet—

An hon. MEMBER: That is not saying much.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, an hon. Member remarked "That is not saying much," but he (Mr. Morton) thought it meant a good deal. He hoped that when Radical measures were pressed forward the right hon. Gentleman would be ready to support them. They were entitled to expect from a Radical Chancellor of the Exchequer who adhered to the Newcastle Programme that the incidence of taxation would be altered so as to make it fair to all parties. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman was quite right in saying he had not yet had time to carry out his pledges; but if he could assure the House that he had all these matters before him, and would give his best attention to them, and would endeavour to discover a plan to carry out the object of the Amendment, it would be a source of satisfaction to the whole Radical Party.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Member is a little hard in imposing upon me the task of discovering a plan for carrying out a satisfactory policy which the hon. Member is unable to discover for himself.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, that he proposed a plan, but the right hon. Gentleman objected to on the ground that it was out of Order.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am afraid it is out of Order; but as to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman, and his advice and that of his friends, I must take them in good part, because we know that they only chastise those whom they love. I am sorry the hon. Member's Amendment is out of Order, because the magnificent sum he would make a present of to the Exchequer would about equal a 2s. Income Tax on incomes above £10,000, and a larger sum on those above £50,000. But, unfortunately, the only part of the Amendment which would benefit the Treasury is out of Order, and that the only part of his proposal that is in Order is that which will tell against it. I think that is quite enough answer to the invitation to agree to this Amendment. I have no objection to the principle of graduation; I think it is just. I agree that the Death Duties ought to be altered, but the reason why I draw a distinction between them and the Income Tax is the different way in which they are collected. Under the Death Duties, you can ascertain the whole value of a man's property; but when you collect the Income Tax, you do not ask a man the value of his whole fortune. If a man has so much to receive in the form of dividends from the London and North-Western Railway, say, you deduct the Income Tax; you deduct it also in the case of Consols, and, in the case of professional men, four-fifths is collected at its source. I would, therefore, ask hon. Gentlemen to consider how, if they graduate the tax, they are going to collect it at the source? You must assess it at the highest rate from everybody. You must assume that a man has got a higher income, and you must collect the tax at the higher rate. That is impossible, for it would cause great vexation and inconvenience. You would make a man pay at the higher rate, and then apply for a return of the overcharge. I have no hesitation in saying that if you attempt to collect the Income Tax by calling upon each man to disclose the whole of his fortune, you will lose a very large proportion of the tax. That is the reason that has prevented the graduation of the Income Tax, and I hope I have made that plain to the House. That is the practical reason, quite apart from any heroic objection to the proposal of the hon. Member.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said, the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were directed not so much against what the hon. Gentleman proposed as against the general principle of a graduated Income Tax. He had given excellent reasons against a graduated Income Tax, but his observations did not apply to the proposition to extend the deduction from incomes of £400 to incomes of £500. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side indulged in conventional sneers against the Tory Party on this question, and, therefore, it might not be out of place to remind them that it was due to the Tory Party that the Income Tax was levied at a reduced rate on incomes of under £400. It was Sir S. Northcote who raised the incomes charged at the reduced rate from £300 to £400. That ought to relieve the Tory Party from the charge of indisposition to relieve the poorer part of the community from this impost. Nobody liked to be taxed, and perhaps the Income Tax affected us more sharply than any other tax, and those who felt it most were people with small fixed incomes. Unless Parliament were prepared to depart from the principle of raising a larger proportion of Revenue from direct taxation, he was afraid we must always suffer the annoyance of this direct impost, and those who bore it would grieve under it and be desirous for economy, so that the Income Tax might fall to a lower figure. He ventured to think that if they extended the abatement from incomes under £400 to incomes under £500 a year, in a year or two a strong case would be made out for extending it still further to incomes of £600 a year, and so forth. He thought that the relief given some years ago had been very considerable; and seeing that they were unhappily liable to Income Tax, they should be prepared to see it increased from time to time—certainly when a Liberal Government came into power—and be prepared to bear it a little longer.

DR. CLARK said, he could not withdraw the Amendment, because, although he could not increase a tax, it would be open for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to do so if the first part of the Amendment were agreed to. As to the practical difficulty of how this proposal was to be carried out, the bankers could easily send a notice to the Income Tax officials that a certain amount was due instead of sending the money itself. That was done in many cases at the present time. In the case of the Directors of Public Companies, the secretaries of those companies made a return of their incomes as Directors, and the Commissioners of Income Tax asked to be paid upon that sum.

*MR. A. C. MORTON said, he would ask his hon. Friend not to press his Motion after the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was no good dividing for the mere sake of dividing. One matter, however, to which he wished to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was as to whether he would consent to increase the amount on which abatement would be allowed. He should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he was in favour of allowing some abatement on higher incomes than £400 per annum?

SIR W. HARCOURT: In speaking on the Motion of the hon. Member for Islington (Mr. Bartley) the other night, I said I thought that the only way in which you could reform the Income Tax was by raising the figure to which abatement should be applicable and possibly raising the figure of exemption. It is quite true that Sir Stafford Northcote raised the figure of abatement from £300 to £400, and whenever the finances of the country allow of it. I think it may be taken for granted that it will be raised still higher. At the present moment, without extending the abatement at all, all I can do is to make the two ends meet, and therefore it is idle to propose that I should this year consent to a proposal to cut down the receipts from the tax for the next 12 months. However much I may desire to do so I have not the means this year, and therefore any hon. Member who votes for a proposal of the kind must understand that he is voting for a deficit. I have already stated the objections to the present Amendment. Under the present system of abatement you levy at the same rate upon all incomes. If you were to adopt a different rate for different incomes, you would entirely disorganise the whole system on which the Income Tax is levied, and I would strongly advise the House not to adopt any proposals of the kind.

MR. A. G. H. GIBBS said, he was sorry the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not spoken more strongly on general grounds against a graduated Income Tax; but as the right hon. Gentleman had conclusively shown that it was outside practical politics, it was hardly necessary to discuss it. He had not known until now that hon. Gentlemen opposite considered that people who had an income of £500 a year were poor people, and he would point out that it was nearly double the amount which in the Millennium a Member of Parliament was to receive. The proposal of the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) was more far-reaching than the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to suppose, and he hoped the Committee would not agree to it.

MR. WARNER (Somerset, N.) expressed a hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give the House some hope that in the near future means would be found of taxing the larger incomes on a higher scale. There were a great number of Radical Members who felt that it was important that something should be done on the subject.

MR. S. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid) said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed himself in favour of a graduated Income Tax.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said I was in favour of graduated taxation, but I said that the Income Tax could not be graduated, and I gave the reason.

MR. S. EVANS said, he was tempted to fall back on the old saying, that "Where there was a will there was a way." He thought that if the right hon. Gentleman had the will in this matter he would be able to find the way. It seemed to him (Mr. Evans) that there ought to be no difficulty at all in having a graduated Income Tax, and that it would be very much better to have such a tax than to resort to the clumsy expedient of having abatements on small incomes. There appeared to be no difficulty in having the tax collected at its source. If the tax were collected at the higher rate on all incomes, those who had lower incomes could claim an abatement and get a deduction made. The pious opinion expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not of much value, and the only way of forcing the right hon. Gentleman to find a way of carrying his wishes into effect was to divide against him.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, the hon. Member who had just sat down had suggested a plan of collecting a higher tax upon the larger incomes which would add enormously to the inconvenience and trouble of making Income Tax Returns. His own Return for Income Tax for many years had been extremely simple, because he had made no return at all, all his income being taxed at the sources, of which there were some 50 or 60 altogether. Under the plan suggested by the hon. Member, it would be necessary to enumerate every petty investment, which was now taxed at the source. This would be a misery for anyone who made out the return. It would involve much trouble, and there would be no means of checking it. The hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) had a method of meeting the difficulty; but if the increased tax were collected through the secretaries of the company paying the dividends, it would be collected in the first instance at the higher rate. The result would be that a very poor man might be taxed in the first place at 2s. in the £1, and would have to apply for a rebate. Surely it was a sufficient answer to the proposition which had been taken up by the hon. Member for Caithness to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer recognised, as every Chancellor of the Exchequer for many years past had recognised, that the burden of direct taxation required adjustment in some way or other, especially with regard to those classes of persons who were at the end of the scale, and who were undoubtedly exposed to indirect taxation also, but that the only means of making the adjustment was through the abatement. Sir Robert Peel had fixed the limit of abatement at £150, whilst the present Prime Minister had raised it rather higher, and Sir Stafford Northcote had brought it up to its present point. The plan proposed by the hon. Member in support of this Amendment was one which would not bear examination. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he was ready to extend the system of abatement when he was able to do so; but he had pointed out that at present he found difficulty in making both ends meet. As a matter of fact, the right hon. Gentleman had not made both ends meet, because the surplus was entirely dependent upon a windfall which ought really to be appropriated to capital. This being the situation this year, it would be in the highest degree imprudent to accept the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 243.—(Division List, No. 64.)

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said he did not propose to move the Amendment in his name exactly as it stood on the Paper. Having heard the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he proposed to move the Amendment in the following form:—

“Clause 6, page 2, line 38, after ‘sevenpence,’ to insert ‘but allow an abatement of one hundred and twenty pounds on annual incomes from whatever source between one hundred and fifty pounds and five hundred pounds.’”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had acknowledged that the people of the lower middle class were about the hardest taxed of any class, and it was to grant them some relief that he now proposed that the abatement at present existing should be extended. Every person now in receipt of an income of between £150 and £400 received an abatement of £120, and the Amendment he proposed was to raise that limit from £400 to £500. The financial effect of adopting the proposal would be very small, and would certainly not exceed £90,000 or £100,000. He hoped, in the interests of a class who were most severely taxed, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had admitted the principle of the Amendment, would agree to accept it.

Mr. Courtney

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 38, after the words “sevenpence,” to insert the words “but to allow an abatement of one hundred and twenty pounds on annual incomes from whatever source between one hundred and fifty pounds and five hundred pounds.”—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR W. HARCOURT was sorry to say his poverty and not his will compelled him to decline to accede to the Amendment. The hon. Member was good enough to say it would only cost between £90,000 and £100,000. He should have been glad to have acceded to the proposal if he could have done so. But he was sorry to say he had had occasion to consider this very matter, and that, from the calculations that had been made, he had ascertained that it would cost a great deal more than the hon. Member had stated. In fact, it would cost two or three times as much. Although he should have been disposed to accept such a proposal, it was impossible on the present Budget to do so.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, the Amendment suggested nothing novel in the way of a differential tax or a graduated tax. What it did was simply to extend an already recognised and existing system, and further than that it extended it to a limit which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had himself admitted would, in ordinary times, be a proper limit to which to extend it. The adoption of the Amendment would not seriously trench on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's balance.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Oh, yes it would.

MR. HANBURY: The balance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about £100,000, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman would assert it would take up the whole of that.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It will take a great deal more.

MR. HANBURY: Those who had framed this Amendment had gone into figures just as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done, and they maintained that it would be very little over £100,000, if any. He hoped his hon. Friend would press the Amendment to a Division.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 211.—(Division List, No. 65.)

*MR. J. G. LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) moved to amend the clause relating to the annual value of the occupation of lands, with the object of reducing the duty thereon under Schedule B from 3½d. to 3d. He said this was such a small matter that it need not frighten the most impoverished Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was, indeed, so small that he ought almost to apologise to the agricultural interest for bringing it forward at all; but they had so often been challenged to produce some definite proposal for the benefit of agriculture that they suggested this little measure of relief, which would enable the Government to mark their sympathy with the agricultural community in their present difficulty by giving the farmers some practical assistance. That assistance was very much needed indeed; for it was generally admitted that the agricultural industry was in a very great state of impecuniosity. While the profits of trade had increased by millions, the profits of agriculture had reached the vanishing point. He estimated that the loss to the Revenue involved in his proposal was only £4,400. That was a very trifling sum—less than the salary of one Cabinet Minister. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would no doubt reply—“Why do not the farmers put themselves under Schedule D, and pay Income Tax on the profits instead of on the annual value of the land?” The answer was that while farmers were careful in large matters, such as the price of a horse, they were apt in small matters to be negligent about details, and they did not keep accounts as a rule, while those who did keep accounts were not anxious to expose the nakedness of their position. Then, if the farmer wished to go under Schedule D, he would have to give notice before the 5th of June; but at that time he was unable to know whether his profit would be more than half his rent, and which Schedule would be more beneficent to himself. At any rate, the time should be extended to the 5th of August. He hoped the vigorous effort of the President of the Board of Agriculture to get the farmers to go under Schedule D would be successful, for it would induce them to keep accounts. He did not wish to shock the Chancellor of the Exchequer by any wild proposal. He wished to be mild and moderate, and, therefore, he only asked the right hon. Gentleman to relieve the farmers from paying this extra 1d. The Amendment, if carried, might lead to the discomfiture of one Chancellor of the Exchequer; but it would bring joy and pleasure to thousands of the constituents of hon. Members on both sides of the House, and for that reason he hoped it would be accepted.

Amendment moved, to leave out “half-penny.”—(Mr. J. G. Lawson.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I think no class of the community deserves more sympathy and more indulgence than the farming class which the hon. Gentleman so ably represents; but I believe that, under Schedule D, the farmers would receive much more relief than under the Amendment of the hon. Member. The hon. Member stated that Schedule B was founded on the assumption that a farmer's profits were equal to half his rent, and that a farmer would find it difficult in June to make up his mind whether his profit would be more than half his rent. That is the most optimist view of the position of the farmer I ever heard. I should have said that a farmer would say he made no profit at all. The farmers had a way out of the difficulty by placing themselves under Schedule D. No farmer whose profit is less than £150 a year need pay a farthing of Income Tax if he chooses under Schedule D. If a farmer makes a profit, why should he not pay like anyone else in the community? The argument that a farmer keeps no accounts would not be considered in the case of other tradesmen, and I do not see why the hon. Member should ask that the agriculturist should be treated in a different manner from other Income Taxpayers. The hon. Member has a right to ask that the farmers should be placed in the same position as other traders. If they make no profits they pay no Income Tax; if they make a small profit they pay a small tax; and if they make reasonably large profits they pay a reasonably large tax. It is a dangerous thing to treat any class of the community on a different footing from the others, and it is a dangerous thing to establish a differential rate of Income Tax. If the hon. Member will only exert himself to induce the farmers to see the advantages they will derive by coming under Schedule D, he will do them a much greater service than the proposal in the Amendment, which I hope he will not press.

*MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich) regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not acceded to the proposal of his hon. Friend, for the amount in question, as pointed out, was but small. In fact, it would have been a reasonable Motion to make to relieve farmers from all payment under Schedule B, and that would have been a great boon to them. The exceptional treatment asked for was owing to the position of agriculture, and the process, almost of extermination, which was going on in his county among farmers due to depression. He asked why the English farmer paid more under Schedule B than the Scottish or Irish farmer? for he had never received a satisfactory explanation on this point.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): As the author of the transfer of the farmers from Schedule B to Schedule D, I put it to my hon. Friend whether he will serve the farmer by encouraging him to make this declaration under Schedule B instead of Schedule D? I sympathise deeply with the position of the farmers. The general anticipation is that this year they will make no profits at all. That being so, the best plan for those who have influence over the farmers is to encourage them to make their declarations under Schedule D, for under that Schedule, if there is no profit at all, they will not be asked to pay any Income Tax at all. I do not think that the Amendment is so favourable to the farmers as my hon. Friend believe. It would encourage to refrain from doing what it is their interest to do—namely, to keep accounts, in order to be able to show whether or not there is any profit, and I do not think it would be of such advantage to them as making their declarations under Schedule D.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) asked the Minister of Agriculture whether steps had been taken as to the circulation of a paper among the farmers, showing the advantages of making their declarations under Schedule D?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): The Board have circulated copies of the leaflet in great numbers to farmers and to the provincial papers. There has been a great demand from all parts of the country for the leaflet, so much so that 5,000 additional copies have been ordered, which will be circulated at once.

MR. ROUND said, he quite agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for the St. George's Division as to the necessity of encouraging the farmer to go under Schedule D; but they had to deal with the existing state of things, under which the farmers preferred to go under Schedule B.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD (Warwick, Stratford) asked if the time had not arrived when the three countries should pay equally? Farms in England were supposed to represent half the annual value, and in Scotland and Ireland about a third of the annual value. At the present moment he took it that both the Scotch and the Irish farmers were in a better position than the English farmer. In the Scotch Lowlands it was not contended by anyone that the depression in agriculture had been felt as it had been in the wheat-growing districts in England, and the Irishmen had got the benefit of judicial rents; therefore, at any rate, in their case they had an advantage over our farmers. He thought, therefore, the time had arrived when the English farmer might legitimately ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to put matters upon an equality with regard to the three countries.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am ashamed to say I am unable to answer the question as to the origin of the difference between the three countries; it is lost in antiquity. Whether it was the Treasury or whether it originated in the Articles of the Union I do not know; but I should imagine it was founded upon some notion of difference in relation to prices in the various countries. But, with reference to the remarks of my hon. Friend, I would say they can bring them all to an equality if they all go under Schedule D; that is the way in which you would get rid of these differences; these differential fractions would disappear if everyone would come under Schedule D, as everyone would then be taxed upon the profits they made.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) said, there was another reason for the difference. In respect to Scotland, allowance was made for the repair of houses, and an abatement was made in consequence, which was not the case in England.

Question put.

House cleared for a Division.

MR. J. G. LAWSON, seated, and with his hat on, asked, on a point of Order, if he was now entitled to withdraw the Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; the hon. Member is not entitled to withdraw the Amendment, but it may be negatived without a Division.

Question put, and negatived.

Question put, "That Clause 6 stand part of the Bill."

*SIR A. HICKMAN (Wolverhampton, W.) moved the omission of this clause. With regard to small house or cottage property, he submitted the tax was an unfair one; that an abatement should be allowed in respect of commission; it was allowed to the tithe-owner and ought to be allowed to the cottage-owner. He also submitted that abatement should be allowed for fire insurance. It was allowed upon stock-in-trade and ought to be allowed on property, because if the house was burned down and not rebuilt the tax would be altogether lost to the Revenue. An abatement should also be allowed in case of defaulting tenants; bad debts were allowed to traders, and he wished to know why they should not adopt the same principle with regard to small properties? He did not wish to detain the House, but he would urge the right hon. Gentleman to consider these small matters between now and the time he had to produce the Budget next year.

Amendment proposed, to omit the Clause.—(Sir A. Hickman.)

SIR W. HARCOURT: In introducing the Budget I stated I was very desirous of removing this anomaly, but that it could not be dealt with alone, and I think that the House generally was perfectly satisfied with the declaration I then made.

MR. WINGFIELD-DIGBY (Dorset, N.) said, that the farmers were told they should come under Schedule D; but for those who had not kept accounts it was impossible for them to apply under Schedule D for 12 months or two years, and they did not know how many of them would be ruined by that time. He merely wished to point out to the Committee that to tell the farmer to apply under Schedule D was of no use whatever—what was wanted was present relief.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Member is mistaken as to the amount of elaborate accounts that is required from the farmers. The farmers would necessarily have some means of satisfying the Commissioners as to what their real profits have been without keeping a ledger by double entry.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) moved the following new clause:—

(Amendment of 5 and 6 Vic. c. 35.)

"The first rule of the first case under Schedule of Section one hundred of the fifth and sixth Victoria, chapter thirty-five, shall be read as if the words 'average of three years' were omitted therefrom, and the words 'account of the profits or gains of the year,' were inserted in their place, and the words 'Provided always,' to end of rule, were also omitted."

The object of this was to levy the tax on the income, and not, as now, on an average. In other words, the Income Tax was the charge made, not upon the income of any year, but on the total for three years divided by three. No doubt this rule of charging upon an average was conceived and carried out with the intention of being fair to the trader, to enable the losses of one year to be met by the increased income of another, and thus a fair average might be arrived at. That sounded very plausible before they looked carefully into it; but when they looked into it, it would be seen at once that it did not work as it was intended. But even if it did, he should still say the principle was wrong. The object was, not to get a fixed and invariable tax, or a tax that varied very little; the true principle of an Income Tax was that it should vary according to the income; that it should follow the fortunes of the income; that the man who was increasing in prosperity should pay, if anything, more, and the man who was decreasing in prosperity should, if there was to be a difference, pay less; but exactly the contrary principle was carried out through this system of average. Take the instance of a man who in the first year made £1,000, in the next year £2,000, and in the third year £3,000; at the end of the third year he was taxed, not upon the £3,000, but upon the £1,000, plus £2,000, plus £3,000, which was £6,000, divided by three, and he was taxed upon £2,000. Take the converse case, the man whose income, by unfortunate circumstances, went the other way. This man was treated in the same way as the prosperous man, and accordingly he was taxed upon £2,000, the result being that the prosperous man was taxed upon £1,000 less than he ought to pay, and the unfortunate man, who was gradually approaching ruin, was taxed upon £1,000 more than he ought to pay. It might be said that three years was not a sufficient period to take; therefore he had worked out two cases of 10 years. "A," beginning with £1,000 and ending with £10,000, would pay upon £8,500, less than he ought to pay, while "B," beginning with £10,000 and ending with £1,000, would pay upon £8,500, more than he ought to pay. The tax was thus not a fair tax, for either the Chancellor of the Exchequer was having withdrawn from him something to which he was entitled, or the taxpayer was having taken from him something that should not be taken. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told them that the income of the country was steadily increasing; that the wealth of the country was increasing and had been increasing. The result was that under Schedule D there was a constant addition to income in the majority of cases; and it followed from that that, in the majority of cases under Schedule D, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was getting much less than he was entitled to. His proposal was to do away with that, to charge on the concrete income as it stood in the last year, and in that manner the prosperous man would pay what he should pay, and the man who was going down hill, who was approaching ruin, would not be called upon to pay upon an income which he had not realised.

Mr. Gibson Bowles

New Clause (Amendment of five and six Vic. c. 35,)—(Mr. Gibson Bowles,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is rather late in the evening to go in these transcendental theories of taxation. The common sense of mankind has adopted the principle of averages in taxation, and no one would more condemn this Amendment than the trading classes in whose interest it is said to be proposed.

SIR F. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge) was very glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not going to assent to this new clause. It was perfectly true that one man would pay too much in one year, but on the law of average he paid what was right on the whole. The hon. Member for Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles) had spoken of a man who made a profit on all the three years. Under the present system, if that man made a loss he had a right to deduct his loss, so that in reality he got back part of his loss; whereas, if this new clause were passed, he would have to pay on the profit and get nothing back for the loss; therefore, it was distinctly against the commercial classes that this clause should be passed, and, on that account, he was very glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not agree to it.

Question put, and negatived.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly.

OFFICIAL LIQUIDATORS (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]—(No. 43.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill."—(The Lord Acton.)

*THE EARL OF BELMORE, before the House went into Committee, asked the noble Lord to explain the object of the Bill, which had rather a peculiar history. It was read a first time on March 21 and a second time on March 24, without explanation or discussion, and very little was known in Ireland about the measure; but, from various communications received by himself and other noble Lords, it appeared that it was a Bill of a very contentious character. He held in his hand numerous representations from different interests on the subject—resolutions passed against it by the Land Agents' Association of Ireland, by the Committee of the Northern Law Society of Ireland, a statement on behalf of the Institute of Chartered Accountants, and other important bodies, a resolution from the Chambers of Commerce in Dublin and Belfast, and also from the Council of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland; and, in addition to the Irish objections, a resolution of a meeting of the Trade Protection Societies' Association which had been held in London. All those bodies earnestly protested against the Bill. The Amendments he had put on the Paper related to the resolution passed by the Land Agents' Association, which stated that official liquidators were hitherto unknown in Ireland; and they believed that the creation of such an office, with powers not hitherto conferred on any officials in the United Kingdom, would cause difficulty and confusion in the management of landed estates. Under it the management of estates would pass from the hands of experienced agents to officials who had not hitherto had to deal with landed property, and whose duties in connection with the Bankruptcy Court rendered them particularly unsuited for the management of estates. They represented that the duties which these officers would have to discharge would require their constant attendance in Dublin, and therefore that their personal management of the estates would be impossible. He did not know what was the reason for introducing this Bill, but there might be a very good reason for it; and he understood it was intended to assimilate the law and practice in Ireland to the law and practice which had prevailed in England. It was evident, from the sweeping changes proposed, that the Bill was one of a very contentious nature, and he hoped the noble Lord would be able to admit the Amendments, which would, to a great extent, remove the main objections to it.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON entirely concurred in the observations which had been made by his noble Friend. Similar representations had reached him from the same quarters, and he thought the objections taken to the Bill were, in substance, just. It was perfectly true that the object of the Bill was to assimilate the law in Ireland in the case of bankruptcy and official receivership to that which had prevailed in England during the last few years. But it should be remembered that there had been considerable legislation with regard to Ireland which did not concern England, and that legislation had made it all the more necessary that persons entrusted with the duties contemplated by the Bill should have personal knowledge of everyone—and especially with the circumstances of the tenants—with whom they were brought in contact. Official liquidators could not have such knowledge, and, therefore, it would be impossible for them properly to manage Irish estates. In his judgment they were about the most unfit persons who could possibly be selected for such a purpose. The Bill also trenched unfairly on the work hitherto done efficiently by accountants, solicitors, and land agents. Officials of the Court of Chancery residing in Dublin or other large towns would be utterly incompetent to deal with the complicated questions which must arise throughout Ireland under this Bill; and he, therefore, hoped the noble Lord would either withdraw the Bill altogether, or remove the objections to it by admitting the Amendments.

LORD ACTON said, this Bill was introduced originally at the instance of the Irish Bench as far as they were interested in the matter, and he was not aware that there was any objection to it, or that it was in any way a contentious Bill. That was one reason why he gave no explanation of it on the Second Reading, and he might add that he was not very anxious to address Irish Peers on a question which they would probably understand much better than himself, or to discuss a measure of this description in the presence of so many Judges. The Bill was of a purely legal character, proposing to extend to Ireland analogous securities to those given by the Companies Winding-up Acts in England. Before going further, he would accept the Amendments alluded to standing in the names of the noble Earl (Lord Belmore) and the noble Marquess (Lord Waterford). The 1st clause of the Bill proposed to place at the disposal of the High Court in Ireland the services of officials already attached to the judicial system as official liquidators of public companies. This was following the principle adopted in England, which had been considered extremely successful. The clause was, however, entirely permissive, leaving the option of appointing to the Court, whose power was not fettered in regard to the appointment of a commercial liquidator in cases free from suspicion. Clause 2 contained no new principle, and only extended the powers of the Court in the choice of liquidators. The desirability of giving the Court that power had been fully recognised by the Law Officers of two successive Administrations as well as by the Judges. Clause 3 placed at the disposal of the Court the services of the same officials for the purpose of safeguarding property in pawn belonging to litigants. Clause 4 introduced the only new principle in the Bill: that of enabling the Court to call in the aid of the official liquidators in the administration of estates of insolvent or deceased persons. It was believed that the adoption of the principle here proposed would result in the protection of property which in many cases at present was either made away with, or not distributed according to law. Clause 5 referred to the application of the law in lunacy matters under the direction of the Lord Chancellor. The Amendments proposed by both the noble Lords would be accepted by the Government, and he, therefore, hoped their Lordships would not at this stage resist the further progress of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, the Bill had passed very quickly through its previous stages, and had not, so far, attracted much notice in their Lordships' House. He was glad that the noble Lord had now given some explanation of it, but he could not agree that Clause 1 was permissive, as the noble Lord had said, and was glad the Amendment to make it so would be accepted. The Bill had caused great excitement in Ireland among officials and others, especially solicitors and chartered accountants, who feared that under its provisions they would be compulsorily forced to give up duties which, it was generally admitted, they had satisfactorily performed hitherto. It would be rather an extraordinary thing to say that an official of the Court sitting in Dublin should have the power of managing estates throughout the country. The noble Lord had intimated that the 1st clause was permissive, but the clause ran—

"The official assignees of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, hereinafter called the 'official assignees' shall, by virtue of their office, be the official liquidators," &c.

The bankruptcy assignees, of course, managed bankruptcy affairs with rapidity, but it would be a most serious thing if they forced on sales of landed property. Land in Ireland was at present almost unsaleable, and if sales were forced it would be sold at a nominal value, or for almost nothing at all. This Bill was bad altogether, but he did not propose at the present stage to move its rejection. He was glad to hear that the noble Lord would be ready to receive the Amendments that were put down, because, as it at present stood, the Bill would cause much friction and great dissatisfaction. He had received communications from Ireland showing that the Bill was regarded with much disfavour; and he would suggest that, the Amendments submitted having been accepted, some time should elapse before the Report stage was taken, in order that the matter might be further considered.

*LORD ASHBOURNE; My Lords, all that public opinion in Ireland has before it in reference to this Bill is the copy which has been circulated without any change or amendment. The opposition to it is growing in volume and intensity; and instead of being a measure which was to be allowed to pass quietly by consent, it is quite plain to me that, in its present shape, unless the objections to it are met in a conciliatory spirit, it will, in its subsequent stages, be one of the most keenly-fought Bills which your Lordships have had introduced during the present Session. To indicate the class of opposition which has developed, I may tell your Lordships that I have received representations from the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, the Chambers of Commerce of Dublin and Belfast, and other bodies, against the Bill, and it is manifest from the amount of literature that has been issued there is a good deal of opposition to the measure. I believe the history of the Bill is that a suggestion was made that it would be a reasonable, and not an unwise, thing to give power to the Courts in these matters whenever they thought it desirable to appoint the official liquidators to perform certain functions. I believe that is the view of the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, the Vice Chancellor, and the Judge of the Land Court. I do not know that they think it is a Bill of any supreme importance; but I believe their view is that it would be a useful and wise thing to give the Courts such a discretion as I have indicated. Now I have gathered what I was before aware of, that the noble Lord in charge of the Bill is willing to make it, instead of compulsory, purely voluntary, leaving it in the discretion of the Judges to make the appointments if they think right; and also to make it plain that the official assignees are to have no power to act as land agents and receivers. There is also, I believe, a desire to show that these officials are not to interfere with the creditors in the selection of a solicitor. These are important changes, but they are not known of in Ireland; and I think it would be wise if there is any such machinery in your Lordships' House to commit the Bill now pro formâ, let the noble Lord in charge of it introduce such Amendments as he thinks right and such others as the draftsman may think necessary, and then circulate a new print of the Bill. Let that go forth in Ireland, let the parties interested have the opportunity of considering whether their objections have been met, and then, at the end of two or three weeks, we shall be in a better position to know whether the further progress of the Bill will be easy. That course, I know, is taken in the House of Commons with great advantage. The only other course would be to defer the Committee stage for some time, and allow those interested in Ireland to consider the proposed changes. But it is quite manifest to me that the Bill, in face of the growing volume of opposition to it, will not pass unless a very earnest effort is made to meet as far as may be reasonable some of the various objections which have been taken to the measure in its present shape.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSCHELL): My Lords, I quite agree that there is some weight in the objections taken to the Bill. At the same time, as regards the 1st and 2nd clauses, I think your Lordships should not be too closely guided by the expressions of opinion which have been given. It was owing to the experience in this country of the incidents attending the winding up of companies that provision was made for greater supervision, and for insuring that there should be proper investigation into the transactions which have led to the failure of companies. No doubt some exception has been taken in England to the measure as leading to officialism.

I have said before that I have considerable sympathy with the objections of those who are opposed to appointing officials to do that which in the ordinary course has been done by professional persons not officials connected with any Government. But, on the other hand, in these company cases there is work to be done which will be more efficiently performed by having official persons to look into the transactions; and it was on that ground that the late Government introduced their proposals relating to the winding up of companies. The first two clauses of this Bill contain the same proposals with reference to Ireland. I do not think there is any good ground for objecting to this part of the Bill, but I admit that the subsequent provisions may be open to criticism. I would, therefore, suggest that Amendments as to which there is agreement should be inserted in the Bill now, and that contentious points should be passed over and considered by the Standing Committee. Before the Bill reaches the Standing Committee there will be an interval, during which it can be circulated through Ireland, and to allow for its consideration.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI had not heard very clearly the remarks of the noble Lord in charge of the Bill, and had not, therefore, clearly understood whether the noble Lord would accept his Amendments to exempt agricultural estates from its operation so far as it related to the appointment of official assignees as receivers of rents and estates in the hands of the Court. If they were to be accepted and the measure then further considered on the Report stage, he was willing to withdraw those Amendments at this stage, and bring them forward at a later period, dependent, of course, upon whether the noble Lord in charge of the Bill would vary the terms of the clause.

LORD ACTON thought that all the difficulties raised upon details by the noble Lord were met by the Amendments already standing in the names of noble Lords which had been already in principle accepted.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI understood that it would be open to him at a future stage to make further Amendments if necessary.

The Lord Chancellor

LORD ACTON assented.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I think, whether they are great interests or not which are involved, it is clearly desirable that we should know whether these Amendments are agreed to by consent before we go to the Committee stage.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): The Amendments are accepted; when they have been inserted the Bill will be reprinted; and then it will go in due time to the Standing Committee, leaving a long interval in order that it may be fully considered. There will be an ample interval left for those who take an interest in it in Ireland to consider it. It seems to me that is the simpler mode of proceeding.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is a matter rather for the consideration of the Irish Peers, but it seems to me that when the Government have by their action entirely altered the draft of the Bill in its important particulars it is desirable the House should know what the Bill really means before it gets to the Committee stage again.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not understand that it is by our action. It is by the action of noble Lords opposite who move the Amendments they think necessary. The Amendments are theirs; and when they are put in the Bill will be reprinted, and everybody will have the opportunity of considering it. It cannot prejudice anybody, I should think.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI withdrew his Amendments for that day, and would keep them for a future stage. He understood that some of the Amendments were agreed to.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

Amendments made.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed, as amended. (No. 87.)

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS
(IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD O'NEILL, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, explained that its chief object was to make permanent the Irish Sunday Closing Act of 1878, and to extend the operation of that measure to the five large towns which were excluded from it. That small Bill, as it might be called, without in the least minimising its importance, had conferred great good upon the country in the direction of temperance. The Bill also provided for the earlier closing of public-houses on Saturdays, and would effect some change in the law concerning travellers. In former Sessions legislation in this direction was proposed when the four years during which the Act of 1878 was to remain in operation were coming to an end. Lord Carlingford brought in a Bill on the subject, and in moving the Second Reading on 15th March, 1883, in the House of Commons, stated that "public opinion in Ireland was much in favour of the Bill;" that Sunday drunkenness had greatly decreased, and that the arrests from that cause had been at that time reduced as much as 50 per cent. That legislation was approved in their Lordships' House and in the House of Commons; but it had not been proceeded with in consequence of the pressure of other Business. The Bill was brought in again in 1884, when Sir George Trevelyan, in moving the Second Reading, said, after careful study of the statistics, he had come to the conclusion that Sunday Closing had been a great and unqualified benefit to those parts of the country where it had been in operation, and that it might be conveniently extended to the five exempted cities. For the same reason, however, that Bill again went no further in 1884. In 1887 Mr. T. W. Russell brought in a Bill for the earlier closing of public-houses on Saturdays. That Bill and the question of the working of the Act of 1878 were referred to a Committee. The subject was considered by the Committee in 1887, and the present Bill was based upon their Report. That Report stated that the evidence was overwhelming in favour of making the Act perpetual, and that it was advisable to extend Sunday Closing to the cities and towns now exempted. It further stated that there was little difference of opinion as to earlier closing on Saturday night, and that much of the excessive drinking and waste of wages would be saved if the public-houses were closed earlier on that day. Allusion was also made in it to the difficulty of applying any test but that of mileage to the bonâ fide traveller, and of preventing other persons from availing themselves of that clause. The next step was that Sir Thomas Lea brought in a Bill on this subject, and carried it to a Second Reading in the House of Commons on April 23, 1890. Mr. Madden, the Chairman of the Committee, now Mr. Justice Madden, the then Attorney General for Ireland, took part in that Debate, and declared that there was an almost unanimous expression of opinion in favour of the Bill on the part of every class of society in Ireland. Sir George Trevelyan stated that Sunday Closing had led to no increase in "shebeenism." He had given their Lordships the history of that Bill, and he hoped they would give it a favourable reception. Politics did not enter into the question, and it would be a scandal if a measure of so simple a kind should any longer be put off in the face of an earnest desire so generally expressed. Many excellent people in Ireland who were neither bigots nor fanatics rejoiced in the success of the Sunday Closing Act, and thought that at some time within the last 10 years Parliament ought to have passed some Bill of this sort. This measure had nothing to do with any of the other Temperance Bills now before Parliament, and as compared with them had in its favour a successful 15 years' experience of the working of the existing Act. He trusted their Lordships would not refuse to take the step which would make that measure perpetual, and which would enable the good work hitherto done to still be carried on.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord O'Neill.)

THE EARL OF WEMYSS moved the rejection of the Bill. He remarked that strange to say on that very day, in another place, precisely the same Bill stood for Second Reading. Such a course was unusual, but he would ask the promoters of the Bill with which horse they intended to win, and whether they intended to win on this Bill and let the other in another place be scratched? His only apology as a Scotchman to noble Lords from Ireland for taking part in the discussion on a measure only affecting Ireland was that, happily as yet, Ireland was a part of the United Kingdom. The noble Lord had stated that the Bill was the result of the deliberations of the Committee in another place; but he believed the recommendation had only been carried by a bare majority.

*LORD O'NEILL had intended to state that the Chairman was not in favour of including the large towns.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, they had then, at all events, the fact that the Chairman of the Committee was against some of the provisions in the Bill. It was proposed to bring the five largest towns in Ireland within the provisions of the Bill; but, so far as he knew, Belfast was the only one of them that strongly advocated the Bill. He found it stated in a paper sent round to their Lordships that there was practically no public demand for the measure in Ireland; in fact, the manifestations of public opinion proved the contrary. The Corporations of Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and Waterford had all passed resolutions against Sunday Closing. Archbishop Walsh, in a speech he made on February 23, strongly deprecated such a measure being applied to Dublin. The danger from it was that it encouraged illicit drinking in the shebeens. Sunday Closing in Cardiff and Glasgow had been a notorious failure. In Glasgow Sunday Closing had made the law-abiding Scotchman a law-breaker at last. The drink sold in the shebeens was horrible. As an Irishman not long ago said, "it was like a torch-light procession going down a man's throat in the dark." If the South of Ireland did not want Sunday Closing, why on earth should Belfast be so anxious that the Bill should be extended to all parts of Ireland? He could only understand it on one of two grounds—first, that the people of Belfast were in intimate connection with the people of Scotland by blood and religion, and were anxious on a great Imperial question to secure their votes. Geographically, the North of Ireland was only 11 miles from Scotland. Perhaps another reason why the people of Belfast were in favour of the measure was in order that they might give an object-lesson in Home Rule by putting on the South of Ireland a Bill which the Southerners disliked just as the South was now putting legislation on the North which the Northerners disliked. He could see a solution of the difficulty. Within the last 24 hours they had been told that there was an idea of exempting Ulster from the scope of the Home Rule Bill, with the concurrence or assent, it was said, of the South. Let their Lordships apply the same principle to this Bill. Why should the Southern towns, which objected to this measure, not be exempted from its operation? Why should it not apply to Belfast only? The proposal to close the public-houses at 9 o'clock on Saturday evening was simply intolerable tyranny and class legislation, the effect of which would be to deprive the poor man of his beer, while the rich man would have in his cellar as much wassail as he wanted. With regard to the question of the bonâ fide traveller, he saw no reason for extending the limit to six miles. It was hard that a working man who wished to walk, on a Sunday, to some pleasant place near his home should not be able to wet his whistle at the end of a three miles' distance. Take their Lordships' case. Suppose their Lordships wished to take a recreative and healthy walk to Hampstead Heath, which was just three miles from that House, would they not think it very hard if they could not refresh themselves there without having to come back the whole way along the dusty road and get what they wanted at the refreshment bar of the House? He felt very strongly that this kind of legislation was wrong, and that it was a puritanical attempt to coerce men's natural feelings and tastes. It had been tried before, and the result was that the law had been, as such legislation always would be, evaded. He was not in favour of drunkenness, but he was in favour of liberty and justice. He had attended great meetings, composed of men of all ranks and creeds and politics, in Glasgow and Manchester, and these gatherings were unanimous in their determination to resist veto legislation. He would venture to offer a word of advice to those who were dealing with such questions. So strong was the feeling in favour of liberty and justice in connection with drink questions that whoever wanted to have a good majority at the next General Election should carefully avoid flirting with the Alliance or coquetting with the Veto. The Government had already put their foot well into it as regarded their Veto Bill, and it did not matter now whether they went on with it or withdrew it. It was not by infringing liberty or outraging justice in the way that the Veto Bill did that drunkenness would be cured. The evil must be met in other directions. They might imitate the method adopted in the Colonies in granting licences in proportion to the population. They must also look to the assistance which could be rendered in the matter by the police. Let men found drunk in the streets be fined and imprisoned, and let the licences be taken from public-houses that manufactured drunkards. Other powerful influences also existed in the pulpit, the Press, and public opinion. These were the weapons on which they ought to rely as elements of reform, which had brought about great and good results in the past, for not one of their Lordships who went about the streets in our towns could fail to be aware of the enormous improvement which had taken place in regard to the decrease of drunkenness among the great mass of the population in this country. Two right rev. Prelates took entirely different views in this matter, and were now running different Bills for the Alliance Stakes; but he would beg them to remember that it was not by substituting for their croziers the baton of legislation that they could make men sober. Men were not to be made sober by Act of Parliament. Upon that point he would quote the opinion of an able lawyer and eloquent Member formerly of their Lordships' House—Lord Cairns—

“There was no question which at the present time more deeply touched the physical and religious welfare of the country as that of temperance. It occupied the attention of moralists, statesmen, and divines. It had been under investigation by Parliament, and statistics had been obtained of the poverty, suffering, and crime it was causing in this land.”

And then Lord Cairns went on to say—

“I have little hope myself of making men sober and temperate by Act of Parliament, and look rather to other causes and influences. I look to the power and force of persuasion, of conviction, of example. I look to the change in habits, feelings, and tastes which comes when there is brought to bear on the hearts of men the light and power of the Gospel of our Saviour. I look to the efforts for better training the rising generation, and especially to the young men of England, in whose hands the future of the country is placed.”

He thanked their Lordships for their kind attention, and begged to move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment moved, to leave out (“now”) and add at the end of the Motion (“this day six months.”)—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

*THE DUKE OF WESTMINSTER felt that this subject interested Englishmen as well as Irishmen. When it came before a Committee of their Lordships' House evidence upon this drink question was given to show the great improvement that had followed the imposition of further restrictions with regard to the hours of closing. He differed in toto cælo from Lord Wemyss, who had given no proof whatever that legislation on this subject affecting Ireland had, as he alleged, signally failed. The question had been before the country many years, and the great mass of opinion in Ireland, as evidenced before the House of Commons Committee in 1888, was strongly and overwhelmingly in favour of making the Act of 1878 permanent instead of renewing it year after year. The greatest amount of drinking in this country, and in Ireland especially, took place on Saturday; and, as wages in Dublin and the other large towns were paid between 2 and 3 o'clock on that day, there was practically a half-holiday. The early closing proposed would still enable people to get what drink they wanted, and he considered it was sufficient to allow the public-houses to remain open until 9 o'clock that night, instead of until 11 o'clock as at present. The evidence given before the House of Lords Committee was conclusive as to the desire for closing at an earlier hour on Saturday. All the successive Secretaries for Ireland had been in favour of further restrictions and of Sunday Closing. He should have thought it better that the public-houses might be allowed to open for two hours on Sunday, and that was the opinion of Mr. Madden, the Chairman of the Committee; but upon the evidence the majority of the Committee were in favour of total closing on Sunday. No proof was given that shebeening had increased, but if shebeening did increase it would be necessary to take measures against that form of drinking. He regarded the Bill as a reasonable Bill, and he trusted that their Lordships would assent to the Second Reading.

LORD MONTEAGLE would not, after the very full treatment of the subject by the noble Duke and by the noble Earl on the Cross Benches, detain their Lordships with any discussion of the details of the Bill. Lord Wemyss had tried to persuade their Lordships there was really no public demand for this measure in Ireland.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS had not said that, but that resolutions had been passed in the four towns, Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, objecting to be put under the Bill. That was all.

LORD MONTEAGLE accepted the correction, but had so understood the argument. His reason for supporting the Bill was that he believed there was an overwhelming demand for it in Ireland, perhaps not shared to so great an extent in the exempted large towns; but both in Limerick and Cork resolutions had been passed at public meetings in favour of the Bill. The noble Earl also said that the experiment had failed in Cardiff, and had appealed to Lord Aberdare's experience of its working in Wales. In Ireland the Act had been tried for over 10 years with success, and they were better able to judge in Ireland upon that point than people on this side of the Channel. He and others objected to the Act being kept in a state of suspended animation, and continued from year to year in the Expiring Laws Continuance Act. The opposition of Archbishop Walsh was entirely confined to the case of Dublin, and among the Roman Catholic Bishops there was an overwhelming majority in favour of the Bill. He appealed to their Lordships' House very earnestly not to listen to the arguments of the noble Earl, and thought that, the Bill being supported so largely from Ireland, it would be a great misfortune if the wish of the Irish people of all Parties were over-ridden by their Lordships.

The Duke of Westminster

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Earl SPENCER): My Lords, I hope your Lordships will allow me to say a few words on this subject, both as representing the Government on the present occasion and the view which they take of the Bill, and also as having taken considerable interest in the measure when I was in Ireland. I rejoice that on one subject, at least, there is no Party difference in this House. When I had the honour of being in Ireland I received various deputations on the subject, and was constantly told of the great necessity for a measure of this sort, and the importance to all classes of having some limit placed on the trade in intoxicating liquor on Sunday. After the existing Act was passed by a Conservative Government, I had again a deputation before me urging that the measure had been of the greatest possible utility, and that, therefore, it should be made permanent. As far as I can gather, there has been practically no change in the evidence since that time. My noble Friends referred to the Report of the Committee which sat on the subject in another place in 1888. That Committee very nearly unanimously reported in favour of the continuance of this measure. Now, if your Lordships look at the statistics, you will find they are very remarkable. After the passing of the Act of 1878 there were 2,000 arrests for drunkenness, whereas before that time they amounted to 4,000; and other instances might be quoted of the marked effect of the Act in the diminution of drunkenness. Nor is there any evidence to show that shebeening has increased in the districts where the Act is in operation, or that any other serious drawbacks have occurred in the administration of it. I, therefore, still think as I did before, that it would be of great importance to continue the Act for the benefit of the Irish people. In my opinion it is a scandal that a matter of such great importance should be left to the chance of getting the Act included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. There are provisions in the Bill as to which there may be difference of opinion. My own leaning would be in favour of the provisions contained in the Bill; at the same time, there are important considerations with regard to them. There are questions as to whether we should enforce the application of the Bill to the towns which deliberately oppose it, or whether we should only apply it to those towns which are in favour of it. Those, however; I should say, are questions which should be left to Committee. Then comes our old friend the bonâ fide traveller question. My noble Friend on the Cross Benches thinks people cannot walk three miles without the necessity for refreshment. I think my noble Friend's powers of endurance, judging from what I remember of him in earlier years, are much larger than that; and I am sure he would still, under the proposals of the Bill, be able to take that exercise for which he was formerly so renowned. The question of the bonâ fide traveller, however, and also that of the hour of closing on Saturday night, are eminently questions for Committee. My noble Friend is in favour of not interfering at all in matters of this sort by legislation; but under the existing law we limit the hours during which public-houses are open, and it is a mere question of degree whether the principle of limitation ought to be still further extended. As far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned, they are anxious to see the Second Reading passed by your Lordships. I therefore sincerely trust the House will not follow the lead of my noble Friend on the Cross Benches, but will accept the proposals which my noble Friend opposite has brought before your Lordships.

THE EARL OF CRANBROOK: My Lords, after the speech which has been made by my noble Friend opposite, I hope the noble Lord (Earl Wemyss) will not think it necessary to go to a Division on the Second Reading. It is quite clear that throughout the whole of the legislation with regard to public-houses in these countries there is always the question of degree as to the amount of regulation to which they should be subjected. They are, of course, upon a different footing to ordinary trades, and the liquor trade has always been dealt with by local and other regulations in a different way to others. It appears that no one takes exception to the existing law in Ireland in reference to Sunday Closing everywhere except in the five large cities; and with reference to them my noble Friend, speaking for the Government, has left that question for consideration in Committee. It seems to me, therefore, that my noble Friend who has made this Motion has really obtained all he desires in the declaration by the Government that the points in which he is mainly interested are questions for Committee, and will be left open to him for discussion hereafter. I trust, therefore, the House will give a vote, in accordance with that declaration, for the Second Reading.

*LORD ABERDARE would certainly not have risen to speak on this subject had he not been twice challenged by his noble Friend. He thought it might be useful if he stated his views of the success which had attended like legislation in the Principality. He had had a great deal to do with this kind of legislation, and in his opinion Parliament ought to proceed very carefully in the matter of restriction. He would be prepared at that moment to oppose any attempt to enforce absolute prohibition of Sunday drinking over the whole Kingdom. Yet when a Bill relating to Sunday Closing in Wales was introduced and passed through the House of Commons, he did not hesitate to take charge of that Bill in this House, because, in the first place, he wished to act in accordance with the feelings of his fellow-countrymen, and, secondly, because he wished to see an interesting experiment made. A Conservative paper of large circulation in Wales sent a very able man to make inquiry into the direct effect of this restrictive law in Wales. It came out that while the Act was acceptable to Welshmen generally, and had worked satisfactorily in the rural parts of the country, there certainly was a very great failure in the large and dense populations, especially where those populations had been brought together very recently. He referred more particularly to the Rhondda Valley, where there was now a population of 120,000, where he remembered a population of very few thousands. In the Rhondda Valley alone, every Sunday upwards of 60 brakes drove out to take people just about three miles from their place of residence, and Sunday was consequently desecrated in a very gross manner. In Cardiff the measures of repression were not effective, and the consequence was that there was an outburst of illicit drinking in the place.

These facts were clearly brought out, and he stated that unless some vigorous attempt was made to enforce the law he certainly would not vote for its continuance. What had happened at Cardiff made him doubtful of applying such a doctrine to Dublin. The object of all law, he imagined, was not merely to punish offenders, but to prevent the commission of offences. According to a return published in a Cardiff newspaper, there had been within two years about 400 convictions for keeping sheheens on Sundays. It was clear, therefore, that the law, although it had punished, had not succeeded in repressing illicit drinking; but he believed the Local Authorities were doing their utmost to put down this defiance of the law. Therefore, while he should certainly vote for the Bill, he was doubtful of applying such a law to a city like Dublin. He had at one time to inquire into the condition of crime there, and found that in 1874, when the population was about 360,000, Dublin contained more criminals of a grave character than the whole of the rest of Ireland. Its ordinary crime was more than double that of Birmingham, with about the same population. In the Act of 1872, which he had the honour of passing through Parliament, it was provided that the Local Authorities, in all towns except London, should have the power of closing public-houses at any time between 9 and 11 at night if, in their view, such a course was required. The experiment of closing at 10 p.m. was tried at Liverpool and several other large towns with much advantage and without the slightest manifestation of discontent. Unfortunately this opportunity of trying a useful experiment was repealed by the Licensing Act of 1874. Power as to the opening and closing of public-houses should, within certain limits, be given to the Local Authorities. They should have the right to make the experiment. He would be glad to see a clause embodying that principle contained in the Bill. Subject to those remarks he would support the Second Reading.

*THE EARL OF MEATH said, that the speech of the noble Lord (the Earl of Wemyss) would have been an excellent speech if it had been delivered 15 years ago. But now they had an experience of 15 years, from which it appeared that in the whole of Ireland, with the exception of the five towns to which the Act did not apply, Sunday Closing had been a very great success. Some time since a house-to-house canvass had been made for the purpose of finding out the opinion of the five exempted towns with regard to Sunday Closing. In Dublin there were 34,000 householders who said "Aye" and only 8,000 who said "No"—that was a majority of 26,000 in favour of this measure.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Out of a population of—

THE EARL OF MEATH did not think that was to the point. Then, in Belfast there were 23,900 "Ayes" and only 2,900 who said "No," or a majority of 21,000. In Cork there were 9,605 who said "Aye" and only 1,807 who said "No," or a majority of 7,000. In Limerick there were more than 5,600 "Ayes" and only 560 "Noes," or a majority of upwards of 5,000. In Waterford there were upwards of 3,000 "Ayes" and only 290 "Noes," giving a majority of more than 3,000. If that was not an emphatic expression of opinion on the part of the householders and ratepayers of those cities in favour of Sunday Closing he did not know what an expression of opinion was. The noble Lord had spoken a great deal about what members of the Alliance had said. But noble Lords who represented the vast majority of the people of Ireland, and who did not claim to represent the Alliance, asked the House to pass this Bill, which, as Irishmen, they believed would be for the benefit of their country. The noble Lord had told them that this legislation had been a failure in Wales and Scotland, but they had nothing to do with that in this connection regarding Ireland. The Union was for Imperial purposes, and they did not want to know what was happening in Glasgow and Cardiff on this subject. The noble Lord alluded to the subject of grocers' licences, and had passed it by somewhat cursorily; but the noble Lord must know that these licences were the greatest curse. Women went into grocers' shops and got behind a partition, where they were supplied with drink unobserved. He was very much pleased to hear that Her Majesty's Government were going to support this Bill, and that the Members of the late Government in their Lordships' House would also give it their support. The majority of the people of Ireland were in favour of the principle of the Bill. There was no division, either political or religious, on the question. Protestants and Catholics, Home Rulers and Unionists alike, were united in favour of the Bill, and therefore all Parties in their Lordships' House could support it. Neither Party could afford to oppose the measure. The Unionists certainly could not do so, for they would by doing so be putting an argument into the mouths of their opponents, which later on it would be very difficult for them to refute.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, that after the intimation given by the noble Earl (Earl Spencer), that the Government regarded the provision making permanent the Act of 1878 as the main principle of the Bill, he begged to withdraw his Amendment, and leave the measure open to be dealt with in Committee upon the questions of four towns, Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, being brought under the Bill, the 9 o'clock closing and the bonâ fide traveller. He would, therefore, not put the House to the trouble of dividing upon the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Original Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 18th instant.

POST OFFICE (ACQUISITION OF SITES) BILL.—(No. 36.)

Returned from the Commons with the Amendments agreed to.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

NEW SOUTH WALES CURRENCY.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government has any information with regard to the alleged intended legislation by the New South Wales Government for the issue of inconvertible paper money in the shape of bank notes based on other security than coin ; and whether the said notes are to have a forced circulation as legal tender for debts in the Colony ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar) : We have no information, except that which has been recently reported from time to time in the Press.

PENSIONS AND SUPERANNUATION ALLOWANCES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the total amount annually paid from public sources in the United Kingdom for pensions and superannuation allowances, distinguishing between payments by or on behalf of the various Departments of the Government and payments by Local Authorities, and the estimated number of persons so pensioned ?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.) : I have no information as to the amount paid for pensions by Local Authorities. As regards pensions paid from Public Funds, I may say that a Return ordered on a Return of the hon. Member for the Leigh Division of South-West Lancashire is now in preparation, which will give complete information on the subject.

SCOTCH RAILWAY RATES.

MR. JACKS (Stirlingshire) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, in spite of the Railway Companies' statement that they were revising their rates so that the increase should in no case exceed 5 per cent., the rates on potatoes from Cockburnspath to Dunbar, a distance of seven and a-half miles, has been raised from 1s. 8d. per ton to 2s. 11d. per ton, or 75 per cent. ; whether he is aware that the farmers in that district depend chiefly on their potatoes to pay their rent, and that this increase of rates equals 10s. per acre increase in their rents ; whether he is aware that the Railway Companies give preferential rates to foreign potato growers ; and whether, considering the disastrous results of these two factors, he can see his way to enforce a return to the old rates, and to prevent the Railway Companies giving any preference to foreign as against the Scottish grower ?

Mr. Webster

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) : I am informed that the rate of 2s. 11d. per ton for the carriage of potatoes from Cockburnspath to Dunbar has been reduced to 2s. 6d. The company assure me that they do not give preferential rates to foreign potato growers.

THE BOARD OF TRADE AND THE RAILWAY COMPANIES.

MR. JACKS : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to his declaration a few weeks before Easter, that if the Railway Companies did not arrive at a satisfactory arrangement with the traders before Easter, he would take prompt and stringent measures against them, and to the disastrous effects upon trade of the present increases, he can see his way to bring in some measure or take some more effective step than the appointment of a Committee to prevent the charging of any increase over the old rate until the new Schedules have been arranged and approved of ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I think it is better that the subject should be considered by the Committee of the House, and that any action which it may be hereafter necessary to take should be taken on their recommendation and Report.

SCHOOL SANITATION.

MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, in the matter of lighting, warming, cleaning, ventilating, and office accommodation, the increased requirements of Schedule VII. are being insisted upon in schools where the arrangements in these respects have been hitherto passed by the Department ?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) : I assume that reference is made to the Circular to Inspectors, which asks for information as to the condition of school buildings and apparatus. If the Department admitted that because school buildings were once approved by it they might, therefore, remain in the same condition for the rest of time, it would cut at the root of all progress in improving the surroundings of the children so as to make them as healthy as possible. We do not admit this, and intend to bring the condition of our schools, in matters of lighting, ventilation, furniture, office accommodation, and the like, up to the standard of modern requirements within a reasonable limit of time.

FEVER IN THE LEWIS.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that the Medical Officer of Health for Ross and Cromarty failed to go to the fever-stricken township of Cromore, when on his recent professional visit to the Island of Lewis ; and whether steps will be taken forthwith to ascertain the condition of health and sanitary matters in that and other remote townships in the island ?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) : In reply to the hon. Member I find that on his recent visit to the Lews the Medical Officer of Health for Ross and Cromarty went as far as Keose intending to visit Cromore, but, learning from the District Medical Officer that the outbreak of fever had ceased, did not consider it necessary to proceed further. I may add that the District Medical Officer made regular visits and Reports, and that the County Sanitary Inspector also visited Cromore and reported to the District Committee, and I accordingly see no cause for any special inquiry.

THE CONDITION OF INDIA.

MR. NAOROJI (Finsbury, E.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, in order to enable this House to form a correct judgment of the progress, if any, in the condition of India, he will give to the House information about the condition of India in past years to compare with the present condition ; and whether for that purpose he will reconsider his decision, and lay before Parliament the Note of Sir David Barbour upon which Lord Cromer, as Finance Minister, based a statement, and also another similar one to date ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North Beds.) : A Report on the Moral and Material Progress of India is annually given to Parliament ; and the Report, which is now in course of preparation, will, according to custom, contain a review of the last 10 years. For the reasons given on the 27th April, the Secretary of State is unable to lay on the Table the confidential Note to which my hon. Friend refers.

MR. NAOROJI : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether Lord Lytton's Note, being specifically referred to in the Despatch of the Government of India dated 2nd May, 1878, [C. 2376] of 1879, and being therefore necessary to be also returned, in order to understand fully the significance of paragraph 14 of the Despatch, the Secretary of State for India will reconsider his decision, obtain a copy from the Government of India, and lay it before Parliament ?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL : In reply to my hon. Friend's question, which is really a repetition of that which he put to me on the 27th April, I am afraid I can add nothing to what I said on that occasion.

MOONLIGHTING IN COUNTY LIMERICK.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on 15th April a gang of moonlighters entered the house of a farmer named Quirke, near Barnagh, County Limerick, and beat him severely, and that they then went to the house of his son and shot him and his brother in the legs ; that on Sunday the 16th a gang of moonlighters fired into the house of Mrs. O'Brien, of Templeglantine, in the same county, the fire being returned by the inmates ; and that on Wednesday the 19th a gang of moonlighters visited the house of Dame Brenahan, at Knocktoosh, Drumcollogher, in the same county, fired into it, and then broke in, injuring Brenahan severely ; whether anyone has been made amenable for these offences ; and if he can state how many cases of moonlighting, agrarian and non-agrarian, have taken place in County Limerick from 22nd August 1892 to 30th April 1893, and how many took place in the corresponding period from 22nd August 1891 to 30th April 1892 ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : The statements in the first paragraph of the question are, in the main, correct. The case of firing into the dwelling of Mrs. Breen not O'Brien, occurred on April 15th. No person has been made amenable up to the present for these outrages; and though it is strongly suspected that some of the injured persons are in a position to identify their assailants, yet they refuse to give the police any assistance. The number of moonlighting outrages committed in Limerick between August 22, 1892, and April 30 is 17, of which nine were agrarian and eight non-agrarian. In the corresponding months of 1891-2 there was one case of moonlighting in the county. It was recorded agrarian. During the period August 22, 1890, to April 30, 1891, the number of such outrages was six, all non-agrarian.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Is it not a fact there have been 15 cases of outrage in the neighbourhood of Newcastle West during the last few months?

MR. J. MORLEY: There have been a number of cases.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: In view of the recrudescence of outrage in the district, may I ask if the Government are taking adequate steps to cope with disorder and lawlessness?

MR. J. MORLEY: Yes; every step that can be taken is being taken to suppress disorder.

REFRIGERATED MEAT FOR THE TROOPS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what are the regulations with regard to the supply of refrigerated meat to the troops at home stations; what proportion of the whole supply at any station during the year may consist of such meat; whether he can state the average cost per pound during last year of home-fed and refrigerated meat respectively; and what were the respective quantities of each supplied to the troops?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley): Refrigerated beef is accepted during the period from the 1st of October to the 31st of May for the troops at home stations; frozen mutton during the whole year. The quality must be the same as in the case of home-killed meat. During the period referred to, the refrigerated beef and frozen mutton together may amount to 60 per cent. of the total issue. The average cost of refrigerated beef and home-killed meat respectively cannot be stated, as separate contracts are not made. The quantities of each are not known. Refrigerated meat is not issued at all stations; and where it is issued it must be within the limit already stated—namely, 60 per cent.

ROMAN CATHOLICS IN THE MEDITERRANEAN FLEET.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the only Naval chaplain provided for Roman Catholics in the Mediterranean Fleet is a Maltese with a very limited knowledge of English; and whether it is intended to make more adequate provision in this respect?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): The Roman Catholic chaplain appointed to minister to the men of the Fleet at Malta is a Maltese, but there is no ground for the allegation that he has only a very limited knowledge of English. The Commander-in-Chief of the Mediterranean Station had personal communication with this gentleman prior to his appointment, and satisfied himself that, in respect of fluency and familiarity with the English language, he was sufficiently qualified for the post of Naval chaplain at Malta. It is not proposed to make any change in the appointment at present.

LORD TEMPLEMORE AND HIS TENANTS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the tenants on Lord Templemore's estate have refused to pay their rents; whether the amount, less 25 per cent., has been lodged in the hands of trustees, and if there is any truth in the report in the newspapers that a contribution of 6d. in the pound has been levied on the Poor Law Valuations as a fighting fund; and if the police authorities have made any report concerning this revival of the Plan of Campaign?

MR. THOMAS HEALY (Wexford, N.): Arising out of the question, may I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the tenants had more than once denied that they had any intention of entering into the Plan of Campaign?

MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot answer the question of the hon. Member opposite, because there appears to be foundation for the statements contained in the hon. Member's question. The police have made full reports regarding the operations on this estate—whatever is the proper name to give those operations—and I will keep the matter under close observation.

THE SHOOTING OF P. BARRY AT MALTA.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, with reference to the answer given by his Predecessor in Office on the 31st May last, respecting the case of P. Barry, leading stoker of H.M.S. Hibernia, who was shot dead by a Maltese at Malta on the 4th February 1892, whether anyone was made amenable in connection with this crime; and whether any provision will be made for the widow and orphans of the deceased?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Since the reply referred to was given by the right hon. Member for the Ormskirk Division of Lancashire, the following Report has been received through our Commander-in-Chief in the Mediterranean:—

"I am directed to state for the information of Sir George Tryon that the Crown Advocate has reported that no evidence in the matter sufficient to support an indictment was produced at the magisterial inquiry; that, therefore, no steps could be taken to initiate any prosecution of the individual concerned."

As Barry was on leave at the time of his death, our Regulations do not admit of any provision being made for his widow and children.

THE IRISH FISHERIES.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.E.): In the absence of the hon. Member for South-East Cork, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries on the inquiries recently held respecting the mackerel and herring fisheries off the south coast of Ireland has been made and forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant; and, if so, will the Local Authorities at Kinsale be supplied with copies of such Report?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Report of the Inspectors of Fisheries respecting the herring and mackerel fisheries at Kinsale has been presented to the Lord Lieutenant. The recommendations contained in the Report are under consideration; but, inasmuch as the carrying out of these recommendations would involve legislation, and as the points at issue have reference to the early season, which has almost passed over, no object would, I am advised, be gained by communicating the Report to the Local Authorities.

DISTURBANCES IN DOMINICA.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies has received from Dominica a letter, dated 17th April, 1893, signed by Messrs. Davies, Pemberton, Bellot, and others, giving a detailed statement of the occurrences at that island when the peasantry were fired upon by a force of police from Antigua and seamen from H.M.S. Mohawk, in the presence of the Governor, Sir W. H. Smith, and four men killed and two women wounded; and whether steps will be taken to make a full and independent inquiry into the circumstances, and also into the present system of administration in the West Indies?

MR. BUXTON: The Secretary of State has received a letter from the person named, and also a full Report from the Governor of the Colony respecting the lamentable occurrence in Dominica referred to in the question. The full Despatches have only just been received, and there has not been time to examine them sufficiently to enable a decision to be come to on the question of whether a further inquiry is necessary; but the matter will certainly receive the most anxious consideration.

BOARD OF AGRICULTURE PUBLICATIONS.

MR. LUTTRELL (Devon, Tavistock): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether it is the case that farmers' clubs, agricultural societies, and other similar bodies can now be supplied with the publications of the Board at cheap rates for gratuitous distribution to their members?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): I am glad to say that the Treasury have authorised the Board of Agriculture to supply Chambers of Agriculture, Agricultural Societies, Farmers' Clubs, Village Institutes, and other similar bodies, with certain of our Departmental Publications at half price, provided that not less than 20 copies are taken, and that they are intended for gratuitous distribution to members. I propose to issue a Circular Letter to the institutions concerned in the course of a few days, and I hope that the arrangement will result in a much wider dissemination than at present of the publications in question.

THE SHIP ROCKET APPARATUS.

MR. LUTTRELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the directions on the ship rocket apparatus are only in English and French; and, if this be the case, whether he will provide for the inclusion of directions in German and Spanish?

MR. MUNDELLA: The directions are only in English and French. The question of adding directions in other languages has been considered, and experimental tally boards have been made; but the Board of Trade were advised that the necessary addition to the size of the tally board would more than counterbalance the advantage, as the board has to be hauled through the sea and has to meet with all kinds of obstructions from rocks, wreckage, &c. Germans and Spaniards are not the only foreign seamen besides French wrecked upon the coast of Great Britain.

SCOTCH PRISONS.

MR. WILLIAM WHITE LAW (Perth): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, in view of the information supplied by the Fourteenth Report of the Scotch Prison Commissioners in regard to over-crowding in Scotch prisons, he will grant a Return showing the number of prisoners in the 11 largest Scotch prisons for each week, from 1st April, 1891, to 31st March, 1893?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: If the hon. Member will put his question to me again on an early day next week I shall be in a position to answer him.

CHAPEL TRUST DEEDS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there are a number of places of public religious worship, certified as such and exempted by statute from liability to rates, the trust deeds of which are not enrolled in Chancery; and whether there are any means whereby such trust deeds may be inspected by the public or by members of the congregation using such places of worship; and, if not, whether the Government will take into their consideration the expediency of providing the public with an opportunity of inspecting such trust deeds at reasonable hours?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): By Section 7 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, enrolment is not necessary, but optional with the trustees, in the case of assurances of land for religious purposes of the class there described. No doubt a considerable number of places of worship come within this exemption. How many it is impossible to say. I am not aware of any means by which the inspection of deeds not enrolled can be compelled, nor does it appear to me to be either practicable or expedient that such inspection shall be made compulsory.

THE NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to a Circular issued by the National Education Association, urging parents to demand free education, and stating that parents whose children are paying no fee in their present standard may demand a free school if fees are charged in the higher standards; the school must be free from top to bottom, or the Department will not recognise it as a free school; whether, under the Act of 1891, parents are entitled to anything more than free education for their own children; and whether, as a matter of fact, it is the practice of the Department upon a single such demand to insist upon the provision of a school "free from top to bottom"?

MR. ACLAND: My attention has not been called to this Circular till now. I am afraid the noble Lord has misunderstood the meaning of the words "from top to bottom." You can have a school free from top to bottom for a single child, and that is evidently what is meant. It is most necessary to insist on this, for the Department have actually had cases before them in which managers have practically said to a parent—"There are free places in this school, but only in the first standard. The child can have free education, but as long as you do not pay fees the child shall stay in the first standard." This is a mere evasion of the Act, hence the need for insisting on freedom from top to bottom.

X THE HULL STRIKE.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): In the absence of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Bristol, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has seen the official Report of Superintendent Elliott, Chief of the Hull Police Fire Brigade, respecting the recent fire at the Citadel Estate in that city; and, if so, whether he will communicate to the House the purport of the information therein contained; and whether he is aware that a man has recently died in the workhouse at Duffield in consequence of alleged ill-treatment at the hands of the pickets in Hull?

MR. ASQUITH: I have seen Superintendent Elliott's Report in the newspapers, but it is a Report made to the Corporation, and I have no official knowledge of it, nor do I see any reason why it should be communicated. I have no knowledge as to the allegations in the second paragraph, but I have sent to the Chief Constable asking for information.

THE COMMITTEE ON RAILWAY RATES.

MR. WARNER (Somerset, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has ascertained that the Railway Directors, being paid servants of the companies, are eligible to serve on the Committee on Railway Rates?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am not aware of any reason why Railway Directors should not serve on the Committee in question. The Committee is not appointed to fix rates.

THE HOME RULE BILL.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the great importance of the subject, he will have the Resolutions to be moved in the Government of Ireland [Payments] Committee printed and circulated at once?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): I agree that the House ought to have full notice of our intentions in the Parliamentary Committee with regard to the Financial Clauses of the Bill, the principles of which have been clearly announced, but the details of which are still a matter for consideration. I take this opportunity of giving notice that it is our intention, when we come to the Financial Clauses of the Bill, to move that they be postponed until the other clauses of the Bill have been dealt with. I will give the reasons for the proposal when we come to it. We will take care that full information is in possession of the House before any proposals are submitted.

MR. JACKSON: Will the Monetary Committee on the Government of Ireland Bill be taken before going into Committee on the Bill?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Oh, no; certainly not. I think that the Financial Clauses ought not to be dealt with before going into Committee.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I am aware that that proceeding is strictly in Order, but it is very unusual to defer the Monetary Committee until particular clauses are dealt with; and I would ask whether it is not the more usual course to take the Monetary Committee before the main Bill goes into Committee at all?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It very often happens that Monetary Clauses are found in a Bill, the great mass of which refer to matter which is not monetary, and the usual practice is to have the Parliamentary Committee before the Definitive Clauses are brought under consideration, and we shall take care that that is done. It is a question connected with the Forms of the House, and I am not yet aware, but I will inform myself, how far the Parliamentary Committee will carry us towards fixing all the details, and we will take care that the House is in no way misled or inconvenienced.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): We did not quite catch in this part of the House the effect of the announcement which the right hon. Gentleman has just made. Do I understand him to say that the Government contemplate changes in the Financial Clauses of the Bill?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No; I have nothing new to announce on that at present. It will be borne in mind that when the Bill was discussed on Second Reading, I did state, with regard to that portion of the Financial Clauses which is prospective and pre-supposes augmentation in the direct taxation of this country, it would be necessary to enter into further details, and to give a more specific explanation of our intention.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: May I understand, with regard to the clauses on the Paper, that the Government adhere to them, or is it only with regard to additional clauses which have been promised by my right hon. Friend that he reserves his discretion?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I doubt very much whether the knowledge of the House will be much advanced by that mode of treating the subject. It will be recollected that there is now a provision in the Bill which refers to a possible future increase in the Excise Duties, and I said that provision was to be regarded rather as the assertion of a principle—namely, the liability of Ireland for additional charges which may hereafter come into view—than as expressing the precise form in which we might find it expedient to bring it finally to the judgment of the House.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not wish unduly to press my right hon. Friend; but may I ask whether I am entitled to understand that, so far as regards the revision of the Customs Duties, the Government adhere to their original proposal?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Undoubtedly. We have not seen any reason, as at present, to depart from that intention; but my right hon. Friend will recollect that, in explaining that portion of the Bill, I dwelt strongly upon the principle of contribution, and pointed out that there were various forms in which that principle might be applied, such as the quota and the fund plans; but that, on the whole, we were inclined to the fund plan. At the same time, I never treated the question of the particular form as one which appertains to the essence of the subject.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I assume that every financial question raised in the Bill remains open for consideration in Committee.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Unquestionably.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the intention he has announced will apply to all the financial proposals in the Bill, including those affecting the Irish Church Fund and the collection of Treasury loans outstanding?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My impression is that they all hang together. It might be a question whether the Church Fund, which is a separate matter, is involved with the rest; but I think probably it will be found convenient if the whole of the financial proposals, including that dealing with the Church Fund, should be postponed.

MR. DARLING: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government will postpone not only the Financial Clauses, but the whole Bill, until they have made up their minds what they will do with the Financial Clauses?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he proposes to take the Committee on the Bill on Monday, and to continue it de die in diem?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That is the intention. Of course, I cannot pledge myself very far into the future; but the whole of next week, and probably the beginning of the following week, will be devoted to the Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a great convenience to the House if, as the Committee stage of the Bill is to be taken on Monday, you would inform the House of your views as to the various Instructions that have been placed upon the Paper. The subject, as everybody knows, is of very great difficulty, and one on which your ruling would, I think, be of great service to those Members of the House who are interested in the Instructions.

*MR. SPEAKER : As the right hon. Gentleman has asked me to give my opinion as to the Instructions on the Government of Ireland Bill, I hope the House will bear with me for a few moments while I explain the decision which I have come to on the 13 Instructions on the Paper. I have felt great responsibility in this case, especially as I have come to the conclusion, for reasons I will explain shortly, that the great majority of them are not in Order. I should like to say that the principles which guide and limit the system of Instructions on going into Committee may be thus stated :—First, an Instruction must empower the Committee to do something which the Committee is not otherwise empowered to do ; secondly, the purpose of the Instruction must be supplementary and ancillary to the purpose of the Bill, and must fall within the general scope and framework of the Bill ; thirdly, it is irregular to introduce into the Bill by an Instruction to the Committee a subject which should properly form the substance of a distinct measure, having regard to usage and the general practice of enacting distinct Statutes for distinct branches of law. Having these general principles and limitations in view, I come to consider the 13 Instructions on the Paper, and, if the House will follow me, I will go through them seriatim. The first Instruction (that of the hon. Member for Wandsworth), I think, would properly form the subject of a separate measure so far as relates to the representation of Great Britain, and as regards that of Ireland no Instruction is necessary. The second (that of the hon. Member for the Partick Division of Lanark) deals with the ad referendum principle, and this I need not say is the Instruction which has given me the most anxiety ; but I have come to the conclusion that an ad referendum is a matter of such transcendent importance that it could not be brought within the scope of the Bill by an Instruction to the Committee. I know that the ad referendum has been included in the provisions of some Private Bills, enabling the ratepayers to decide by a vote whether or not they should adopt a particular Act which imposed a charge upon them. But this Instruction is a proposal to enable the electors to override the decision of this House, to go over the heads of the elected Representatives of the people, and to submit to the electors generally whether a Bill of this great magnitude should come into force or not. That, I think, is quite beyond the scope of the Bill, and could not be brought within the scope of the Bill by an Instruction. The object sought to be obtained in No. 3 (the Instruction of the hon. Member for North Hackney) may, I think, be done in Committee without the necessity of an Instruction. Nos. 4 and 5 (standing in the name of the hon. Member for Oxford), which deal with the Army and Militia, are, I think, beyond the scope of the Bill. The Militia is a part of the Military Force, and, like the Army, is under the control of the Military Authorities ; and it seems to me that it would be an improper dictation to the Executive and to the authorities of the Army to interfere with the movement of troops from one portion of the Kingdom to another. That cannot be properly considered as ancillary to the Bill. It is beyond the scope of the Bill, and cannot be brought within its scope by means of an Instruction. No. 6 (that in the name of the hon. Member for the Whitby Division of Yorkshire) is a modified ad referendum. I have alluded generally to the ad referendum, and I may say that in speaking of it, while I do hold that a Bill such as this cannot be overridden by an appeal to the electors, I am far from saying that in particular localities the ad referendum principle cannot be adopted ; and in the case of No. 6 the House will observe that what is there proposed is that Ulster may be empowered to exclude itself from the Bill. Ulster, of course, might be excepted from the Bill, as any other portion of the United Kingdom may be excepted from a Bill of general application ; but this may always be done without an Instruction. This local referendum, it will be seen, is a very different thing from saying that the whole Bill can be overridden by an appeal to the electors over the heads of the Representatives of the electors in this House. The alteration suggested in No. 7 (the Inon of the hon. Member for Bolton) proposed in Committee without an Instruction. No. 8 (that of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Kingston Division of Surrey) is so indefinite that I do not hold that it is in Order; but, so far as I can understand it, its object can be carried in Committee without an Instruction. No. 9 (that of the hon. Member for South Tyrone) is a Land Bill of the same scope. It forms a distinct subject for legislation. Following the principles which I have ventured to lay down to-day in this House, it cannot, I think, be brought within the scope of the framework of the Bill before the House. No. 10 (that of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby) falls within the same category. The Land Reform Bill for the United Kingdom. No. 11 (that of the hon. Member for Llyn Regis), which proposes to divide the Bill into two parts, is, according to all precedents, distinctly in Order. Coming to No. 12 (that of the right hon. Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham), I have already said that I do not think any definite portion of Ireland should be excluded, or be empowered to exempt itself, from the operation of the Bill. Any Amendments proposed in Committee without an Instruction. No. 13 (that of the noble Lord the Member for West Lancashire) can also be carried into effect without the Bill without an Instruction. To summarise what I have said, therefore, to the House, part of No. 1, No. 2, No. 9 and 10 would require separate Instructions. Nos. 3, 7, 12, and 13 can be dealt with in Committee, Nos. 4 and 5 are outside the scope of the Bill, No. 8 is sufficiently definite, and No. 11 is in Order. The House, I hope, will see that I have tried to deal with each case on its separate merits, and without having any preconceived opinion on the subject.

THE IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.

T. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I want to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the State function proposed to be held next Wednesday, it is intended that the House should sit on that day.

W. E. GLADSTONE: We have formed any intention of making any alteration to the House.

Mr. Speaker

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

(No. 118.)

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th April], "That the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law, &c."—(Mr. Secretary Asquith.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, that when on a previous night he desired to say a few words on this subject, he was interrupted by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in a manner of which, as a Member of the House of much longer standing than the right hon. Gentleman, he thought, if he desired to be critical, he might well complain. But he would not introduce controversial matter calculated to prolong the discussion. He was desirous that the Bill, in an amended form, should pass this Session. He objected to discussing this Bill before a Standing Committee. His experience of Standing Committees and also of Committees of the whole House convinced him that, although a Standing Committee might be fitting for the discussion of the details or of the points of law, it was not the proper tribunal for dealing with the broad principles that were involved in this Bill. He felt he was entitled to refer to the elementary character of the Second Reading Debate, which had extended over several evenings, and in the course of which 17 Members had spoken.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Question before the House is as to what Committee the Bill shall be referred to.

SIR F. S. POWELL: I was going to argue that point, Sir. I want this Bill to pass, but I think I have a duty to my constituents to point out what has occurred in these Debates.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The question of how many speeches were delivered on the Second Reading cannot be discussed on a Resolution for referring a Bill to the Grand Committee.

SIR F. S. POWELL said, he would entirely accept the ruling of the Chair.

although he had a strong desire to explain his reasons for the complaint that the Second Reading Debate was a very disjointed one. Hon. Members felt that they had not had the opportunity they were entitled to enjoy of rebutting the accusation which had been made against employers of labour. They desired to do so before the full House, and not before a Standing Committee. Another reason why the Bill should be referred to a Committee of the full House was that the 3rd clause, as it now stood, was of a somewhat nebulous character. A clause of such great importance ought to be debated before a Committee of the whole House, instead of being discussed in the imperfect manner and under the difficult circumstances which attended consideration by a Standing Committee. The 5th clause also dealt with a matter of a very large character in reference to compensation, and was certainly worthy of being considered by the whole House.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, instead of to the Standing Committee on Law. He said he did not think that in making this proposition he was doing anything hostile to the progress of the Bill. There was, he believed, a universal desire that the measure should pass; but, at the same time, a strong feeling existed that the proposals of the Government were inadequate. There was also a considerable divergence of opinion amongst various sections of the community as to the matters of principle involved in the Bill, and it was evident that there must be a very long and animated discussion upon those points. He did not think that Members who were not Members of the Standing Committee would be satisfied to leave those questions of principle to the consideration of the Committee. It must also be borne in mind that the Standing Committee would sit concurrently with the Committee of the House on the Government of Ireland Bill. The consideration of the Government of Ireland Bill in Committee would be a very great strain upon those who took an active part in it, and a great many of those who were especially interested in the Government of Ireland Bill would be unable to attend at the Sittings of the Standing Committee. Under these circumstances, he thought that it would be much more advantageous to send the Bill to a Select Committee than to refer it to the Standing Committee. One advantage of referring the measure to a Select Committee would be that it would be possible to hear evidence which might throw a most valuable light upon the proposal of the Government, and might greatly increase the usefulness and success of the Bill. The obvious objection to a Select Committee was that it did not avoid the Committee stage in the House; but it seemed to him that the measure was eminently one for compromises and arrangements which could be carried out infinitely better in a Select Committee than in the House itself or in a Standing Committee.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "the Standing Committee on Law, &c.," and insert the words "a Select Committee."—(Mr. Parker Smith.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the Standing Committee on' stand part of the Question."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I wish, in the first place, to recognise the kindness and promptness with which the First Lord of the Treasury met my appeal yesterday, and acceded to the advice of many Members to say a few words on this measure, and I hope I shall not abuse his kindness. I feel that in this matter we are entirely in the hands of the Government. They are the masters, and, if I may be allowed to do so, I would advise my hon. Friend not to trouble the House with a Division on the Amendment if it be not accepted. I wish, however, to put before the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith) the reasons why I believe it will be to the interests of the Government and, above all, to the interests of this Bill, that he should reconsider his decision to send the Bill to a Grand Committee. May I, in one sentence, protest against the charges which have been made in the organ of the Government against my hon. Friends and myself on account of our action on the Bill. It was said that I brought forward a sham Amendment. I am quite sure that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will not concur in that view. The Amendment gave rise to a most serious and instructive Debate, and, though it was not carried to a Division, it was only because, had it been carried, the Bill would have been destroyed. I intend, however, to raise the question later on, when it can be decided without danger to the Bill itself. As regards my hon. Friends who were accused of obstruction on Tuesday, of course it is difficult to convince those who believe that every Liberal Unionist has a double dose of original sin; but that was not their intention. We believe that this is a non-Party question. We believe that the Government have a great opportunity of settling a very vexed and difficult question to the great advantage of all classes concerned; and if they will take the opportunity we offer them our most cordial and hearty assistance in the task. I do not blame the Government for bringing in the Bill in its present form, because it would naturally appear to them to be the simplest and most practical way of dealing with the question to embody in a measure the proposals of an important body of Trade Unionists. The Government might well have thought that that was as far as public opinion would allow them to go. But the Debate has shown that on both sides of the House there was an inclination to go further; that public opinion has greatly developed; and that there is an inclination once for all to find a settlement for this question. There can be no doubt that there are two great defects in the Bill. The first is that it only deals with less than one-half of the accidents for which we want it to provide. It is necessarily, therefore, an incomplete measure. In the second place, it has the serious and fatal defect of interfering with the present system of arrangements between employers and employed by which workmen are secured against all kinds of accidents. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has said that he has no desire to interfere in any way with these most advantageous arrangements, although he refused to receive a deputation representing some 12,000 miners on the subject. I would say, without intending to be unduly critical, that I never knew a Government which had such a horror of deputations. My right hon. Friend was, I believe, in favour of the view taken by that deputation, because he has expressed himself in writing, and also in the House, to the effect that the Government do not desire to prevent or in any way discourage these arrangements. It must, however, have been proved to my right hon. Friend beyond dispute that if the Bill is carried in its present condition it will probably destroy these arrangements. [Mr. ASQUITH dissented.] I know more about it, if I may say so, than my right hon. Friend does. I know the question from a commercial point of view; I have conversed both with the employers who make these arrangements and the workmen who accept them, and I say there is a feeling of great alarm that this Bill will prevent arrangements of the kind being entered into in the future. It stands to reason that the object of the employers in making large contributions to funds of the kind is to prevent litigation and quarrels with their workmen. Is it likely that they will continue to make contributions if, under the provisions of this Bill, they are to continue liable to be involved in litigation? These are the two important points on which I say it has been proved, in the course of the Debate, that the Bill is defective. There has been evidence on all sides of the House of a desire to carry the measure much further than it goes at present, and to apply its provisions to all classes of accidents. That would, of course, entail practical transformation of the Bill, and I submit to my right hon. Friend that it is impossible, even with the greatest good-will on the part of everybody, to carry out such a transformation in a Grand Committee. Such a Committee, in the first place, is too numerous; and, in the second place, it cannot do that which is essential to a proper arrangement—take some evidence. In order that a proper scheme should be formulated, it is desirable that any Committee before which the Bill is sent should hear the evidence of at least one Representative of each of the great trades, and so obtain the views of the employers in the shipbuilding, the railway, and the mining interests on the subject, while the workmen's interests should be put forward by a representative of the Trades Unions. I believe that would be enough, and that a small Committee would be able to come to a more satisfactory conclusion in respect of this question than a large Committee could. Such a Committee would be able to act as a council of advice to my right hon. Friend, and enable him to produce a Bill which would meet with the general assent of the House. In the event of my right hon. Friend accepting this proposal, I entertain no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition would join me in giving an assurance that every assistance would be given to enable the Government to carry the Bill through its future stages, with only such reasonable discussion of its provisions as my right hon. Friend himself would not object to. My view is that my right hon. Friend, by accepting this proposal, would save time, would make the Bill a better one, and would connect his own name and the name of his Government with a really useful and valuable measure. It may be that my right hon. Friend is not touched by my arguments. He may say that he does not believe he will save time, or that he is not prepared to accept any considerable changes. In that case, my second point is that the Bill ought to go to a Committee of the Whole House. On this point I would refer my right hon. Friend to the speeches made by the Prime Minister when these Grand Committees were first constituted; and he will find that the right hon. Gentleman contemplated a reference to them of special Bills, which interested only a portion of the House; and of course he meant, comparatively speaking, not a very large portion of the House, for when it was proposed by the other side to add agriculture to the subjects that were to be dealt with by the Grand Committee the right hon. Gentleman at once objected. He said that agriculture was such an extensive subject, and interested so many hon. Members of the House, that it was not a fit subject to be sent before a Grand Committee. Well, this Bill has reference to a subject that interests almost everybody in the House. It interests every hon. Member who employs a servant, or has a constituent who employs a servant. It applies to all who are interested in agriculture, and all who are interested in manufactures, and all who are interested in commerce. I do not believe a single person can say that his interests are not affected more or less by this Bill. Under these circumstances, it is not fair to take it to a Grand Committee, and it is not for such purposes that Grand Committees were appointed. If my right hon. Friend still insists that it must go there I warn him that he will not save time. This is not only not a proper Bill, but this is not a proper Session for a Grand Committee. We have such a collection of Bills of very vast importance before the House as the House has probably never known in its history, and consequently every Member interested in them is simply bound to give daily and constant attention. It is, therefore, simply impossible and unfair to call on us to take part in complicated discussions in Grand Committees; and, for myself, I can say it will be absolutely impossible for me to serve. If that course is adopted, the inevitable result will be that we shall have to reserve the whole discussion for the Report stage, and thereby one of the great objects of the Grand Committee will be lost. The right hon. Gentleman will find that he has not advanced his object in the slightest degree. Now, I said when I began that this is not in any sense a Party measure. If I regarded it from a Party point of view and considered only Party interests, I should wish that it would pass as at present framed. There has been an agitation got up in its favour, which is always the case with a new proposal; but I can tell the right hon. Gentleman, from my knowledge of what is going on, that if the measure passes it will be unpopular with a large number of those who are now the supporters of the Government. I do not believe it is necessary to treat it as a Party measure. It is the general desire that some Bill shall be passed which will prove a permanent settlement, and I do not hesitate to say that if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to accept the suggestion I have made to him, there is not the least doubt that such a Bill would be passed during the present Session.

*MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.) sincerely hoped that the Government would adhere to their own proposal, and not allow their plans to be upset by the appeal made to them. In the first place, he would remind the House that when this subject was dealt with by the late Government in 1888 they referred the Bill—the Employers' Liability Bill—to the Grand Committee on Law, although they now stigmatised that Committee as an unsuitable place for the consideration of such a measure, and notwithstanding that the Debate on the Second Reading had been shorter than it had been on the present Bill. Many hon. Members would corroborate what he said when he stated that the discussion of the Bill in the Grand Committee in 1888 was thoroughly satisfactory, much more so than it would have been either in Select Committee or Committee of the Whole House. What was the alternative that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham proposed? He did not say that if his proposal were accepted he would help them to pass the Bill through. He said the Bill was a bad one, and would become an unpopular one, and he suggested as an alternative for it a scheme of industrial assurance which had little or no connection with the Bill, and with regard to which, for his part, as at present advised, if incorporated in the measure when it came up for Third Reading, he should vote against it. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had been thoroughly considered by the House, and the House had given a decision against it, and if it were brought forward again it would only be as an engine of obstruction. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would pursue the same course in regard to it as that adopted by the late Government.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) said, he did not in the least desire to introduce Party considerations into the Debate. He thought the House was determined to carry the Bill to a successful issue; but he wished to support the hon. Member for the Partick Division of Glasgow (Mr. Parker Smith) in his desire to have it referred to a Select Committee, so that the case of employment at sea should be thoroughly thrashed out. The Home Secretary had introduced a most important principle into the Bill, of including seamen in the same way as those who were employed on land, and he thought it was only appropriate that this matter should be fully considered in a Select Committee. He thought they ought to be clear on the facts before they proceeded to legislate. Employment at sea was of a very special character, and what they wanted to know before the Bill went into Committee was the extent and nature of negligence which the Home Secretary intended to include in his Bill, and what were the acts he intended to exclude. Before the Select Committee in 1886, the hon. Member for Middlesbrough stated that all his wants were expressed in the formula which he laid before the Committee; but the Home Secretary had introduced a formula of liability which was probably about as imperfect as any Home Secretary ever introduced.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not now discussing the tribunal before which the Bill should be sent, which is the Question before the House.

MR. LAWRENCE, said he was showing the difference between the formula of liability of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. J. Havelock Wilson) and that of the Home Secretary. They wanted a clearer definition of the claims of accident for which owners were to be rendered liable before they went into Committee on this Bill, and the only way to find out the facts was to send the Bill to a Select Committee. There seemed to be such a hopeless disparity—

MR. SPEAKER: That has nothing to do with the question.

MR. LAWRENCE: I was endeavouring to show why the Bill should go before a Select Committee, and not to the Standing Committee. [Cries of "Order, order!"]

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot agree that the course now recommended to the Government is inconsistent with that pursued by the late Government on the Bill which they introduced. The Bill of the late Government was actually framed on the recommendations of a Select Committee. The peculiarity of the present Bill is that, not only is it not based on the recommendations of a Select Committee, but it directly traverses the recommendations of the Select Committee, which dealt with the question of employers' liability to seamen. Therefore, there is perfect harmony between the course which the late Government pursued and that which is now recommended. I rise to make only this further observation. It would be perfectly impossible for Members of the Opposition to attend both Grand Committee and

Mr. Crawford

Committee on the Government of Ireland Bill. I am, therefore, obliged to advise any hon. Friends—so far as they will take my advice—to devote their attention to the more important subject, the Government of Ireland Bill, and to leave the Grand Committee on the Employers' Liability Bill—concentrating their attention on the latter measure when it reaches the Report stage.

*MR. ASQUITH: The Government will adhere to their proposal. I have listened with considerable astonishment to some of the arguments used on both sides of the House in opposition to our proposal. The late Government introduced an Employers' Liability Bill in 1888, and that proposal was discussed at very much shorter length on the Second Reading than the present Bill, though, of course, the Bill of 1888 was, as we think, less adequate and less complete than the measure now under consideration. Though discussed at much shorter length, the Bill of 1888 was referred, with the general consent of the House, to the Grand Committee on Law. I confess I cannot see what change there has been in circumstances to lead the right hon. Gentleman opposite to his altered view.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the right hon. Gentleman cannot have done me the honour to listen to my observations, in which I pointed out that the Bill of 1888 was framed on the recommendations of a Select Committee, whereas the present measure traverses the recommendations of that Select Committee.

MR. ASQUITH: I do not at all admit the justice of the right hon. Gentleman's description, and, if I did, it is wholly irrelevant to the point I am discussing—namely, as to what tribunal the Bill should be referred to. It is quite true that the Bill of 1888 followed the recommendations of the Select Committee as to the inclusion of seamen, while the present Bill does not do so; but what possible bearing has that on the question of the tribunal to which this Bill shall be referred? If the Bill went to a Select Committee evidence would be taken, and a large amount of time would be spent; and then when the Bill has been transformed to what my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Chamberlain) desires—for that is the real object—the right hon. Gentleman does not want the present Bill carried at all; he wants an entirely different Bill, of which he may claim the authorship—then the Bill will have to go through the ordeal of a Committee of the Whole House. It is very curious that the Bill should be smothered by the attentions of those who are anxious to see it passed. It is suggested that hon. Members cannot attend both Grand Committee and Committee on the Government of Ireland Bill. But I would point out that the Grand Committee only sits two days a week, meeting at 12 o'clock and adjourning at half-past 2 or 3 o'clock. There is no reason why it should sit after the House meets.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Grand Committee often sits after the House has met.

*MR. ASQUITH: That is not my experience. My object, and the object of the Government, is to get the Bill through. We desire the fullest and freest possible discussion of every one of its details. We are perfectly prepared to consider in a non-Party and friendly spirit every suggestion for its improvement, honestly believing that we can best and most effectually attain that end by referring the Bill to a Grand Committee, and leaving the House the fullest opportunity on Report to revise the decisions of the Grand Committee. We adhere to the proposition we have made.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): I should like to ask what opportunities the House will have for expressing its decision on the important point as to whether Government employés shall be brought within the scope of the Bill? A Select Committee could have taken evidence on this subject; they had before them the heads of the Admiralty and War Office. The noble Lord the Member for Rochester has put an Instruction upon the Paper which Mr. Speaker has ruled out of Order. Any Amendment in Committee or on the Report would be equally out of Order; and unless the right hon. Gentleman will afford some opportunity, the Bill will go through without any opportunity for hon. Members to raise, or for the House to decide, this question. I took some pains when the Bill of 1880 was under consideration to get a decision of the House upon this point; and I have no hesitation in saying that, had the House at that time been able to express an opinion, the Government would have been made liable to the provisions of the Act now in force. But, owing to the Forms of the House, it is not competent for a private Member to bring forward any Motion which directly or indirectly imposes a charge upon the Public Revenue; and hence I was precluded getting a decision on that occasion. I am, therefore, anxious that we shall not now be placed in the same position.

MR. ASQUITH: By the indulgence of the House I will reply to this. The request of the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly reasonable. I wish to state that the Government intend, when the Bill gets to Committee, to propose clauses dealing with this matter. The proposal will be that workmen in the employ of the Government, as, for instance, in the Dockyards and Arsenals, shall be put on the same footing—in principle upon the same footing—[Cries of "Oh!"—]as men in private employment. Hon. Members say "Oh!" but the point is one which requires a considerable amount of adjustment in its details.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I should like to say a few words as to the position in which we have been placed by the Government, who have, apparently, decided to force this Bill on to the Standing Committee on Law. In adopting this course, is not the First Lord of the Treasury deliberately breaking down the only foundation upon which Standing Committees can possibly be carried on? Bills coming back from ordinary Select Committees have to go before the Committee of the Whole House; but when a Bill comes back from the Standing Committee the Committee stage is avoided, and it immediately comes before the House on Report. To avoid the inconvenience which formerly arose, the right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister with much wisdom proposed the system of Standing Committees, in which Parties were to be fairly represented, and before whom Bills were to be much more thoroughly discussed than before a Select Committee. The right hon. Gentleman admitted at the time—and he will no doubt admit now—that as my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham pointed out, Bills which concern large and universal interests are not entirely suited to go before a Grand Committee. What will happen if the right hon. Gentleman presses this proposal? He will break down the operation of Standing Committees. A new practice will be introduced—the Opposition will have to introduce it, and I say this with the concurrence of the Leader of the Opposition—the practice of refusing, as an Opposition, to take part in the proceedings of the Committee. That is a serious step to announce; and what becomes of Standing Committees if that course is taken by a large Opposition in the House of Commons? What becomes of the system if, in order to emphasise a great difference of opinion, nearly half the House of Commons refuses to take part in a Standing Committee? How shall we ever get a Standing Committee formed again? We shall take this course on what we hold to be solid ground; we think this Bill ought to be discussed in Committee of the Whole House. The Leader of the Opposition is in agreement with me, and authorises me to say that we do not press that the Bill should go before a Select Committee; but we must insist, by the use of all the legitimate Parliamentary weapons we can bring to bear, that a Bill of this magnitude and importance shall be kept within the cognisance of the House during the Committee stage. I do appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury—have we not got enough subjects of difference at this time? Why add this to them? It must effect most unfortunately a great reform of procedure that the Prime Minister carried with great advantage to this House. The right hon. Gentleman is straining his own form of procedure by trying to force a very large Opposition against their will to go before a Standing Committee and forego the discussion of a great measure in Committee of the Whole House; he is adding a most bitter controversy to the many which now, unfortunately, exist. From what I know of the opinion of hon. Gentlemen behind me and from the knowledge I have of the opinion of the Leader of the Opposition, I believe it is their determination to disregard most of the proceedings of the Standing Committee. Certainly to send the Bill there must lead to a tremendous addition to the labours of Parliament as a whole, for it must lengthen the proceedings on the Report, and by so doing destroy one of the greatest implements of usefulness which the right hon. Gentleman has introduced into the procedure of the House.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not want to prolong the Debate more than a very few minutes. I am quite sure my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham will join with me in melancholy reflection on the fate of the promise which he made. I must say he had a better reason for that promise, if it was founded upon a fair consideration of the exigencies and merits of the case, than there has been for the remarkable speech we have just had from the noble Lord.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I stated that if the Bill remained in Committee of the Whole House we would not press for its reference to a Select Committee at all.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The case is before us. I am not going to impute to the noble Lord or to anyone who has spoken the smallest evil intention. Let that be understood. He has formed his opinion as to the best mode of pushing forward the Bill, and we have formed ours. I am bound to say that the Government have arrived at the conclusion that the mode recommended by the noble Lord—and now, as I understand, by the right hon. Gentleman sitting near him, the Leader of the Opposition—is a mode which, in our view, would render it totally impossible to pass the Bill into law during the present Session, and would lead unnecessarily to the postponement of a most valuable reform. The noble Lord has spoken with great solemnity of tone, bearing evidence to his deep sincerity, of the use, on this particular occasion, of all the means of Constitutional opposition which the Forms of the House provide in the event of our persevering with our proposal. Well, Sir, that is a threat which I admit is, under extraordinary circumstances, however inconvenient, yet possibly justifiable; but what are the circumstances under which the threat is made? In a matter admitted to be one not of Party contention and one of deep interest to the working men of this country, working under those who are described as employers, we are to be met with this resort to the extremest method of Parliamentary opposition. For what? For adopting exactly the same method of proceeding which the late Government adopted in 1888. I appeal to the fairness of the noble Lord. Is this a suitable occasion? I do not want to compel the noble Lord to make another speech; I leave it to the internal operations of his own mind, which are always conducted in a spirit of candour and with a desire for the public good. Is it a fair proceeding, with respect to the immediate proposition before the House, to resort to the menace of the use of this extreme weapon, when we are going to refer the Bill to a Committee in exactly the same manner as the late Government referred their Bill upon the same subject? I am convinced that the Opposition will not decline in a body to serve upon a Grand Committee under the circumstances in which the Grand Committee is proposed—precisely the same as it was proposed upon a Bill on the same subject by the Government which they supported a few years ago.

MR. MACINNES (Northumberland, Hexham) said, he desired to point out that this question had already been considered by a Select Committee which sat in the year 1886, and he was bound to remark that very little use had been made of the evidence given before that Select Committee by hon. Gentlemen who were now anxious to relegate this question once more to a Select Committee. Many hon. Members regretted that they would not be able to take part in the discussion of the Bill by a Grand Committee; but they hoped that those who might be nominated to sit on the Committee would not justify the noble Lord's outburst. Let them remember that this was not a Party question; that it was a matter which every class of the community wished to see settled, and in regard to which a vast amount of information was stored in Blue Books in the evidence taken by the Select Committee, upon which the late Mr. Bradlaugh took such a conspicuous and useful part.

*MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) said, that some who, like himself, had the honour of sitting in the last Parliament, must have listened with surprise to the arguments which had been urged by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham and by Members of the Opposition. It would be well within the recollection of many hon. Members that in the last Parliament Mr. Broadhurst, standing at the Front Opposition Bench, made a passionate appeal to the Leader of the Conservative Party, the late Mr. W. H. Smith, considering the importance of the Bill of the late Government, and the wide interests affected by it, that the Bill should not be sent to a Grand Committee, but should be considered in Committee of the Whole House. The Government at that time refused to listen to the appeal which was made by Mr. Broadhurst, and supported by the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor). This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition had let them into the secret why the Opposition was so anxious that this Bill should not be considered by a Grand Committee, but that it should be referred to a Select Committee. The effect of sending such a Bill to a Select Committee would be to defeat the progress and the passing of the Bill this Session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Perhaps the hon. Member is not aware that my noble Friend said he was prepared to accept as a compromise that the Bill should not go to a Select Committee, but that it should be discussed in Committee of the Whole House.

*MR. FENWICK said, he was pleased to have that assurance, because it marked a wonderful change of opinion since 1888, when the Government absolutely refused to lend an ear to the appeal, although the Debate on the Second Reading had occupied less than five hours, whereas this Bill had been debated 12 hours on the Second Reading. What was the opinion of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham in 1880, when a similar Motion was made by Mr. Knowles, who was then Member for Wigan? The right hon. Gentleman, speaking on the Motion to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, said—

“A Select Committee is the natural resource of a Government that does not want to legislate and of a Parliament that does not want to legislate. This Government and this Parliament is not yet tired of legislating.”

The suggestion to send a Bill like that to a Select Committee was the natural resource of individuals, as well as of Governments, that did not wish to legislate, because the effect of such a course would be to prevent the passage of the Bill through this Parliament. He did not say that to prevent the progress of the measure was the object with which the Motion had been moved; but that, undoubtedly, would be its effect if it was accepted by the Government. [“No!”] He had given the law and testimony as delivered by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Bill was becoming less and less pleasant to the people with whom he came in contact. He did not know the people with whom the right hon. Gentleman came in contact, and who were less and less enamoured of the Bill. Did he know the opinion of the working men of Birmingham?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : Yes, I do.

MR. FENWICK said, he had received a Memorial from the Trades Council of Birmingham in favour of the Bill.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : They do not represent one tithe of the workmen of Birmingham.

MR. FENWICK : I can only say that the Memorial signed—

*MR. SPEAKER : Order, order ! The opinion of the Trades Council of Birmingham has nothing to do with the question whether the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

*MR. FENWICK apologised for being led from the strict line of the Debate by the right hon. Gentleman. He was glad to hear from the Home Secretary that it was the intention of the Government to adhere to their proposal to refer the Bill to a Grand Committee. All the questions raised by the Bill could be considered fully before the Grand Committee, and there would be a reasonable hope that the Bill would be carried through this Session, thereby realising the desire of numbers of working men who were deeply interested in the measure.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, he had served, young Member though he was, on four Grand Committees, and he found that they were not at all suitable for discussing any Bill on which there were great differences of opinion. The Rules and Procedure of Grand Committees were very unsettled. There was no Closure, but there was an arbitrary power in the hands of the Chairman to put an end to a discussion. That would not be a satisfactory way of discussing a Bill of this importance, and he thought it should be left to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. Fenwick

SIR EDWARD HILL (Bristol, S.) hoped the Government would give way, and submit the Bill to a Select Committee, or to the Committee of the whole House, in order that the important questions involved in it might be fully thrashed out. He was not opposed to employers' liability. On the contrary, he thought that employers should be held liable for accidents to the workmen and servants, and all those over whom they had actual moral and legal control; but there were circumstances that required to be fully gone into, and he thought that in the interest of the Bill, and in order to save time, the course suggested in the Amendment should be adopted.

Question proposed, "That the words 'the Standing Committee on' stand part of the Question."

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, that after the observations of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, who had also expressed the opinion held by the Leader of the Opposition that the Bill ought not to go to a Standing Committee at all, he did not intend to move his Amendment that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Trade.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, the only Bills referred to the Standing Committee on Law were Bills dealing with questions of law and procedure. The Bill before the House came strictly under the Rule regulating the referring of Bills to the Standing Committee on Trade. But he did not mean to move any Amendment, and would content himself with entering a protest against the action of the Government.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill committed to the Standing Committee on Law, &c.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS (ESTIMATES).

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.

(1.) £31,745, to complete the sum for Royal Palaces and Marlborough House.

(2.) £76,064, to complete the sum for Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) thanked the Secretary to the Treasury for the very clear and useful Memorandum he had issued dealing with these Votes. With regard to Bushey Park, which came under the Vote before the Committee, he wished to mention that complaints had been made of damage done in the Park by shooting parties. He thought those shooting parties should be stopped, and that the Park, which belonged to the people, should be given to the people, instead of to some members of the Royal Family.

*SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) hoped his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works would take that opportunity of explaining the arrangements he had made for the admission of the public of Kingston and Surbiton to the Home Park at Hampton Court under certain reservations. In the interview which the right hon. Gentleman had been good enough to give to a deputation which he had had the honour of introducing, the right hon. Gentleman gave, in general terms, a very kindly reply to the request of the deputation; and, no doubt, he had been able since then to bring the arrangements for the opening of the Home Park to a satisfactory conclusion. He also desired to urge on the right hon. Gentleman the opening of Kew Gardens at an earlier hour than noon to the general public. The only persons admitted to the Gardens between 10 o'clock and 12 were members of artistic and scientific associations, who received special tickets from the Director. He was as alive to artistic and scientific considerations as any man, and he did not think that scientific research or artistic research in the Gardens would be interfered with by the admission of the public at an earlier hour than at present. The objection that it would entail additional expense might be raised. He would be sorry to make any recommendation which would involve additional cost; but he could not help thinking that if there was any real desire on the part of the authorities to admit the public to the Gardens between 10 and 12, no means would be found to carry it out without any appreciable extra expenditure.

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I have great pleasure in being able to take this opportunity of informing the Committee that I have the permission of the Queen to say that Her Majesty has given her approval to the throwing open of Hampton Court Park to the public. I think that this will be recognised as a great boon, not only by the inhabitants of Kingston and Surbiton and the surrounding neighbourhood, but also by the public of London generally, who visit Hampton Court in large numbers, especially on Sundays. The Park consists of about 500 acres, and has some magnificent avenues planted by Charles II. Hitherto the public has been excluded from the Park, but now, with the exception of two or three meadows by the river side, which are not suitable, the whole will be thrown open to the public. As there are no roads at present, the Park will be open only to pedestrians. An additional expense will be entailed for park-keepers and in making access to the Park; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has willingly assented to this addition to the public cost. It will not be necessary, however, to apply for a Supplementary Estimate during the present Session. I may say that Her Majesty opened the Hampton Court Gardens to the public early in her reign, and she opened Kew Gardens about the same time, so that in now opening the Park at Hampton Court Her Majesty is only carrying out the policy she has pursued all through her reign. As to Kew Gardens, I am afraid that I cannot give an answer which will be thought to be so satisfactory. The earlier opening of these Gardens would be attended with additional expense, and I think that the hon. Baronet ought to be satisfied with the intimation I have just made as to Hampton Court Park, and not expect the Government to incur additional expenditure at Kew. To the question asked by the hon. Member for Peterborough I hope to be able to give a satisfactory reply. The sporting rights in Bushey Park are vested in the Queen, and I have no more right to interfere with them than I would have to interfere with the rights of any private individual with respect to private property. Her Majesty gives the sporting rights to her friends, and of late years the right of shooting has been granted to Baron Pawel Rammingen.

MR. A. C. MORTON: Who is he?

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: He is the husband of the Princess Frederica, a near relation to the Queen. In the course of last winter a member of a shooting party authorised by the Baron unfortunately shot a young man in the park. When the incident came to my notice, and having regard to the use made by the public of the Park I thought it desirable that the preservation of game should be discontinued, I brought the subject to the attention of the Queen. With that consideration for the public which she always shows, Her Majesty took the same view of the matter. Her Majesty has withdrawn the permission to shoot from the Baron, and the preservation of game in the Park for shooting purposes has come to an end.

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD (Warwick, Stratford) hoped the right hon. Gentleman would adhere to his decision not to open Kew Gardens earlier. There was absolutely no necessity for the early opening of the Gardens. The Gardens contained the finest botanical collection in the world. Scientists visited it from all parts for the purposes of study, and it would be impossible for that state of things to continue if the Gardens were opened two hours earlier simply for the benefit of the children and the nursemaids. Besides, it would be a more costly arrangement than at first sight appeared, and if any additional expense was to be incurred on this head it should be borne by the ratepayers of the district, and not by the general rates.

Vote agreed to.

3. £33,095, to complete the sum for Houses of Parliament Buildings.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said, that under this Vote the question of the accommodation of Members within the House had been often discussed; but the subject of the alteration of the House had never been closely considered. In 1867-8 a strong Committee was appointed by the House to investigate this matter, and among other recommendations that Committee received was one from Mr. Edward Barry, who stated that the House could be rebuilt during the Recess for a sum of about £120,000 so as to give accommodation for 569 Members, whereas now they were only able to seat 430 Members. They were told that the House was not always full —for instance, during the discussion of the Estimates and other matters; but whenever an important discussion took place the House was not near large enough to afford accommodation for the Members, many of whom had to stand below the Bar and behind the Speaker's Chair. Again, the acoustic properties of that building were not very good, one reason for that being that beneath the House there was a Chamber six feet in depth, and the voices of speakers descended to that cavernous region. By the alterations suggested by Mr. Barry, this cavernous region would be done away with, and the ventilation would be greatly improved. At the present time the air of the House was not so pure as it might be; but the alterations which Mr. Barry recommended would remedy this. The Report of the Committee went on to show that the present House could be utilised as a new Lobby for the use of Members only, and outside this Lobby a number of rooms could be provided for the officers of the House. This in itself would be a desirable improvement, because, at the present time, the offices were very much scattered and consequently inconvenient. Again, the proposed alterations would give 12 or 14 more seats for the Press, and would give increased accommodation—which was much required—in the Ladies' Gallery, the ventilation of which would also be improved. The inconvenience caused to hon. Members by the inadequacy of the accommodation would be amply illustrated during the discussion which would take place in the ensuing month: and he thought that, instead of the question being relegated to the next Session, it should be at once dealt with. In no proposal which was made to the Committee was it ever suggested that there should be a tribune; but it was always understood that Members should address the House from their places. It was found that a building could be erected with sufficiently good acoustic properties as to enable Members to be heard from their places as easily as now, whilst giving accommodation to between 500 and 600 Members. He urged the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether, in some way or other before the meeting of Parliament next year, some steps could not be taken to do away with the present serious inconvenience to which hon. Members were subject?

MR. FREEMAN-MITFORD called attention to the scarcity of lockers in the House, and stated that accommodation in this respect was very much needed by hon. Members.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke), alluding to the lighting of the Library and the Reading Room, expressed the opinion that the electric lighting required shading. Nothing hurt the eyes more than electric lighting which was not properly shaded. In the Library, although the light was very good, and one could see in any part of the room, there was no shading whatever, so that the light was very hurtful to the eyes. He hoped the First Commissioner of Works would order some shading to be put up, and then the light would be exceedingly good. There was another matter which he wished to mention. He could not understand why, after a Division, Members were allowed to go into the outer Lobby, but were then not allowed to go outside. He failed to see why the outer door should not be opened, because after Members had gone through a Division no harm could possibly be done, whilst it would be a great convenience to hon. Members if they were then allowed to go out.

MR. WILLIAM SIDEBOTTOM (Derbyshire, High Peak) complained of the insufficiency of the accommodation provided in the Newspaper and Tea Rooms. In either room one could not sit in any place without being in a draught, and the rooms were far too small, one being merely a passage. He suggested that some other room of a more commodious character should be obtained for the convenience of Members who desired to read the newspapers.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the wishes of the hon. Member could easily be met if the First Commissioner of Works would agree to place the newspapers in the present Smoking Room, and give the smokers the Tea Room and the present Newspaper Room. This very proposal was agreed to at one time; but, after it was agreed to, the late Mr. Beresford Hope got up a sort of memorial on the subject, and it was stated that the smoke might penetrate into the House itself if the smokers were allowed to use those rooms. Undoubtedly the present Smoking Room was a great deal too small; and while there was generally plenty of room in the Reading Room, it very often happened that there was not even standing accommodation in the Smoking Room. When the present room was granted to the smokers it was recognised that it was too small, and it was arranged that they should also have a Committee Room of the House of Lords. He did not know why the latter room had been taken from them, but they had lost it. It was suggested that there was a little room downstairs which they could use. But the poor smokers did not want to be put in cells downstairs like criminals, nor did they want to go on reading newspapers all day; but they wanted to go on smoking, and they ought to have sufficient accommodation for that purpose.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not listen to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Northampton. He confessed himself to be a heretic—that was, he was a non-smoker—and he wanted to read the newspapers. When reading the newspapers they were sometimes interfered with by the talk of hon. Members from Ireland. If the right hon. Gentleman would provide them with a Talking Room instead of a Smoking Room it would be better.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that one of the best solutions for getting rid of the difficulty of the overcrowding in the House was to increase the attractions of other parts of the House; and if he could increase the attractions of the Smoking Room or of the Reading Room he should be glad to do so. His hon. Friend the Member for Northampton had called attention to the fact that some years ago, when the present Smoking Room was given, another room close by was conceded. He did not know how it was that this room had been taken away; but he would make inquiries, and endeavour to have it restored to hon. Members. As regarded the Reading Room, he could not promise that that should be given up to the smokers. Some years ago a proposition to that effect was made, but so much opposition arose that it was found impossible to carry it out. He did not, therefore, think he could undertake to put his hand to the matter again. With regard to the question of lockers, he could assure the hon. Gentleman opposite that attention would be given to that subject, and also to the question of lights in the Reading Room and Library. With regard to the accommodation generally in the Reading Room, he entirely agreed it was insufficient; but hon. Members would recognise that the accommodation of the House was very limited in all directions. It would be desirable to increase it in many ways, and he had often called attention to the large space under the roof now occupied by private residences. He thought they might look forward to an increase in the accommodation of the House. He hoped the hon. Member for St. Pancras would not expect him to go through the question of the accommodation of the House now, the more especially as the hon. Member for Northampton had threatened to raise the question on the Vote for his (the First Commissioner's) salary. His hon. Friend seemed to think it rested with him whether there should be a Committee or not; but he would point out that any single Member of the House could object to the discussion going on otherwise than before 12 o'clock, and he was sure hon. Members had no intention of allowing him to have that Committee without discussion or objection. The matter, therefore, did not rest wholly with him, but he did not propose to lose sight of the subject. He had already had plans prepared in the Office of Works for increasing the accommodation of the House to some extent, without injuring the large plans of the hon. Member for Northampton, which were the subject of the observations made the previous night. He should, at some future time, submit them to the consideration of the House. He still thought it desirable to wait some little time and see what the result of the next few weeks might be, and they would have an extremely good test of the real wants of the House in the course of the Committee on the Home Rule Bill.

*GENERAL SIR FREDERICK FITZWYGRAM (Hants, Fareham) suggested the advisability of the width of the troughs at the back of the Benches being decreased, so that Members would be able to pass along the seats without causing that inconvenience to other Members which they were obliged to do at present.

*MR. HERBERT (Croydon) called attention to the light in the Clock Tower. A considerable sum of money had recently been spent on this light, without effecting much improvement. He suggested the employment of an electric light in the nature of a search light throwing up a column in the air which could be seen all over London. Such a light might, at any rate, be tried, as a matter of experiment, for a few weeks; and he ventured to say it would be found much more convenient than the present light, which—especially in the case of a fog—could not be seen at a greater distance away than about half-a-mile.

MR. TOMLINSON remarked that the light from the roof of the House was not constant in quality, and this was a matter which might very well receive consideration.

*MR. PERCY ALLSOPP (Taunton) suggested that if the yard outside the Members' Cloak Room were converted into a covered space, it would make an admirable Smoking Room.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll) asked were they to understand that if the hon. Member for Northampton moved for a Committee to consider the question of the accommodation in the House there would be no objection on the part of the Government? He himself was in favour of a moderate enlargement, but he should be sorry to see it enlarged to such an extent that there would be a fixed seat for each Member.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) urged the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it would not be possible to open the outer doors of the Lobby before the Division was over, in order that hon. Members who had recorded their votes might at once return to other parts of the House. It would be easy to prevent hon. Members who had not taken part in the Division from entering the Division Lobbies, and if the course he suggested were adopted it would be a great convenience to hon. Members.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) asked if it was not possible to make further provision for a Conference Room, as the present room was occupied by the private secretaries of Members? He was not complaining of that at all—he recognised there was a necessity for it—but he thought some arrangement ought to be made so that Members might have some place in which to receive small deputations or in which to hold meetings among themselves.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE quite agreed that the present Conference Room was not adequate for its purpose. He had been endeavouring to negotiate the transfer to the House of Commons of the three rooms now allotted to the Railway Commissioners. The consent of the House of Lords, to whom the rooms technically belonged, and of the Railway Commissioners would be necessary before the transference could take place. But if these rooms could be obtained, a very fine Conference Room could be provided. They were just opposite the present Conference Room and would be quite as convenient. With regard to the question of the noble Marquess, he would consult the authorities to see if there was any real reason for preventing Members going out of the Lobby. He quite agreed it would be a great convenience if Members could be allowed to leave the House as soon as they had voted, and he would consult the authorities of the House as to what was the real reason for keeping the outer doors shut. He would also communicate with hon. Members on the other questions which had been raised. As to the question of the hon. Member for Argyll, he thought that hon. Member would recollect that he (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) merely stated, in answer to the hon. Member for Northampton as to whether there should be a Committee on the accommodation of the House, that the question did not rest only with him, but with private Members.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, that with regard to the detention of hon. Members taking part in Divisions, until a comparatively recent period the Lobby door was not opened until after a Division was completed, and therefore it was a comparatively recent concession that the Hall immediately convenient to the House had been made available for the accommodation during Divisions. If some facilities could be afforded for hon. Members being relieved from the detention complained of it would be very desirable, though, no doubt, the possibility of a recount being called for had to be borne in mind. As to the question of accommodation in the House, he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had given up the non possumus position he had taken up last Session, when the subject was last under discussion, and was now willing to admit that something ought to be done to increase the accommodation in that House and in the various rooms provided for the convenience of hon. Members. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he intended to be guided in the matter by the experience which he would obtain during the next few weeks whilst the Home Rule Bill was being discussed in Committee. But he was afraid that when that Committee came to an end the right hon. Gentleman would say that that was the first time within his Parliamentary experience that there had been so large an attendance for so great a time consecutively; that the circumstances were wholly abnormal, and that they were never likely to have again such a continuous and close an attendance of Members. That, he suspected, was what the right hon. Gentleman would tell them after the experience of the next few weeks. He wished to press upon the right hon. Gentleman, both as regarded the accommodation in the House and in the Writing Rooms, Smoking Rooms, and so on, that he must bring his mind to this fact—that the average attendance in the discharge of Parliamentary duties had increased very much during the last quarter of a century, and the present scanty accommodation for hon. Members was wholly inadequate. He could understand the right hon. Gentleman desiring to consult experts as regarded the extent to which the accommodation should be increased, but that they should be content much longer to remain with the miserable accommodation now provided was entirely out of the question. The hon. Member who had raised this question had drawn their attention to the fact that because of the insufficiency of the accommodation a Member was unable efficiently to discharge his Parliamentary duties, and certainly such a condition of things ought not to be allowed to continue. The hon. Member for Northampton had brought forward the claims of the smokers. He (Mr. Lowther), like the hon. Member for

South Belfast, was a non-smoker; nevertheless, he thought the claims of smokers should be clearly and distinctly recognised in the matter of accommodation. The hon. Member had suggested, in the shape of a Bill, means whereby additional accommodation in all its branches, through the withdrawal from their present uses of the whole of the chambers on the other side of the Central Hall, could be provided. He did not, of course, endorse the proposals by which the hon. Member attained the end sought for; but he thought some portion of the accommodation now appropriated, not to the House of Lords as a deliberative Assembly, but to officers of that House, and even to Railway Commissioners—a body which had no claim whatsoever for accommodation in the Palace at Westminster—that these opened out avenues through which additional accommodation could be provided for those who had legitimate claims to that accommodation. Of course, the officers of the House of Commons, who were in constant daily attendance, ought to have provision made within its walls for their personal accommodation; but there were many persons housed within the limits of the Palace at Westminster who would very much prefer that the public should provide that accommodation in a more suitable locality, and the places now set apart for that purpose could be more judiciously appropriated. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not allow his good resolves in this respect to be set aside, but would carry out reform in this direction. He did not intend now to enter into the question of the enlargement of the present Chamber, upon which he had recently expressed very decided opinions as to its utter inadequacy, but he thought the accommodation of Members in the Writing Room, Smoking Room, and so forth, could not brook much longer delay. He agreed with what had been said as to making further provision for a Conference Room, and urged that something should at once be done in this matter.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in his observations with regard to the accommodation of the House, and especially as to the direction in which it should be sought. The officers of that House required every accommodation, having regard to the great length of time they were often compelled to be on duty. There were officers of the other House, however—for such, instance, as the Black Rod—whose duties were not very arduous, and in regard to whom it was not necessary to have houses under that building. He believed it was contemplated by the House of Lords making considerable changes in that officer's department, and in that case it would not be necessary to have so magnificent a house provided for him. Again, the Librarian of the House of Lords was a gentleman who received a salary of £800 a year. That seemed altogether inadequate to enable him to live in the house provided for him in the House of Lords. The gentleman himself did not live in the house provided for him, but he only occupied one room in it, living elsewhere. If that house was thrown into the accommodation of the building generally, it would enable them to make fresh arrangements to increase the accommodation. Without saying anything discourteous to the House of Lords, he thought facilities might be given by that House for increasing the accommodation of the House of Commons, and he would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman opposite that his political friends might have much greater influence than he himself could hope to have in that quarter, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would endeavour to use it in that direction.

*SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) said, the answer the right hon. Gentleman had given with regard to the accommodation of the House had not satisfied hon. Members who felt strongly that the accommodation was insufficient. Whilst there were 670 Members, there was only space on the floor of the House for 306, or far less than one-half. It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman, who had a seat provided for him on all occasions, to be satisfied with the accommodation afforded; but it was not reasonable that hon. Members who had been returned to the House should, first of all, on occasions have to scramble at the door to get in, and then have regularly to rush to obtain a seat. Hon. Members obtained little sympathy from either Front Bench, because the occupants of the Front Benches were looked after carefully in the arrangements of the House. Ordinary Members found it a great inconvenience to be obliged to sacrifice much time in order to obtain a seat. He knew some hon. Members who came there and sacrificed six or seven hours in order to obtain a seat on the occasion of the Home Rule Debate. He contended that a Member of that House, who was returned to discharge his Parliamentary duties, ought to be able to obtain a seat in it whenever there was important business just as easily as in his own house. He knew of no other Parliament in any country where every Member was not provided with a seat. The Resolution which was passed in 1868, set forth that the accommodation was insufficient; and if it was insufficient in 1868, when the number of Members was smaller than now, it was certainly insufficient in 1893. It was time some better arrangement was made by which more than 306 Members could obtain seats on the floor of the House so as to be able to take part in the proceedings. In order to show the absurdity of the arrangements for the accommodation of hon. Members, Mr. Mitchell Henry, on one occasion, addressed the Speaker from the Gallery, and he was ordered to come down on to the floor of the House. It was absurd there should not be more accommodation, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to deal with the matter with more seriousness than he appeared to have brought to bear upon it.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON (Manchester, N.E.) said, he could assure hon. Members that those who sat on the Front Benches were not destitute of human sympathy, and, moreover, he could assure the House that the Front Bench was often a very congested district. They might hereafter decide about enlarging the House, but the question which they had now to deal with was how hon. Gentlemen were to be decently accommodated at the present time. They were likely to have some interesting Sitings shortly when the scenes which had been described with so much pathos might be repeated. Certainly, it was not decent that a gentleman of mature age and serious appearance should be obliged to take part in an unseemly rush in order to secure a place in which he could conveniently hear the Debate, and possibly address the House. It was not even decent that hon. Members should have to come down hours before the House sat in order to take their seats. He would beg leave to suggest that upon days when there was likely to be a crowd hon. Members should come down to the House a little while before Prayers and place cards in a box with their respective names, which should then be drawn out, one by one, and each Member should enter the House and take his seat as soon as his name was drawn. This would, at all events, be more seemly than the present system, and, certainly, something should be done to relieve Members from the necessity of taking part in an unseemly struggle.

Vote agreed to.

4. £41,200, to complete the sum for Admiralty, Extension of Buildings.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER (Walsall) rose to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he correctly apprehended his observations on the Vote on Account—that the extension of the Admiralty buildings would occupy a period of seven years? He made this inquiry of his right hon. Friend, mainly because a really great Metropolitan improvement—namely, the opening of St. James's Park to Trafalgar Square, would thus be delayed for so long a period, because the Admiralty clerks occupied a house required for the making of the new road, which could not be vacated until the new Admiralty buildings were fit for occupation. Neither could he understand how the expenditure of £180,000 which was estimated for to complete the Admiralty buildings could take so long a time, if £50,000 was to be spent in this year. At the same average of expenditure, the time for the completion of the buildings would be nearer three and a-half than seven years. He hoped his right hon. Friend would do all in his power to hasten the completion of the buildings, and so facilitate a great Metropolitan improvement.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) would like to know whether the sum proposed to be expended on the Admiralty buildings was regulated by the exigencies of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or by the amount of work that the contractors could undertake in the course of the present year? Already they had this building land acquired some five, six, or seven years, and the public had been charged at the rate of £16,000 a year, which was practically dead money—money absolutely lost so far as it extended to the reasonable and necessary time for completing the building. Of course, he did not say this was in any sense a Party question. He thought in times past too little money had been taken for it, and there could be no greater waste of public money than taking only a small amount for a great building in the course of a year. He thought a sufficient sum ought to be taken for these large buildings, as much as the contractor could possibly spend, and in that way only could they get the buildings finished within a reasonable period. By this delay they were losing not only £16,000 a year on the cost of the land, but they were paying a large sum for the rent of other buildings such as the hon. Member had just alluded to, and which were occupied by clerks of the Admiralty. But the Admiralty, further than that, was placed at great inconvenience and the utmost difficulty in doing its work by reason of the various Departments being scattered over various houses. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman was furnishing the contractor with so large a sum of money in the coming year as he possibly could spend in pushing on these buildings. It would be far better to get one set of buildings completed than to fritter away comparatively small sums on different buildings and spread over a number of years.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE quite agreed with the remarks of the last speaker as to the delay in the progress of works like this through not voting sufficient money, and he had not fallen into that mistake. On the contrary, he was quite prepared to spend any amount of money within the present year to hasten the completion of the works. But there was something worse than not voting sufficient money to be spent within the year, and that was delaying the work altogether, and not undertaking it; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forwood) would recollect that it was his own Government which delayed the commencement of the work on account of unwillingness to insert the necessary item in the Estimates. These works were recommended by the Committee of 1887, and that Committee in its Report stated as a reason for throwing over the wider scheme which had been propounded to the House previously, and recommending that an extension only of the Admiralty buildings should be carried out, that they thought that extension could be completed in two, or at the most three, years. But since 1887 six years had already elapsed. Some delay took place in consequence of the plans not having been completed by the architect. The arrangements between the Admiralty and the architect were not completed for a year, and a delay of 12 months subsequently occurred in consequence of the Treasury refusing to vote money. Some further delay was caused by difficulty as to the foundations, nearly seven years more would be required for this work, making in all 12 years from 1887 instead of two or, at the most, three. What was the reason for seven more years being required for the completion of the work? The reason was this: The building was being erected in two blocks instead of one. That course was rendered necessary by the fact that some houses occupied by the Admiralty were on the site of one portion of these buildings. It was found that difficulty and expense arose in removing the clerks from that building and finding temporary buildings for them pending the erection of the permanent structure; and, in consequence of that, objection was raised by the Treasury of the Government with which the right hon. Gentleman was connected, and it was determined to erect the buildings in two blocks instead of one. So far as he had been able to ascertain, it would take two years more for the completion of the first block. It would then be necessary to spend some little time in removing the clerks in the Admiralty from the buildings in which they were now placed into that new block, and then some further time in pulling down those buildings. The foundations of the new block would then be commenced, and assuming that the same time would be occupied on them and on the new block of buildings as on the first block, a total length of six or seven years would elapse before the completion of the work, or 12 years from 1887. During the whole of that period they were losing at the rate of £16,000 in the interest of money for the value of the land; losing the rents of the various houses hired for the accommodation of the clerks of the Admiralty, and also losing the interest on the value of the lease on the other side of Whitehall, which the late Government determined should be ultimately used for the War Office, and which they would not commence until the Admiralty was completed. The value of that site was no less than £400,000, and therefore they were losing the interest of that £400,000, which might be released by devoting it to building purposes—and they were losing the interest on that site for the 12 years from the commencement of this building until they commence the War Office part of it.

MR. PLUNKET (Dublin University) said, the right hon. Gentleman had made a rather gloomy forecast as to the time required to complete the Admiralty buildings according to the plans which were being carried out; and he had also criticised severely the action of the late Government in rejecting the plans he himself (Mr. Lefevre) had proposed. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that that rejection was not the action of the late Government, but was a result in pursuance of the finding of a Committee which, by a large majority, rejected his plan and recommended the plan which was being carried out. Therefore, his criticism and condemnation of what was being done must fall upon his own colleagues.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he had not made any such remarks as the right hon. Gentleman attributed to him.

MR. PLUNKET said, he might have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman. He would explain that the delay that had occurred was not due to the refusal of the late Government to provide money, but it was the consequence of unfortunate circumstances which could not be foreseen—such as the difficulty of obtaining foundations, owing to the nature of the subsoil. On his own part, he had nothing to regret, and he did not believe that the completion of the buildings, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee of 1887, would involve the delay which the right hon. Gentleman indicated.

*SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff) said, the business of the Admiralty was being conducted under serious disadvantages, and no one would conduct his private business under such conditions as the staff had long been exposed to for lack of accommodation. It was not surprising that the First Commissioner had thought it right to make a full statement on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman opposite threw the blame for delay upon the Committee; but, if the plans of the present First Commissioner had been carried out, they would have had public buildings suitable for the purpose years before they could get them under existing conditions. He thought something ought now to be done to expedite the building operations. The mistake seemed to have been that the present First Commissioner had accepted as final and decisive the situation in which he found himself when he came into Office; but Parliament ought not to be content to wait seven years for the completion of the buildings. That was the adoption in the case of buildings of the policy that once characterised their shipbuilding, when public money was wasted wholesale by locking it up in ships that were on the stocks for seven or 10 years. The late Mr. W. H. Smith once asked him in the Lobby what he could have done better while he was First Lord of the Admiralty. In reply he asked Mr. Smith, "If you had been a private shipbuilder, and your manager had persuaded you to build ships under the pretext that they were wanted, would you allow them to be years in building, with your capital in them lying idle all the time?" Mr. Smith replied—"I quite admit that the whole system is as bad as it can be, and, if I were First Lord of the Admiralty again, I would be a very different First Lord from what I was." He trusted something would be done to relieve them from a state of things like that with regard to the Admiralty buildings.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) said, he thought he ought to say a word upon the subject. If there were any fault in the matter, he was one of those who were guilty in common with Mr. W. H. Smith, to whom his hon. Friend had just paid such high testimony. He took an active part in the Committee spoken of, in concert with Mr. Smith. They thought a good deal of public money was about to be wasted upon the designs put forward, and they therefore thought that a Committee ought to be appointed to consider plans that were to cost £700,000. The Committee were unanimous in their opinion that the elevation was unsuitable. There were towers that would have been a terrible eyesore, and the general style of architecture was what he might call a provincial municipal style. They came to the conclusion that a far better style of architecture for the purpose was the style of the existing Admiralty buildings or Marlborough House. A plan in accordance with the views of the Committee was prepared and brought down to the House, and if anything was said about three years it was on the authority of the architect and the surveyor of the Board of Works. No great public buildings were ever built in the time originally estimated, and, as to these buildings themselves, they had a feeling of despair. Every public building seemed to be, if possible, worse than its predecessor, and more inconvenient for the purposes for which it was intended. He really thought that the Foreign Office and the Home Office could not be beaten in the matter of inconvenience; but they were superseded by the Royal Courts of Justice. It was, in his opinion, a pessimist view to take—and which had been enunciated—that these new buildings would not be completed under seven years. He was sorry that the architect and surveyor of the Board of Works were mistaken in thinking that the buildings would be completed in three years. It had taken five years and they were not built yet, but he did not think it would take seven years more. All they could do was to finish the job as soon as they could, and he did not think that there was anyone to blame unless it should be the Committee. The matter was now in a sound position, and he hoped there would be as little delay as possible in carrying out the work.

*MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.) said, he was also a Member of the Committee, and perhaps he ought to take rather more blame than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as at the time he was also Secretary to the Treasury, and therefore more or less responsible if there was any supposition of any delay in providing the necessary money. The Committee were practically unanimous on the plan, but in carrying out the plan there were two or three questions which involved delay. In the first place, it was uncertain what sort of a foundation there was. The bed of an old stream ran through the site, and there was also the belief that there was some shifting of the sand there.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Admiralty itself is built on piles.

*MR. JACKSON said, that was so; as the right hon. Gentleman said, the Admiralty itself was built on piles. The question came before him at the Treasury, and his experience was that it was a little doubtful whether this site would be a satisfactory one. The question was held over for a long time; and then there was delay in advertising for contractors. They had a strike which lasted for a long time, and that was a most unsatisfactory time to advertise. The delay altogether extended over several months. But once the building was commenced there was no reason for delay. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had stated the amount of money expended on the building operations last year and this year. He thought it stood at about £40,000 last year when he (Mr. Jackson) was in Office; but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman could inform them, approximately at all events, the respective amounts, which would give them a fair idea of the progress that was being made, as to his mind it seemed that there had been no unnecessary delay from the start. The officials of the Admiralty suffered great inconvenience from the fact that they were scattered all over different offices. There could be no doubt about the serious inconvenience; and he was of opinion that until the present buildings were completed, they could make no effective change. If the right hon. Gentleman in giving them the figures he had asked for, told them that he was in a position to make more rapid progress than had been made up to the present, he, for one, would be glad to hear that intelligence. There was really no reason why they should not go forward with more rapidity.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he had done nothing to prevent the work being completed in the most rapid manner. He was most anxious to see it completed, although he did not approve of the scheme originally, but had accepted it as he found it, and it was his desire there should be no avoidable delay in carrying it into effect. If there was any blame, it was not unwillingness with regard to money. One year was lost by the late Government—

MR. PLUNKETT: What year was that?

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he thought it was 1888-9; but it was an undoubted fact that one year was lost by the Treasury declining to vote the money. He did not wish to go into details regarding the past. He could only say that the accepted plans would be carried out as rapidly as possible; but he still held to the opinion that the works could not be completed under six or seven years. Last year £40,000 had been spent, and this year the amount would be £50,000.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) said, they should look at the figures in this matter of the Admiralty buildings. The original Estimate was £195,000, now it was calculated to cost £304,500. This was an extraordinary inequality, and they were told that it would take seven years longer, or, in all, 12 years. It was certainly a most startling statement—one of the most startling ever made in the House. Why, the buildings should be completed in not less than two years. A great deal might have been done before the contract was entered into at all. For instance, the foundations should have been prepared. That would have been the right method, and, if that had been done, the rate of progress would have been more satisfactory. But the fact was, the right hon. Gentleman did not like the plan, and he was rather delaying it than assisting it. The late Mr. W. H. Smith was satisfied that, until the foundations were completed, he would not vote any money to go on with the building. That was a very common sense view to take. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would insist on rapid progress being made.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) said, that he had been a Member of the Committee, and had taken an active part in the discussions, and the late Secretary to the Treasury was right when he said that the Committee was nearly unanimous. It had not, however, been so nearly unanimous as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated. Some of them were strongly averse to patching up the old Admiralty buildings, and he would remind the Committee that he had pointed out at the time precisely the difficulties that would happen, and the delays that would occur, and that the Estimates that would be put before the House would be inadequate for the purpose. It seemed to him that on these matters the last man whose opinion was taken was the man who had a practical knowledge of the subject. Such a man knew too well the danger and difficulty of tampering with an old building. He did not agree with those who suggested that the building, the plans of which were placed before the Committee would have been inadequate, and would not have been a great improvement in the arrangement which was subsequently made. He held then, and he held now, that the building put before the Committee could have been constructed easily, and could have been constructed at less cost than the building they were renovating, and it could have been built not in 12 years, but in four or five. He found in his experience that it was much more easy to construct a new building than to make a new one out of an old one, and it was easier, too, to estimate when it would be completed. They could gauge pretty accurately the time it would take to construct a new building, but they would never tell when an old building that had to be patched up and renovated would be completed. If the plans and estimates put before the Committee had been adopted, they would have had a magnificent pile of buildings worthy of the Admiralty with an entrance in the Park, and by this time, he ventured to say, they would have been near completion, provided the money had been forthcoming. There was no reason why the operations which had been entered upon should not proceed rapidly, if the foundations were good.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, the Estimate had been increased more than 50 per cent., and he wished to know to what circumstances that was due? It was all very well for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to talk about economy. They were told when the holidays were commenced that they would cost one sum, and it was now clear that they were to cost another sum. The money of the country was being frittered away; therefore, it was clear there could be no economising. Was there any reason why the original estimate of £95,000 had been increased to £300,000?

SIR M. RIDLEY (Lancashire, N., Blackpool) wished to know why the original plans had been departed from by which a brick building faced with stone—in the style of the old Admiralty Offices—was to be constructed? The new building was of stone with brick in the interstices.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, he did not think there had been any deviation from the plans placed before the House of Commons in the Library. The Committee of 1887 had selected a somewhat plainer building and one more in accordance with the style of the old Admiralty building, but the building ultimately designed, the plans of which had been on view in the Library, was that which had now been commenced. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton) asked why the expenditure had been so much higher than the Estimate. That was due, first, to the fact that the foundations had cost £30,000 or £40,000 more than had been estimated; secondly, to the cost of building having increased in the interval, thirdly, to the building covering a greater extent of ground than was anticipated, and projecting about 35ft. further into the park; and, fourthly, to the increase in the accommodation it was proposed to provide. It was originally intended that the building should be devoted to the accommodation of clerks only; but the original design in that respect had been departed from, and it was now intended that the principal officers should be removed from the Admiralty to the new block. The provision of accommodation for the superior officials rendered it necessary to have a number of smaller rooms than were required for the clerks, with more expensive fittings. The hon. Member for St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid) seemed to think that the foundations might be made for the new block, but that was impossible. If it had been possible it would have been done; but it was not possible, because the clerks were located in the block of buildings at present occupying the ground. In the first place, they must complete the new block; they must then remove the clerks; and, finally, they must begin the foundations of the second block. He had gone carefully into the subject, and should be glad to expedite the work; but, so far as he could see, it would not be completed in a less time than he had stated.

MR. FORWOOD said, the second block could be commenced if temporary accommodation were found for the clerks. In this way, instead of having to wait seven years, the work could be done in four or five, and economy would be effected, inasmuch as it would prevent a large amount of capital lying dormant.

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that would have been an extremely good arrangement if carried out originally when the building was commenced. If the building had been erected in one block instead of two, the arrangement would have been beneficial and economical. That, in his opinion, ought to have been done five years ago; but they had been proceeding five years on an opposite plan, and inasmuch as the first block would be completed in 18 months or two years, he did not think it would now be economical to turn the clerks out into temporary quarters.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID asked how many clerks were at present accommodated in the old building?

*MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that about 250 clerks occupied quarters in Spring Gardens. It would be difficult to find adequate accommodation for so many within reach of the Admiralty.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £48,719, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1894, for expenditure in respect of miscellaneous legal buildings, namely, County Courts, Metropolitan Police Courts, and Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, there were always a number of foolish electors in the country who estimated the service of their Representatives by the number of Divisions they took part in. If their Members sat through a whole Sitting without taking a Division they considered them deficient in zeal, and for that reason, and to relieve his conscience, he proposed to move an Amendment, and take a vote. He had in several Parliaments moved to reduce this Vote, and he had always been defeated, but probably he might be more successful now. Hon. Gentlemen might be aware that outside the Metropolis the Police Courts were maintained by the localities.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I rise to Order. I desire to have some information on a subject which stands before the Police Courts.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Northampton is in possession of the Committee.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I think the hon. Member will be able to ask for the information he seeks later on.

MR. A. C. MORTON: Shall I be able to do so?

THE CHAIRMAN: It will be impossible to go back to a previous item. If the hon. Member desires to move an Amendment to an earlier item it is open for him to do so now.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The hon. Member has no Amendment.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I do not desire to move an Amendment. I simply wish to ask a question.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: If the hon. Member for Peterborough wishes to raise any question earlier in the Estimate he should do so by moving a reduction before the item for Police Courts is discussed.

THE CHAIRMAN: As I have said, if the hon. Member for Peterborough wishes to discuss or move the reduction of any earlier item, he must do so before the item objected to by the hon. Member for Northampton is discussed.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, that he might have to move an Amendment, but he wished, first, to know whether he was on the right tack? He wanted to know why there was an increase of £7,645 expenditure on County Court buildings over the Vote of last year?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE said, that the Vote was increased by the sum of £9,250 for the erection of new County Courts.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, it appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman did not know very much about the matter. There was great extravagance in the management of the County Courts. On this item and other small items there was extravagance and loss of money. Where the Municipal Authorities had the management of these Courts, as they had in the City of London, instead of having a loss, they made a considerable profit every year. He would not prevent the hon. Member for Northampton from going on with his Motion; but unless the Government found out a more economical method of keeping up the Courts, he should move a reduction.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that the Police Courts all over the country were maintained by the particular localities, but in London the cost was all thrown on the Imperial Treasury. He had always contended that that was a very great injustice, and the answer he received when raising objection was that London did not control its own police. He was in favour of giving London that control, and he never yet could understand how the fact that London had no such control was an answer to the complaint raised by hon. Members who represented provincial localities that while they paid for their own Police Courts Londoners did not. It was said that a certain amount ought to be paid out of the Imperial Exchequer for the Bow Street Police Court, because in that Court extradition cases were decided. Well, if they were only called on to pay a certain sum for that Court, there would be some reason in it; but, as a matter of fact, they had to pay for Woolwich, Greenwich, Gravesend, and other places, and had to find fuel, light, water, &c. He would move to reduce the Vote by the sum of £6,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £42,719, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he was always very glad when he could support the hon. Member for Northampton. For the past five or six years he had always supported the hon. Member's contention that London should support its own Police Courts, and could not see on what ground they were included in the general expenditure of the country; and if the hon. Member went to a Division, he would vote with him. The Vote had been reduced from £12,000 to £7,000, chiefly on account of reduction in the building item. Still, it was a substantial grievance, and they should go a step farther and make the whole cost fall on the localities.

SIR W. HARCOURT: In a Bill which I brought forward I did take these charges off the Imperial Exchequer and put them upon the Municipal Exchequer of London, and I admit that there is a good deal of anomaly in the way in which these charges are treated in London as compared with other towns. I hope the House will not disallow the Vote this year, as in that case there will be nobody to take charge of the buildings. All I can say is, that I will use all the pressure I can to induce the County Council to undertake the charge of these buildings. Before we take the extreme step of refusing to vote this money, we should make some arrangement with the County Council, or some Body else, to undertake the burden.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that no doubt there was great difficulty in the way of putting pressure on the Government in Committee of Supply; for though they struck out an item in Committee, the Government would put it back on Report. In view of the declaration which had just been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the effect that he would look into the matter, and of the attitude which had been taken up by a London Member, he would not press the matter to a Division.

MR. BARTLEY was not at all satisfied with the hon. Gentleman's concurrence with the Front Bench. They had heard this promise before. [Mr. Labouchere: Never.] Yes; and he thought the hon. Member did not display the courage of his convictions which he usually did. He thought they ought to divide on the Amendment. Certainly, for his own part, he should challenge a Division when the Question was put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) wished to say that the question which had just been raised was a large one, and people in London considered that in the allocation of the local grants they had received less than their fair share.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE

BILL.—(No. 118.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I undertook that, on the Third Reading, I would re-commit this Bill with reference to Clause 5 in order to meet some objections which have been taken to it. On consulting the authorities, I find that there is some objection to inserting a new clause now, and I shall, therefore, confine myself at present to omitting Clause 5. I move that the Bill be re-committed with reference to Clause 5.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be re-committed in respect of Clause 5."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 5 be omitted."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. BRODIE HOARE (Hampstead) thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the courteous way in which he had met his objection respecting Clause 5, and expressed his regret that the Forms of the House would not permit the right hon. Gentleman to move the new clause now.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. BARTLEY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider during the coming year whether he could not do away with Schedule B altogether, and throw the whole of the Schedule into Schedule D? This would tend very largely to simplify the Income Tax, and would be a step in the direction of the re-arrangement which everyone desired.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think that is a suggestion which is well worthy of consideration.

COLONEL BRIDGEMAN (Bolton) said, it was rather disturbing to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer say that there had been no equalisation of the Death Duties, because hon. Members had understood from the late Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1888 that an equalisation had been carried out by him under the Budget of that year.

MR. JEFFREYS said, that, speaking as an agriculturist, he should very much object to the abolition of Schedule B, because, although it might be all very well in these bad times that agriculturists should make their returns under Schedule D, he thought that in the good times, which he hoped would come back again eventually, it was very advantageous to the farmer to make his return under Schedule B.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) asked whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer would look into a question respecting the assessment of the Land Tax? Some communications had passed between the late Chancellor of the Exchequer and himself with reference to certain parishes on the east coast of England that had had their area reduced by nearly one-half owing to the washing away of parts of them by the sea. The Land Tax was still charged on the old area. The Dissolution came before the late Chancellor of the Exchequer could settle the matter, and he trusted that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to set it right. As usual, it was said that there was a technical difficulty in the way of altering the assessment. Of course, that was all stuff, and there was nothing of the kind.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I will promise the hon. and gallant Member, now that I have got rid of the Budget, to look into the correspondence.

*SIR R. TEMPLE said, he desired to express, on behalf of a large class of his constituents, their great regret and disappointment that the deficit had been made good by a summary increase of the Income Tax, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thus trenched in time of peace upon that which should be looked upon as a reserve for time of war. During the period of office of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer two reductions of the Income Tax had taken place, and the payers of the tax naturally made a very unfavourable comparison in that respect between the present Budget and those of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, that three years ago evidence was given before the Town Holdings Committee respecting the fact that the Income Tax was not collected on premiums upon houses. The evidence showed that such premiums were simply rent paid down instead of deferred, and that such premiums ought to be subject to Income Tax just as much as annual rent was. The system of demanding premiums for the letting of houses was said to prevail extensively in London, and it was, therefore, very clear that a large number of metropolitan landlords were not subject to Income Tax which they ought really to pay. That seemed to him to be a matter worthy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's attention.

Question put, and agreed to.

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.—(No. 1.) COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HOLLAND (Salford, N.) moved that the Order for going into Committee be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Trade.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for Committee be discharged, and that the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Trade."—(Mr. Holland.)

MR. S. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid) expressed a hope that the hon. Member would not press his Motion. There were a great many reasons against having the Bill referred to the Standing Committee. It had been understood for a long time that Standing Committees were only intended for dealing with Government Bills. Certain exceptions had been made to this rule, but only with reference to Bills about which the House was practically unanimous and which had the concurrence of the Government. The present measure was one which ought to be dealt with by a Committee of the full House. It was pretty certain that if the Bill were referred to the Standing Committee on Trade only those who were interested in the exemption of machinery from rating would attend that Committee.

It being ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Friday, 2nd June.

APPOINTMENT OF COUNTY MAGISTRATES.

RESOLUTION.

*SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) rose to call attention to the appointment of Justices of the Peace, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the appointment of County Magistrates should no longer be made by the Lords Chancellor of Great Britain and Ireland for the time being only on the recommendation of the Lords Lieutenant."

He stated that he should make his remarks as brief as he could, as his hon. Friends were anxious to obtain the decision of the House. The present custom of the appointment of Magistrates was that the Lords Lieutenant nominated, but there was a custom within the custom by which the Lords Lieutenant generally consulted the local Bench. That custom did not rest on law. The Chancellor could change it, and could himself appoint without the nomination of the Lords Lieutenant. The effect of the custom was to confine the Bench in many counties to a select group of friends. A Derbyshire antiquary, a friend of his, had informed him that successive Dukes of Devonshire, acting as Lords Lieutenant of Devonshire, had wished to appoint millers, maltsters, persons of other classes than those now almost exclusively represented, and had been met by the County Bench with the statement that, while the candidates were admirably qualified in every other respect, their social position was such that it was unwise to bring them on to the Bench; and successive Dukes of Devonshire, from the middle of the last century to early in the present century, were shown by their letters to have yielded to such representations. He feared that 'this concession to the local feeling of a select class still continued. The present Chancellor was a moderate man; and in receiving a deputation upon this subject, he had lately stated that the "constitution of the Bench" in many counties was "extremely unsatisfactory" and "prejudicial to the public interest." Lords Lieutenant, he had pointed out, were, he feared, often "too much in the hands of the local Bench;" and the present system in many counties was virtually one of co-optation subject to "political proclivities." The Chancellor asked for a Resolution of the representative House, in order that his hands might be strengthened in advising Lords Lieutenant to open the doors wider. The Chancellor could, of course, not only appoint from the present time without any change of law, but he could clear the existing Bench. He could advise the issue of new commissions and the discharge of all not included in them. But he would not take that course. He had, in fact, not been even asked to take it. The Chancellor was not only himself a moderate man, but he was right in his moderation under the circumstances of the case. How stood the facts? A great distinction must be drawn between the County of London and other counties of England and Wales and Scotland. He could not speak of Ireland, because the Magistrates in Ireland possessed far fewer powers. London differed greatly from the rest of the country. In parts of London more Magistrates were wanted, but no one cared whether they were Liberal or Conservative. He had been repeatedly concerned in pressing for the appointment of more Magistrates in the parish of Chelsea and in the parish of Fulham, because there were too few, who worked, to get through the work at present; and those for whom he had been most strongly pressing were persons—such as some of those who had, when he was Chairman of his Board of Guardians, greatly assisted him in the work—who happened to be Conservatives. In the parish of Fulham much difficulty had been found in discharging the work of Magistrates connected with lunacy, through the want of local Magistrates; and the Duke of Westminster had now placed upon the Bench the County Councillors and others, entirely irrespectively of politics, for the purpose of getting through the work. Elsewhere there were enough Magistrates, providing that they were the right men; but, virtually, in large parts of the country, they were only landowners, and of the landowners only those of one Party and one Church. In some counties the Lords Lieutenant admirably discharged their duties; for example, Lord Bath in Wiltshire, to name a member of the Party to which he was himself opposed; but in others the Bench was packed in such a way as to destroy public confidence. In his own division, and the counties which adjoined it—the rest of the County of Gloucester, the Counties of Worcester and Hereford and Monmouth—the Liberal Party had a considerable majority of electors, but the Bench was 22 to 1 against them. It might be thought that, to use the language of their opponents, what they called the best of the Liberal Party having lately joined the Conservatives, it was through this loss of Liberal Unionists that such results had been brought about. That was not so. The number of Liberal Unionist Magistrates in those counties was very small; and, although some were called Liberal Unionists who had been pretty steady supporters of the Conservative Party long before Home Rule was heard of, yet, giving to the other side every doubtful, the Conservatives were 10 to 1 against the Liberals and Liberal Unionists combined. In the county which he had the honour to represent there were only nine Magistrates who voted Liberal last time, or were likely to on the next occasion, against 267 Magistrates on the other side. Yet the Liberal Party had a considerable majority of the electorate even at the Election of 1892, a majority which would be increased if they counted the recent figures at a bye-election. It might be said that the Liberals had no men who could be placed upon the list. No doubt there were more Conservatives who came up to the standard of the qualification than there were Liberals; but fitting Liberals were not wanting, and he was himself engaged in adding to the Land Tax list the names of Commissioners who possessed the qualification in land in the county who would make admirable members of the County Bench. One, for example, was a Baptist minister, held in the highest respect throughout the country, who was not on the Bench, although admirably qualified, simply because it was not the custom to place Nonconformist ministers upon it. Another was a large landowner, a man of business, who had bought one of the finest places in the county, and who, if he had happened to be an opponent of the present Government, would have been placed upon the Bench the day he bought it. Others were managers of great works who had bought land in the district. Another was a Radical farmer of great authority in the agricultural classes, and one of the most progressive farmers in the county ; and, in addition, there were considerable numbers of traders in the towns, such as timber merchants, auctioneers, and others, who would be well fitted for the post, and whose appointment would command local confidence. In the next county to that which he represented there was a County Alderman who had been twice elected to that honourable post by a unanimous vote, but who, although an old resident in the county, had not been placed upon the Bench, for no apparent reason except that he was a Liberal and a Nonconformist. He would mention any of the names privately to any Member of the House on either side, but he did not like to cause annoyance to anyone by giving names in his speech. He did not wish to say a word against the existing Magistrates. No one who had long sat, as he had sat, on Local Bodies, both as an ex officio member and as an elective member along with ex officio members, would depreciate the services of the existing Magistrates to the community. If they had no other title to the respect of their fellow-subjects except the work they did in lunacy—the most dangerous, and, with the exception of the work in imbecility cases done by the Chairmen of Boards of Guardians, the most unpleasant of all local government work—these services were a sufficient title to commendation. He mentioned lunacy, because it was not only trying work, but it was the only work connected with local government which he himself had never done, he having been relieved of it by some of his colleagues, to whom he desired to pay all honour. Such dissatisfaction as existed was chiefly reasonable, so far as it concerned certain limited, but yet important, branches of the duties of Magistrates. There was reasonable dissatisfaction with regard to the political use at present made of the power to nominate to the Bench. There was also reasonable dissatisfaction with regard to a part of the Petty Sessional jurisdiction, which had been lately increased by the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879. The cases which caused the most hostility were masters' and servants' cases, poaching cases, public-house licences, and the appointment of Overseers, but this last only in some districts. With regard to the political use of the power of nomination, he would name privately to any hon. Member the cases of two gentlemen who had come at the same time into the same county, neither of whom had previously been known as politicians. They were both men who had made fortunes in business ; they were both men in all respects fit to be on the Bench. One proved to have Conservative leanings, and he was at once placed on the Bench. The other proved to be a supporter of the policy of the present Government, although not a Party Liberal, and he, the owner of the larger property, had not been placed upon the Bench. As regards masters and servants and poaching cases, it was difficult to fully restore public confidence in the administration of the law so long as the qualification was retained, as it was, of course, retained under the present Motion. In districts which were urban, although outside of boroughs, the application of the factory legislation by Benches, which consisted chiefly of masters, led to much complaint. He knew a case, for example, in which a clear charge under one of the Factory Acts was brought against a master who was a member of the Bench, and was heard by only three Magistrates, all three of whom were masters in the same trade. In poaching cases he could name a case where, there being great doubt about the facts, a pheasant had been taken by a gipsy from the property of the Chairman of the Bench, who left the chair while the case was heard, but sat at the side and examined the witnesses, and talked all the while to his brother Magistrates. They were all also game preservers in the same district. As regarded public-house licensing, he could name a case where, the Chairman of the Bench being a brewer, undue regard had been paid to his opinion by his brother members—although he did not, of course, sit at Licensing Sessions—and a licence granted, which was not needed, against an almost unanimous local opinion. The brewer and the great majority of the Bench were Conservative, but so was the Local Board, and so were the majority of the Overseers and Churchwardens ; and yet the Local Board, the Overseers, and Churchwardens had all appeared against the licence. With regard to the appointment of Overseers, there were many districts in which the Magistrates invariably accepted the choice of the locality. But there were startling cases the other way. In the case of a parish near Southampton, within three years of the present date, two gentlemen had been elected Overseers on a show of hands at the Parish Vestry as against two others, there being no difference between them except on Party politics. The parish had been polled, and, in spite of the plural vote of property, the same two who had won the show of hands had been returned upon a poll. The matter was taken to the Magistrates, and they struck out the names of the two presented to them by the parish, and appointed the other two who had been twice defeated. In another case, which he could name, the Magistrates having a strong opinion against a publican, of whatever position and of character, however high, acting as Overseer of the Poor, and a parish of 100,000 people having returned two Overseers to them, the name of one of the two was struck out, under a mistaken impression that he was another gentleman, who was, in fact, a very popular publican, whose appointment would have been a very natural one had it, in fact, taken place on that occasion. It might be thought that the Local Government (England) Bill would get rid of this difficulty about the Overseers; but that was not the case, for the provisions with regard to Overseers applied only to some parishes, and all the most important parishes in the country were left by the Bill in their present relations to the Bench of Magistrates with regard to the appointment of Overseers. None of these difficulties could be fully remedied without the abolition of the qualification. But by placing upon the Bench, under the present Resolution, men taken from a somewhat wider field, it would be possible to put on those in whom the workmen would have confidence in masters' and servants' cases in industrial districts; and, with regard to poaching cases, to bring in men in rural districts who would neither be game preservers nor in close social relations with game preservers. As regarded licensing and the appointment of Overseers, the Benches would be more in touch with local opinion. The larger question was not raised by the present Resolution. It concerned only the mode of choice, given the qualification. The qualification, he feared, was not always observed at present. But breaches of the principle were always upon one side. He knew a case where a gentleman, who had served for the whole of his long life as a Magistrate, had never possessed the qualification, or, at all events, not within the memory of man; and another gentleman had been excluded, who was a Liberal, although his qualification was a better one, and although he represented the oldest family in the district, and lived on the land which his ancestors had owned since the 14th century. He thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale (Mr. Maden) could name a case which was as startling. Under the Resolution, the qualification remaining, the County Bench would still in most cases be Conservative. The vast preponderance, he admitted, of those who were likely to be placed upon it in rural districts were Conservatives. Those eligible would still be chiefly county gentlemen, and he did not pretend to deny that the great majority of county gentlemen were Conservatives. His speech had been but brief, because, as he had begun by saying, the case must essentially remain there where in his careful speech the present very moderate Lord Chancellor had put it. But his short speech was intended to secure that the opinion of the House should be pronounced upon their Resolution, and he made no doubt but that the House would carry it.

*MR. A. C. MORTON seconded the Resolution with great satisfaction, and was glad that it applied to Ireland as well as to England, Scotland, and Wales. But he regretted that there should have been any necessity for the Resolution at all. The question was purely one of administration, and all that they were asking was that the Government should carry out the law. The Statute of Henry VIII. states distinctly that the King should appoint the Magistrates; and however convenient it might have been to hand over that duty to the Lords Lieutenant, and however long that custom might have been in use, it was irregular, illegal, and had been most unfortunate in its application. The expression "the king" now meant the Crown as advised by the Lord Chancellor, and he had no hesitation in saying that the Crown had no right to shirk or to hand over to Lords Lieutenant or anyone else the duty confided to it by an Act of Parliament. He could not, and did not, object to the Crown getting whatever assistance it could in selecting Magistrates from either Lords Lieutenant or any other persons who might have local knowledge of the persons who might be nominated. This Resolution, and the representations that had been made to the Lord Chancellor, was not so much an attack upon Lords Lieutenant as an insistence upon the right of the Crown to appoint County Magistrates without the intervention of anyone. At the present moment practically the Lords Lieutenant appointed these Magistrates; and the Crown, notwithstanding the Act of Parliament to the contrary, merely did what the Lords Lieutenant allowed it to do; and the Lords Lieutenant illegally actually claim the right to appoint Magistrates. These were the facts of the present state of things, and the position of the Crown in the matter was both absurd and ridiculous. Well, he was sure that he was right in asserting that Magistrates should represent, and be taken from, all classes of the people. What had been the result of this unfortunate custom which had grown up, and which the Lord Chancellor desired the assistance of the Resolution to remove? The result had been that we found the Magistrates nearly all selected from one class or political Party and one creed or sect. He had no time now to give the figures to the House, but he was within the mark in saying that more than 90 per cent. of the present County Magistrates belonged to the Party opposing—the Liberal and Radical Party—which in this country represent progress and civil and religious liberty to all classes and sects. A very large amount of information had been sent to him, showing how unfair the constitution of the present country Benches was. He could only to-night say that it conclusively showed that at the present time they had a state of things which was intolerable in a free country. Though he did not wish unduly to occupy the time of the House, he supposed he ought to state how this matter affected the constituency he represented. In the County of Peterborough there were 42

Magistrates, and only one was a Liberal. They had sent the Lord Lieutenant a list of eligible gentlemen. They did not ask for 41 Magistrates so as to make themselves equal with the Conservatives; all they asked was that 10 fully-qualified persons should be appointed, and the Lord Lieutenant refused to nominate one of them. He hoped the Tory Party would have the good sense to accept the Resolution, which was a very moderate one. They did not wish to make these appointments political; they desired to put a stop to the present practice and to allow all parties to be represented. He could not at that time refer to the appointment and qualification of Magistrates, but he preferred that Magistrates should be elected by the people, and 700 years' experience supported that view. The City of London had produced the best Bench of Magistrates in the country, and the only Bench about which no complaints had been made in that House. The City Magistrates were elected by exactly the same constituencies as the Common Council, and by the Ballot. He had noticed that queer abuses existed in towns. A trader on one side of the street was appointed a Magistrate because he was a Tory. A trader on the other side of the street, though perhaps in a much better position, was rejected if he happened to be a Liberal, or, worse still, a Nonconformist. He claimed for all parties and all sects, and especially for the industrial classes, the right to be represented on the Magisterial Bench, and was confident that the more democratic they made the Bench the better and purer it would be.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the appointment of County Magistrates should no longer be made by the Lords Chancellor of Great Britain and Ireland for the time being only on the recommendation of the Lords Lieutenant,"—(Sir Charles W. Dilke,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR J. DORINGTON (Gloucester, Tewkesbury), who had the following Amendment on the Paper, but was precluded from moving, to omit from the Resolution all the words after "House," in order to insert—

"The present system of appointing County Justices has worked to the advantage of the country, and has created a body of men whose decisions have been recognised as just and impartial by all classes," said the Motion of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean left matters, with regard to the appointment of Magistrates, very much as they were, because the Lord Chancellor at the present time had the right to rectify the evils he might find in the appointments made by the Lords Lieutenant. Of course, there should be a strong case before the Lord Chancellor acted over the head of the Lord Lieutenant, and no doubt the object of the Resolution was to induce the Lord Chancellor to exercise that power more freely. He ventured to say that if the Lord Chancellor acted as the right hon. Baronet proposed, it was bound to be the death of the present system of appointing Magistrates. That system had worked well, and very much better than any system which was likely to be introduced. He had for a long time been connected with county affairs in Gloucestershire, and had there been any real dissatisfaction with regard to the composition of the County Bench, he would have heard it before last November, when this agitation began. He believed it to be a mechanical agitation, not founded on any real grievance. It was said there were too many Magistrates who did not hold the political opinions of hon. Gentlemen opposite. But what had political opinion to do with the Magistracy? Ever since he had been head of the Magistrates of Gloucestershire the Magistrates had never regarded themselves as a political body, and in the choice of persons to fill important public offices they had paid no regard to politics. Largely Conservative as the county was, at all events in the Magistracy and among the upper classes, his immediate predecessor in the office he held was a Radical, who had sat in that House as a supporter of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. He was elected by the free vote of the Magistrates, not because he was a Radical, but because they believed he was a man fit to fill the post; and when he succeeded that gentleman he was elected, not because he was a Tory, but because it was thought he was suited for the place. His lieutenants had been drawn regardless of their politics, and that represented the really healthy condition of a Bench. The House was now asked to create a Bench which should be essentially partisan, the members of which would be appointed by the different parties because they were their own supporters. All ideas of fairness and justice would thus be removed; and the Bench, which ought to be perfectly pure and free from all political considerations, would immediately become a scene of faction, and certainly would not have the same tone of honour as that which it displaced. It was not altogether unknown to the House how, in former days, politics affected the judicial decisions of the House. At one time Election Petitions were tried by vote of the House. Subsequently a scheme for the trial of the Petitions was adopted, under which it was hoped, that Party feeling would be eliminated; but it was equally unsuccessful. In 1868 the House came to the conclusion that it was too much animated by Party spirit to discharge judicial functions, and it transferred these functions to hands to which no motive of Party could properly attach. That was the position of the County Magistrates at the present time—they could not be suspected of Party feeling. He had some reason to say that, because in his own county the Lord Lieutenant was not of his own political opinions, though the Home Secretary had repudiated him as belonging to his Party. The Lord Lieutenant of Gloucestershire considered himself as attached to the Liberal Party and his son had sat for a long time in the House as a supporter of the Liberal Party. At the present time, no doubt, he and the Lord Lieutenant were on the same side in politics. [Ministerial laughter.] Hon. Members opposite were entirely wrong if they thought the appointments of the great mass of the Magistrates of Gloucestershire were due to political predilections. The majority of them, it was true, belonged to the Conservative Party, but they had been appointed by a Liberal Lord Lieutenant because he had thought them the men best fitted to administer justice. [Cries of "Oh!"] He maintained, despite the jeers of hon. Members opposite, that, as far as his own experience went, County Magistrates had always been appointed on account of their fitness. He believed that if the appointments to the County Bench were placed in the hands of gentlemen who had not the responsibility which now attached to the Lord Lieutenant the same state of things would prevail on that Bench that now existed on the Borough Benches, and the appointments would be purely political. The late Lord Chancellor was most anxious that all the appointments to the County Bench should be absolutely independent of politics. Undoubtedly in his own county Lord Halsbury's appointments had been equally balanced, the Justices being selected from both Parties. The Chancellor of the Duchy prided himself upon putting things right, and had put an immense number of Radicals upon the County Bench. If hon. Members opposite made the change suggested, that would involve the abolition of the existing system, and such a change would be a fatal one. He hoped that the House of Commons, jealous as it was of the good name of the country, would not act hurriedly in this matter, nor after a three hours' Debate pass such a Resolution as this, which would give the appointment of County Magistrates to the Lord Chancellor, who could not be as well qualified as the Lord Lieutenant to judge of the fitness of the gentlemen appointed, and which would undoubtedly lead to the tainting of the County Bench with political partisanship.

*MR. J. WILSON (Lanark, Govan) said, that in Scotland they could not say that either a man's position or his religious faith were a disqualification for the office of a Justice of the Peace; but, all the same, it was rather a strange thing that three-fourths of the Magistrates were Tories and Unionists. In his own Division, which had a population of 63,000, there were four Resident Justices of the Peace, of whom three were Tories and one, who had been a Unionist, was now a Liberal. Two of these four Magistrates were absent in Glasgow all the day attending to their private business, and, therefore, not available in Govan. He had called the attention of the Lord Lieutenant of Lanark to the want of Magistrates in the county; and as the same state of things prevailed throughout Scotland, he hoped the Lords Lieutenant of all the counties in that country would bestir themselves. He was glad the matter had been brought before the House, and he should support the Motion of the right hon. Baronet.

*MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon) said, that this Motion, if it meant anything, meant an attack upon the Lords Lieutenant of the country for the manner in which they had appointed the County Justices. He had probably as large an acquaintance with this question as any hon. Member in the House. He had been Chairman of Quarter Sessions in his county for 22 years, and had dealings with three different Lords Lieutenant. The county for which he had been elected Chairman of Quarter Sessions was the most Radical county in England, and he thought that that incident might be taken as a good sign that politics were not the motive power in the appointment of the Magistrates of the county. His experience in that county convinced him that the present system was the very best that could be pursued. When additional Magistrates were required the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions represented the matter to the Lord Lieutenant, who made appointments to the Bench with the utmost impartiality, as far as politics were concerned. [Ironical cheers and laughter.] Perhaps hon. Members opposite could not think that it was possible to make appointments without being influenced by political bias. All he could say was that the most fit persons were appointed. There was a very large number of Magistrates in the county with whose politics he had no acquaintance whatever. But what was suggested now? That instead of the appointments being made by the Lords Lieutenant, who had made them impartially, they were to be made in future by the Lord Chancellor for political considerations. Would hon. Members opposite deny that the appointments by the Lord Chancellor in the boroughs had not been political appointments? They were political appointments. By whatever side in politics the appointments in boroughs were made they were always political appointments, and it would be an evil day for England if political appointments were made on the same scale in the counties. Did hon. Members opposite intend that these appointments should partake of a political character in the future? Had not the present Lord Chancellor made political appointments to the Bench? The late Lord Chancellor had done his best to keep a fair balance in making these appointments. Before the late Government left Office he was urged to send up the names of several gentlemen of his own political colour to the Lord Chancellor to be made Magistrates; but he refused, partly on his own account and partly because he had always found that Lord Halsbury had been determined to keep a fair balance between the two Parties. The very last appointments made by Lord Halsbury were made in Harrogate. One of the gentlemen appointed was a Conservative, one had been a Liberal, but what his politics now were he did not know, and three were out-and-out Radicals. But what was the state of things under the present Lord Chancellor? The other day Lord Herschell had appointed four Radicals to the Bench at Ripon without appointing a single Conservative or Liberal Unionist. Were those appointments fair? At Leeds, again, where there was a Bench of 63 Magistrates, the noble Lord had appointed 11 Radicals and only two Conservatives to the Bench, neither of the latter being asked as to their willingness to serve, and one of whom had previously declined to accept the appointment. Was this what they had to expect in the future? Lord Herschell was invited to follow the example of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; but if that example were followed by future Lord Chancellors he was sorry for the name and fame of England. He declared, without fear of contradiction, that the Benches appointed by the Lords Lieutenant had done their work well in the past; and if the old system were to be abolished, and if the appointments were to be made political, the result would be that Stipendiary Magistrates would have to be appointed at an enormous cost to the country. [Ministerial Cheers.] He was sorry to hear that cheered by hon. Gentlemen opposite; but then the policy of the Radical Government was a policy of extravagance and expense. He hoped that the Motion would be rejected, and that the Benches of England would continue to be nominated in the same way as heretofore.

*MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) said, he desired to make a few remarks with regard to the County Benches in Wales, and particularly his own county of Flintshire. Whatever the last speaker might have thought would be the results in England of a change in the method of appointing Magistrates, he could assure the House that they could not be worse than under the present system in Wales. Wales suffered far more keenly and far more unjustly in this respect than England. In England, at all events, the Magistrates, whatever their politics might be, and the people, belonged to the same race and spoke the same language; but in Wales, unfortunately, Magistrates belonged to one race and the people to another. The Magistrates spoke one language; and, speaking broadly and generally, the people used another language; and he was afraid that the Magistrates seldom or never took the trouble to acquire the language of those to whom they were expected to dispense justice. An Anglo-Indian Magistrate was obliged to know the language of the people to whom he dispensed justice; but in Wales it was too often the case that the Magistrates took pride in being ignorant of the language of the people. He considered that every nation had an inherent right to have justice administered to it in its own language, but, so far as Wales was concerned, all they asked for was that a due proportion of the Magistrates should be able to speak the language of the people. Previous speakers had alluded to the disqualification under which Nonconformists laboured under the existing system of appointing Magistrates. In Wales the preponderance of Nonconformists was enormous, and yet nearly all the Magistrates belonged to the Established Church. Then, with regard to the political grievance which had been spoken of in England, he could assure the House that that grievance was intensified in Wales. Wales was Liberal to the backbone, but the Magistracy was just as Conservative as Wales was Liberal. To give an illustration respecting one political question. The great majority of the inhabitants of Wales were strongly opposed to the present licensing system; but in that House, a few days ago, only one Member from Wales ventured to vote against the Welsh Local Veto Bill introduced by the Member for the Carmarthen Boroughs. On that subject, the Magistracy were in favour of the existing licensing system, and were entirely opposed to the wishes of the people. The Magistracy in the County of Flint was alien—he used the word in no offensive sense—in race, language, religion, and politics. Although Flintshire was a border county, two-thirds of the population spoke Welsh, but out of 90 Magistrates in Flintshire only 15 spoke the Welsh language, and there were only eight supporters of the present Government. The hon. Member for the Southport Division waxed indignant the other night as to the composition of the Southport Bench; but accepting the figures of the hon. Member, if it was wrong that there should be a small Liberal majority on the Bench at Southport, was it right that there should be an enormous Tory majority on the Bench in Flintshire? Up to six years ago there was not a single Nonconformist Magistrate in Flintshire. A number of names had been submitted to the Lord Lieutenant of Nonconformists who had spent all their lives in the county, and were a hundred times better qualified than the strangers and squirelings who had been pitchforked on to the Bench, but the Lord Lieutenant absolutely refused to appoint them. This question was raised in 1887, and the only reply by the then Home Secretary was that there was no qualified Nonconformist. He could find no Parliamentary language whatever to characterise that statement. He could only say there were plenty of Nonconformists qualified for that position. But at last one Conservative Nonconformist was found, and he was forthwith appointed, although he had only resided in a seaside resort in the county for a short time, and had done, so far as he was aware, absolutely nothing for the county, and a short time after his appointment he left the county. The next Nonconformist put on the County Bench was himself; but he need not say it was not by the favour of the Lord Lieutenant, but because he was Chairman of the County Council. At the present time, five Nonconformists out of 93 Magistrates were on the County Bench. That was an object lesson of how Nonconformity was tolerated in Wales that the House would do well to remember. He did not assume for a moment that Nonconformity or Liberalism, as such, had any right whatever to be represented on the Bench; but he said that Liberalism and Nonconformity ought not to be made a disqualification. The County Council comprised men of every shade of opinion belonging to all sects, parties, and creeds, and it had this question before it on two occasions. On the first occasion it condemned the existing system of appointment with one dissentient only. In September last the matter again came up, and on that occasion the system was condemned without a single dissentient voice. It would be quite impossible for him to lay before the House a more conclusive argument, so far as Flintshire was concerned, than the one he had put before them. He came to Parliament with a mandate from the County Council and from the constituency he represented to speak upon that question; and he asked the House, in the name of a country which had long and patiently—too long and too patiently—tolerated many grievances such as the one he had described, to pass his Resolution.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) : The House will not be surprised, I am sure, to learn that the people of Ireland take a very special interest in the subject of this Resolution. The question of the Magistracy is a burning question in Ireland. I think I will be believed when I assert that there is no fact which forces itself more strongly upon the attention of any intelligent man who visits Ireland with the intention of inquiring into the social troubles of that country than that what lies at the root, possibly more than anything else, of all the troubles of Ireland is that you have never been able to establish any bond of sympathy between the Executive Government and the administration of the law and the people of the country. It is not alone the denial of a legislative machine truly representative of the people of Ireland which has been at the bottom of the intensity of the demand for Home Rule, which is pressed upon this Parliament from Ireland. I have always contended that if it were possible for this House, as it might conceivably be, to legislate for Ireland in accordance with the wishes of the people of Ireland you would not get rid of the demand for Home Rule, for, whatever way you legislate in this House, the administration of the law in Ireland is not in harmony with the people of that country. The administration of the law, which comes home more than anything else to the lives of the people, is now, even under the present Chief Secretary, though happily to a much less extent than in times past, owing to the instruments which he is obliged to use in Ireland, not entirely in harmony with the people of that country; and until the administration of the law is brought into harmony with the people who have to live under the law, then, I say, you can never have contentment or peace. An hon. Member asked—What has politics to do with the appointment of Bench Magistrates?—and I think I will answer that question, and answer it to the satisfaction of every hon. Member of this House. I do not know what politics have to do with the appointment of Magistrates in England; but I do know what they have to do with the appointment of Magistrates in Ireland. If you dare to sympathise in politics with four-fifths of your people, that in Ireland is almost an insuperable bar, no matter what qualifications you may possess, to sitting as a Magistrate. There are people in our country, hundreds of men, intelligent men, well-conducted men, who are in every way qualified to act as Magistrates, and who are compelled to submit to the intolerable insult put upon them of seeing men who are not as intelligent, not as well conducted, not in any way as fit to sit upon the Bench, placed over their heads, simply because they are opposed in politics to the mass of our people. I shall now be compelled to give to the House a few figures as regards the condition of the Bench of Magistrates in Ireland. I will first give a few figures showing how the composition stands as regards religious persuasions. I must say, at the very outset, that this question is with us not a religious question, because there are not in the most Catholic corner of Ireland people who would not be just as well pleased to see on the Bench a Protestant who sympathised with the people as a Catholic; and I know myself, in the South and West of Ireland, many Protestants whom the people would infinitely rather see on the Bench than many Catholics. I would only allude, therefore, to the religious persuasions of the Magistrates as compared with the people, because it is one of the signs which show the gross and scandalous partisanship which has characterised those appointments. The Catholic population of Ireland is over 75 per cent.—that is to say, more than three out of every four of the inhabitants are Catholics. There were, in 1886, 5,065 Magistrates on the Bench, and of these 1,229 were Catholics, and nearly 4,000 were Protestants. The population stands in the proportion of three Catholics to one Protestant, while of the Magistrates there are four Protestants to one Catholic. When we go into the figures of the counties the case comes out even stronger. In Fermanagh County 55 per cent. of the people are Catholics. There are 86 Protestant Justices, and there are 4 Catholic Justices. In Monaghan 73 per cent. of the population are Catholics. There are 81 Justices, and there are 13 Catholic Magistrates. In Leitrim 90 per cent. of the population is Catholic. There are 80 Justices of the Peace, and of these 11 are Catholics. In the Queen's County 87 per cent. of the population is Catholic. There are 84 Justices, and 15 are Catholics. In the great County of Tipperary, where 94 per cent. of the population is Catholic, and where there are an enormous number of Catholics qualified in every respect for the Bench, there are 217 Justices, and only 59 of them Catholics. In the County of Wicklow 79 per cent. of the people are Catholics. There are 116 Justices, and there are only 13 Catholic Justices. I think it will be admitted that these figures alone look suspicious, and are sufficient ground for just complaint on the part of the Irish people. But those figures only give an inadequate idea of the grievances under which our people have suffered in this regard, because I have no hesitation in saying that the Catholic Magistrates are in a large degree worse enemies of the people than the Protestants, for the Executive Government of Ireland, or rather I should say the Lord Lieutenants, when making appointments to the Magistracy amongst those who hold the faith of the majority of the people, have selected men who are notoriously opposed in politics to the body of the Irish people, and who in many cases, I grieve to say, exhibit all the bitterness and animosity of turncoats and of traitors. In the County of Leitrim there are 71 Justices, and out of the 71 there is one Nationalist in a county where the Tory candidate was only able to poll 14 per cent. of the Parliamentary voters—that is to say, 86 per cent. of the Parliamentary voters of Leitrim have one representative on the Magisterial Bench, and the minority have a representation of 70 out of 71. It is not to be wondered at that the Loyalist minority in Ireland should insist upon maintaining the present condition of things. In Sligo there are 78 Justices. One out of the 78 is a Home Ruler. In the County of Mayo, a division of which I represent, and in which the Catholic population is, I should fancy, considerably over 90 per cent. of the whole, there are 95 Justices of the Peace, and two of these are Home Rulers; and in the County of Galway there are 196 Justices, and two only are Nationalists or Home Rulers. These figures are taken from the Return of 1886. Slight changes may have occurred since then, but these are not substantially wrong. I think it will be admitted by everyone who has any sense of fairness that those figures do constitute a grave and intolerable grievance upon the people of Ireland. I will give one more county, because I do not think it is necessary to pile up statistics. I have not selected the counties. They are taken at random, but they are thoroughly characteristic of the state of things in Ireland in connection with the Magisterial Bench. The county I refer to is the County Carlow. The Roman Catholic population is 36,000, and the Protestant population 4,500. The Magistrates stand as follows:—There are 57 altogether, of whom 10 are Roman Catholics; but of those 10, 5 are Catholic gentry who do not reside in the county, so that in that county, with a Catholic population of 36,000 out of 40,000, there are but 5 Catholic Magistrates residing there, and, let me add, 4 of the 5 are Unionists, and only 1 is a Nationalist. Anybody who knows the County Carlow, who is acquainted with it, cannot maintain for a single instant that there are not in that county an abundance of men holding Home Rule opinions who are quite sufficient and competent to man the Magisterial Bench even twice over if they were allowed to do so. I could go on ad nauseam piling up figures of the same character; because, as I have said already, the instances I have given are instances taken at random from different counties. This exclusion, as I have already pointed out, this barrier against the appointment of Magistrates in Ireland, is not confined by any means to any particular section or creed; it is not a question between Catholic and Protestant, because I have instances without number at my disposal of men who have been strongly recommended for the Magistracy who it could not be denied possessed every necessary qualification, whose names were sent forward to the Lords Lieutenant of Counties in Ireland, and who were refused to be appointed, who were rejected by these Lords Lieutenant, not because they were Catholics, for many of them were Protestants and Presbyterians, and in some cases Unitarians, but because they held, or were suspected of holding, the same views as are now held by Her Majesty's Ministers. I have here the names of such men as Mr. John Sterne, Mr. John Coleman, and other men of the same kind in North Londonderry, whose names were sent forward some time ago before the Home Rule Question was raised, and they were then Liberals. I think they are Presbyterian by creed, and men of standing and wealth in that district; but they were rejected by the Lord Lieutenant of the County, Sir Hervey Bruce, not at that time, because they were Home Rulers, but because they were Liberals. They were, however, afterwards appointed over the head of Sir Hervey Bruce to the Magistracy in Ireland. Already in Ireland the Lord Chancellor has exercised this right in the past, and we in Ireland are extremely anxious to see him do it again on a much larger scale. But those men, of whom I now speak, were refused to be appointed, so far as the Lord Lieutenant could refuse it 10 or 12 years ago, because they were Liberals, and the very same treatment has been meted out within the last few months to some respectable men of high standing in the County Down, whose names I have here. I may mention Mr. Robert B. Caughey, of Newtownards, a Presbyterian; Mr. Hugh Ferguson, formerly Chairman of the Newtownards Board of Guardians, and Mr. William Gibson, a Unitarian. But because these men were supposed to sympathise with Home Rulers and being Protestants—Ulster Protestants of the County Down—these men who enjoyed the universal respect of their fellow-citizens and neighbours, who had every qualification that could be imagined for the Magistracy, their claim was rejected by the Deputy Lord Lieutenant of the County Down simply and solely because they were suspected of sympathising with the opinions of the present Government. What is the condition of things in Ireland at the present moment? The condition of things is this: that to be a sympathiser with, and a supporter of, the present Government and to be in harmony with the political opinions and views of the vast majority of the people in Ireland is a barrier to being placed on the Judicial Bench. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the Judicial Bench in Ireland has been turned into what is nothing short of a political engine, and that it is used for that purpose; and I say to that cause can be ascribed to a considerable extent the trouble which has arisen in Ireland, or rather the disrespect which is said to exist in that country for law and order. [Cheers and laughter.] It is all very fine to laugh, but when you see men who are supposed to administer justice all selected from one class, and that a small minority and a small class, who are in continued conflict with the people, and if, when a man is brought up before these Magistrates, he sees no chance of impartial treatment, he sees arrayed against him the representatives of the very class who were oppressing him, then, I say, it is impossible to expect any kind of respect to exist for justice administered in such a manner. I will give one or two more instances to show I am not exaggerating or drawing upon my imagination in this matter, and I think the first case I am about to quote will bring home to any fair-minded man the reasonableness of the case I am making. Take the case of Mr. Tener, who was brought into the County Galway as a stranger and an outsider by Lord Clanricarde to carry out the law of extermination which he is waging against his tenants. Mr. Tener was not a resident, and had no connection with any property in the county. He was brought into that county at a time, as I say, when Lord Clanricarde was waging a war of extermination against his tenants, and when Lord Clanricarde was defying and embarrassing the Tory Administration in Dublin Castle. The then Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) appealed to Lord Clanricarde to stop this war of extermination, and not to embarrass the Government. What was done by Mr. Tener? While he was actually living on Lord Clanricarde's estate, and while a house was being prepared for him to live in, he was created a Justice of the Peace—a man who had no property and no connection with the county, and, notwithstanding that, he was created a Justice of the Peace—I presume at the request of Lord Clanricarde—in order that he might discharge the double functions of knocking down the houses of the tenants and afterwards sending the tenants themselves to gaol. I also wish to mention the case of Mr. Hewson, a gentleman of evil fame in connection with the Falcarragh evictions. When he came into the County Leitrim he was created a Justice of the Peace, in order that he might be the better able to carry out his functions as a land agent. That is the common practice in Ireland. The land agent, when he is brought into a county and takes up agencies, is created a Justice of the Peace in order to enable him to carry out the work of his employer more effectually. I ask hon. Members of this House, as fair-minded Englishmen, can they ask or expect people amongst whom such things are being habitually done to have respect for the administration of the law or the agents of the law? I heard an hon. Member just now speaking of the extreme purity of the Lords Lieutenant in England, describing the way in which the vacancies were filled up in England, and adding that the Lords Lieutenant and the Executive Government never for a moment appointed a Magistrate unless he was wanted. That may be the way in England, but it is not the way in Ireland. I will give you an instance. When the Government of Lord Salisbury came into power, and by our assistance—in 1885—they afterwards gave us a very bad reward for our good offices—when that Government came into power it lasted for 227 days. In that time they appointed 264 County and 63 Borough Magistrates, although there were no vacancies.

AN hon. MEMBER: What are the names?

MR. DILLON: I have all the names of these Magistrates here; yes, every one of them. I am not going now, I need not say, to read out the list. I may say, however, that, on looking down the list, one would think you were looking down a list of English Magistrates. There is hardly a name you would recognise as an Irish name. I have no doubt that a great many of them were Orangemen. Certainly they were all Tories. I have not been able to get the whole list analysed. Certainly that Government made hay while the sun shone. In the County of Leitrim, for instance, 13 new Magistrates were created, all Tories and Protestants, although up to that time there were no Nationalist Magistrates in the county, and only 11 Roman Catholic Justices altogether. I ask any Englishman present, even hon. Members sitting on Tory Benches, is that honesty? Is that fair play? Is that impartiality? Here is a county in which 80 per cent. of the population are Roman Catholics, and yet only 11 are Catholics, and there is not one in sympathy with the Parliamentary voters. Yet when there were no vacancies the Tory Party created 13 additional Magistrates.

AN hon. MEMBER: They were appointed by the Lord Chancellor.

MR. DILLON: I thought the hon. Member knew enough to know that the Lord Chancellor is not coerced to make any Magistrates. If the Lord Chancellor thinks that the Lord Lieutenant is acting improperly, he has only to refuse to make the appointments. I only want to dispose of the argument that the vacancies may not exist. I say it is the duty of the Executive Government now in power in Ireland to do something, no matter what abuse or criticisms they may receive from those Benches; to do something to redress the inequality in Ireland, to give to the people of Ireland some foundation on which to respect the law. You (pointing to the Conservatives) have been at it for the past 90 years; and you have not brought much respect for the law, and never will so long as the system your Party supports is enforced in Ireland. You can crush the people by force of arms, or you can bind them down with Coercion Acts; but respect and love for your administration and law you could never establish in Ireland. I will tell you the reason. Because they know your law is based upon injustice. I shall say no more except just a few words, because I think we are bound to economise the time of the House. It has been my lot, amongst a somewhat varied experience in different parts of the world, to live for some time in very new communities in the Western States of America, where rough people of all kinds are thrown together, under circumstances not particularly conducive to the establishment of law and order, or respect for the law, and I never lived in any part of the world where the law was better enforced or more respected. Why was that? Because there was no man in the district who, by the labour of his hands, earned his daily bread, who did not know that he had his chance of taking part in the administration of the law under which he lived, as well as the wealthiest man in the whole district. The poorest labourer had a chance of being a Magistrate, and if he did sit on the Bench there he was as much respected, if he deserved respect, as the richest man there. My experience there, and in other parts of the world, has convinced me the surest and only way to secure respect and love for the law amongst any civilised people is to bring home to the mind of every man that they have equal rights before that law and an equal chance of taking a share and having a voice and an influence in the administration of it. If you will do that to the people of Ireland you will find there is not a people on the face of the earth more easily governed than the Irish people. I would appeal to the Prime Minister himself, or the Irish Secretary, to make some declaration to-night which will satisfy the people of Ireland that now at last, when for the first time since the Union there is in power in this country a Government which thoroughly sympathises with the masses of the population in our country, that they will use the power which unquestionably is in their hands in Ireland to remove this one great and intolerable grievance from the necks of our people, and to commence, to some extent at least, the work of redressing the gross and scandalous partiality of the Bench of Magistrates in Ireland.

SIR G. RUSSELL (Berks, Wokingham) objected that the people of England should be called upon to alter their entire system in order to meet the peculiar requirements of a peculiar people like the Irish. The hon. Member for East Mayo complained of the injustice of the administration in Ireland by the Magistrates, but he had heard from him precisely the same complaint with regard to the Judges of the High Court, who were not appointed upon the recommendation of the Lords Lieutenant. No doubt there might be in Ireland a body of Magistrates and Judges who might afford satisfaction in particular quarters. No doubt a gentleman who had cut off a cow's tail would have more sympathy with another gentleman who had also cut off a cow's tail; but he never yet heard, either with regard to the Judges or the Magistrates, any charge which could bear investigation on the floor of this House—never once. They in England declined to be dragged in this, as in other matters, at the tail of Ireland. The hon. Baronet who moved the Resolution in so temperate a speech said not a word against the existing Magistrates. His complaint was that there were gentlemen who should be, but were not, appointed to the Bench. But at the bottom of the whole of the argument in support of the Resolution was the allegation that the existing appointments were made upon political grounds. How was it proposed to remedy that? By handing over the appointments to a direct and distinct political personage. The Lord Chancellor sat in the Cabinet, was identified with every measure, Radical or Conservative, which the Government of the day might have placed before the people, and he would always be under pressure to regulate his Magisterial appointments so as to curry favour with the Party by whose aid he hoped to carry those measures. He had been sorry to hear from those Benches language somewhat condemnatory of the present Lord Chancellor, for there was no man living for whose character, capacity, and honesty he entertained a higher opinion. By way of analogy, take the appointment of the present puisne Judges of the High Court by the Lord Chancellor. Would any man venture to say that those appointments were made on the ground only of legal fitness? They were made every day, not on the ground of legal fitness, but of political exigency. Yet it was proposed to hand over Magisterial appointments to the very political gentleman who now made these political appointments in the High Court. The Resolution was reactionary; it would have the exact effect of doing that which it professed to undo, and he should have no hesitation in giving his vote against it.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I propose, in a very few sentences, to state the view which Her Majesty's Government take on this question. I think we shall all admit that we have had, up till now, a very valuable and interesting Debate. The Lord Chancellor, in answer to the deputation which waited on him a short time ago, expressed the opinion that while the legal right of appointing Magistrates for counties as well as for boroughs was vested in him alone, he himself did not feel justified in setting aside the long-standing practice and Constitutional usage which had grown up, of limiting the county appointments to persons nominated by the Lords Lieutenant, unless he was fortified in doing so by an unequivocal declaration of the opinion of the House. That declaration the right hon. Baronet, by his Motion, invites the House to make, and, as far as the Government are concerned, they trust the House will respond to the appeal. The Motion, I may point out, is judiciously limited in scope; it does not propose to disestablish the Lords Lieutenant from the position of a recommending authority; what it does is to take away from them the monopoly of the power or privilege of recommendation, and to open out for the information, and, if need be, for the action, of the Lord Chancellor, other sources of suggestion and advice. Now the adoption of such a Motion, no doubt, involves a condemnation of the results of the existing system. What are the facts? The effect of them may be summed up by saying that they show, when the composition of the Magisterial Bench is analysed, an enormous disproportion, out of all correspondence with the distribution of outside opinion, in favour of a particular political Party, and in some parts of the Kingdom in favour of a particular religious creed. In Wales, as my hon. Friend the Member for the Flint Boroughs has remarked, there is not merely the political, but there is the religious, question, and no one can doubt that over a very large part of the Principality the profession of Nonconformist belief is regarded as a disqualification for the Bench. In Carmarthenshire, for instance, there was, until lately, only a single Nonconformist on the Bench, and in Denbighshire there were only seven. In many parts of Wales the restriction of the appointments to the Bench to the Conservative Party and members of the Church of England leads to the great practical inconvenience that the Magistrates who have to administer justice among a Welsh-speaking population do not understand the tongue of the witnesses. In Ireland the Lord Chancellors have from time to time taken upon themselves to do what is a very rare, if not unknown, thing in this country, to disregard and over-ride the discretion of the Lords Lieutenant. Still, as a rule, the Lord Chancellor in Ireland, as well as in England, has felt himself bound, not by inflexible, but by common, practice to follow the recommendations of the Lord Lieutenants. I will take the appointments of the late Lord Chancellor, Lord Ashbourne. Between August 5, 1886, when he came into Office, and August 22, 1892, when he went out, he appointed in a country, where three-fourths of the population are Roman Catholics, 1,012 Magistrates, of whom only 166 were Roman Catholics.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman say how many Presbyterians were appointed?

*MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir; I cannot. The question of the hon. Gentleman is entirely irrelevant to the point. What I was saying was that in a country, three-fourths of the population of which are Roman Catholics, less than 200 out of over 1,000 Magistrates appointed by the late Lord Chancellor belong to that faith. That shows a practical, I will not say ostracism, but a discrimination habitually exercised against the faith of the majority of the people, which cannot but have the effect of permanently and profoundly impairing their confidence in the administration of the law. The present Lord Chancellor, during the nine months he has been Office, has appointed 210 Magistrates, of whom 133 are Roman Catholics. I do not know whether that will be represented as a scandalous piece of Bench-packing; but seeing that during the six years his predecessor was in Office only 166 Roman Catholics, out of 1,012 Magistrates, were appointed, I say it is high time some attempt was made to redress the balance. As it is, there are in Ireland some 5,300 County Magistrates alone, and after all the Bench-packing by the present Government 4,437 of that number are Protestants and only 873 Catholics. Though not strictly relevant to the question before the House, I have one observation to make on the criticisms passed on the action of my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain. It is suggested that in the boroughs my noble Friend has been guilty of extraordinary partiality and a want of a judicial spirit. When my noble Friend came into Office 22 per cent. of the Magistrates on the Borough Bench were supporters of the present Government. At the present moment 36 per cent. of the Borough Magistrates are supporters of the present Government. In other words, the Party opposite have been left in possession of nearly two-thirds of the Borough Bench. These figures speak for themselves. I will allow to those who oppose the Motion that there are two circumstances that might fairly be taken into account, and which are independent of the political prepossessions of the Lord Chancellor. In the first place, I admit that the Conservative Party have always had, and has at this moment, probably to a larger degree than ever in the past, a considerable preponderance amongst its supporters of those persons of property and of social position from whom the Magistrates have been appointed in the past. I will agree further that the existence of the property qualification, which is exacted as a condition for Magistrates in counties, though it is not in boroughs, must necessarily limit and restrict the Lord Lieutenant's area of choice. I should be very glad to think that we should have the support of hon. Gentlemen opposite in removing that disqualification and in assimilating the conditions for admission to the county to those which prevail for admission to the Borough Bench. I have been endeavouring for a long time past to bring in a Bill for that purpose, and if I can get the least encouragement in the course of the Debate from the Leader of the Opposition that that Bill will be treated as a non-contentious measure—[Opposition cries of "No!" and Ministerial Cheers.] I confess I never expected it. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are prepared deliberately to maintain, for the purposes of the County Bench, the property qualification. The noble Lord (Lord R. Churchill) shakes his head; but the noble Lord is a Tory democrat.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): The property qualification has disappeared long since.

MR. ASQUITH: Not in the counties. The noble Lord is entirely mistaken.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: The property qualification for all political offices has disappeared.

MR. ASQUITH: I understood we were dealing, not with political offices, but with judicial offices. Is the noble Lord going to maintain that these being judicial, and not political, offices the property qualification ought to be applied?

LORD R. CHURCHILL: No.
Mr. Asquith

*MR. ASQUITH: I am glad of that admission; but then the noble Lord has got to deal with hon. Gentlemen behind him, who, when I ask that the measure I wish to introduce should be treated as non-contentious, immediately indulge in a chorus of negation. The Party opposite see that the property qualification, coupled with the exclusive power of Lords Lieutenant to nominate, is their great security for maintaining the County Bench in its present position. After all allowance has been made for the causes to which I have referred, the facts cannot be accounted for without supposing that the Lords Lieutenant, or those who advise them, have been influenced in the past by political motives. I do not make any charge against the Lords Lieutenant. I know there are Lords Lieutenant who have steadily refused to nominate on political grounds, but they very frequently took a course which, though they did not intend it, had precisely that result. They went to the various Petty Sessional Divisions for advice, and they got from the Magistrates sitting upon the Bench nominations which, although the Lord Lieutenant may have been too innocent to know it, were undoubtedly inspired by political motives. I do not think I am putting the case too far when I say that we may divide the practice which has been pursued into two branches. Upon the one side, where we have had a Lord Lieutenant acting on his own initiative, we have had nomination on political grounds; and upon the other side, where we have had a Lord Lieutenant applying to the Petty Sessional Bench, we have had co-optation on political grounds. I entirely agree with those who say that politics ought not to be regarded as a qualification for the Judicial Bench. [Opposition cheers]. Yes; but if I may quote a familiar saying of an eminent Frenchman, who, when asked his opinion about the abolition of capital punishment, suggested that the assassins should set the example, I would say that it does not lie with those who have packed the County and Borough Benches with political partisans to hold up their hands in holy horror and argue, as against their opponents, that politics should have nothing to do with judicial appointments. I make a fair offer to hon. Gentlemen.

Once let us redress the inequalities of the past, and we and our Party will be perfectly prepared to enter into a truce and to agree that, for the future, politics should have nothing to do with appointments to the Magistracy. I must add that I do not make any general charge against the County Magistrates. I have had an opportunity, perhaps, of seeing more of the proceedings of Magistrates than can fall to the lot of most hon. Members; and although mistakes are made from time to time, as they must be in the best-constituted judicial arrangements, I gladly yield my testimony that there is no ground whatsoever for suspecting the great majority of the Magistrates in this country either of partiality or incompetence. But it is not necessary for the purposes of this Motion, or for my argument, to allege that unfit persons are placed upon the Bench for political reasons, because, in the view of the Government, the efficiency of the persons who are charged with the administration of justice, important as it is, is not more important than securing public confidence in the administration of justice. So long as a state of facts exists—leaving England out of view—such as that which has been described in Wales and in Ireland, public confidence in the administration of justice is impossible. The determination of certain kinds of questions which constantly come before Magistrates must necessarily expose them to suspicion if the Bench be constituted wholly or mainly of one political or one religious Party. Take the case of licensing houses for the sale of intoxicating liquor. The appeal from the decision of the Borough Benches is to the County Quarter Sessions—that is to say, to Magistrates nominated by the Lord Lieutenant—and the cases are numerous in which the decisions of the Borough Magistrates have been over-ruled by the County Justices.

SIR E. CLARKE (Plymouth): Not in the case of new licences.

*MR. ASQUITH: No; there is no appeal in that case. Take the question of the rights of property, the enforcement of the Game Laws, and rights of way generally. Far be it from me to say that the Magistrates show bias in these matters; but, so long as the Bench is constituted as it is at present, there will always be in the minds of people a feeling, which you cannot say is unreasonable, that Magistrates belonging exclusively to one class slightly depress or raise the balance in favour of the class to which they belong. Take one other illustration—the large, increasing, and most delicate class of questions connected with labour which are now constantly coming before Benches; take such a case as that of the Hull strike, which was discussed in the House only yesterday. That has happened in a borough, but a similar state of things may happen, and has happened during my short experience at the Home Office, in a county. There we have Magistrates of the Bench not only determining the charges made against persons summoned before them for offences against the law, but with the delicate and responsible duty thrown into their hands of determining whether or not they should call the Naval and Military Forces of the Crown to assist them in the maintenance of law and order. The only condition under which justice can be administered so as to inspire general confidence is that the Bench should represent all Parties and all schools, and should be free from all suspicion one way or the other. The conclusion to which the Government has come is that, although the Lords Lieutenant certainly should not be deprived of the power which they may usefully exercise in continuing to recommend Magistrates to the Lord Chancellor, yet that the Lord Chancellor should not be shut out from other sources of suggestion—that County Magistrates and various Local Authorities which made up the county should have an equal power and an equal right of recommending names to him for selection. In this way we shall, by widening the area of choice and enlarging the Lord Chancellor's free power of selection, provide not only, as the Government believe, security for the efficient administration of justice, but security for that which is equally important—for the deeply-rooted and widespread popular confidence and faith in the impartiality of those who administer the law.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I gather from the speech of the Home Secretary that the Government propose, if possible, by the aid of this House, to force down the throat of their Colleague, the Lord Chancellor, a method of selecting Magistrates to which the Lord Chancellor himself has raised very strong objections. If I understand what took place between the Lord Chancellor and an important deputation not long ago, he is of opinion that, generally speaking, the existing system has not worked badly; he is of opinion also that any system that has been proposed as a substitute would work far worse; and he is especially convinced that that which commends itself to the Home Secretary—to take the nominations of County Councils—is not one which would, on the whole, conduce to manning the Bench in a satisfactory manner. This is a very extraordinary procedure on the part of the Government. I should be curious to know, if one could discover it, what happened at the Cabinet when this course was finally decided upon. With regard to Ireland, the chief objection raised by the Home Secretary, echoing the speech of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. John Dillon), is that the proportion of Catholics to Protestants on the Bench is very different from the proportion of Catholics to Protestants in the population. That is perfectly true, and the reason is obvious.

MR. JOHN DILLON said, the chief objection he had stated was that of political partisanship.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will say, then, not the chief objection, but the longest objection of the hon. Member, and the chief objection of the Home Secretary. Both must be aware that one of the difficulties in Ireland in making the proportion of officers or of Magistrates, or of any officials whatever, at all correspond with the religion of the population is that, unfortunately, the class from which, on account of education and other circumstances, we have to draw the Magistrates is, unfortunately, not in conformity with the religious convictions of the majority of the people. It is a fact greatly to be deplored, and it is, in my opinion, a reason for limiting as much as possible the jurisdiction of unpaid Magistrates in Ireland. But so far as my experience of Ireland goes,

it is distinctly to a man's advantage to be a Roman Catholic in seeking an appointment. I had nothing to do with the appointment of Magistrates; but so far as I had to do with medical appointments, I can most truly say I took Roman Catholics of lower qualifications rather than Protestants. As between two competitors for the same place, one a Roman Catholic and the other a Protestant, I always more than stretched a point in favour of the Roman Catholic. The hon. Member for Mayo desires to see a body of Judges who would administer law in conformity with popular feeling. The difficulty of doing that in some parts of Ireland is to maintain any law at all. In Ireland I should always be in favour of extending the jurisdiction of the paid Magistracy at the expense of the jurisdiction of the unpaid; but I do not believe, and the Home Secretary, I am sure, does not believe, that the cause of justice in Ireland is likely to be materially improved by the policy of recklessly appointing persons who are to administer the law in conformity with popular feeling. Coming to the case of England, I cannot do better than recall the observations which fell from the Seconder of the Motion, the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. A. C. Morton) yesterday, as to the effect of the system of appointing Magistrates. The hon. Member, and Member after Member on his own side belonging to the Labour Party, got up and told the House that the whole administration of justice with regard to the series of cases arising out of labour disputes in Cardiff, in Bristol, and in Hull has absolutely brought that administration into contempt, because it has been left to Magistrates appointed in the manner which the Motion of the right hon. Baronet commends to the House. Whatever may be said of the County Magistrates of this country, I do not believe that for 50 years any accusation has been made against them at all comparable to the accusations which have been made against the Borough Magistrates in this House only 24 hours ago. What do the Home Secretary and those who agree with him aim at? The Home Secretary has told us that if only the political balance were redressed as between the two Parties, he would allow matters to rest, and there would be a truce. But because the political balance has not been redressed—except, indeed, by the energetic efforts of the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. J. Bryce)—because the balance has not been redressed except in one happy county (Lancashire), the right hon. Gentleman proposes to shatter the existing system from top to bottom and to call wholly new machinery into being in its place. But how long would this truce last if it were established? In 1886 it pleased hon. Gentlemen opposite to make great changes in their political creed, and, as a consequence, a great many Magistrates who up to that time belonged to their Party, now belong to the Unionist Party. Are we to understand that every time the Liberal Party choose to estrange a great body of educated opinion they are going to invent and set in motion new machinery until, to use the happy phrase of the Home Secretary, the balance has been again redressed? That phrase is enough by itself to dispose of the soft statements of the right hon. Baronet, who was moderation itself. The right hon. Baronet did not mention any desire to “redress the balance”; but now it has come out through the incautious utterance of the mouthpiece of the Government that the object is not to improve the administration of justice, but to increase the patronage of the Radical Party. The right hon. Gentleman says that, on the whole, he has not much to complain of in the action of the Magistrates in England; but that there are certain matters entrusted to them of such difficulty and delicacy, and so seriously affecting their own personal interests, that it is absolutely necessary to take the recommendations out of the hands of the Lord Lieutenants, and the right hon. Gentleman instances specially the question of poaching. Now, is there a human being in this House, acquainted with country life, who believes that the law relating to poaching would be more justly administered by Stipendiary Magistrates than it is at present? [Cries of “Yes!” and “Hear, hear!”] I do hon. Members who cried “Yes” the justice of believing that they spoke from ignorance, and not from prejudice. I am certain, at this moment—whatever may have been the case two generations ago—the fact that so many of the Magistrates who have to adjudicate in poaching cases are drawn from the land-owning classes tends, not to the severer administration of justice, but, on the contrary, to a more lenient administration. [Ministerial laughter, cries of “Oh!” and cheers.] I do not believe that that statement will be seriously traversed by any hon. Gentleman of competent knowledge. I now pass—for I can only speak for a few moments more—to a consideration of the substance of the Resolution proposed by the right hon. Baronet. The right hon. Baronet recommends this Resolution on the ground that politics should not enter into the selection of Magistrates; but does he mean that those who are appointed should not necessarily be connected with politics? I agree that these appointments ought never to be made on political grounds; but the Government are ensuring henceforth that they shall always be made on political grounds. You ensure that henceforth they shall always be made on political grounds. The right hon. Baronet says that the Lord Chancellor is to have other channels of communication than the Lords Lieutenant of the counties. What other channels? Well, Sir, we all know what the other channels are. They are to be the local wirepullers of the Party in power; the other channels are to be every Member of the House who wants to do a kindness to a man who has helped him in his election. I do not make that statement merely with reference to hon. Gentlemen opposite. They have no special or peculiar monopoly of jobbery. I make no imputation of that kind, but I say while it is in the experience of every man in the House who has applied to a Lord Lieutenant to make a political appointment that he is likely to get well snubbed for his pains, every one is equally aware that if such an application is made to a Member of the Government obliged to conciliate the feelings of the Party behind him, and who is forced to think of the result of elections in dubious constituencies—an appointment of that kind made with those recommendations will be what the present appointments as a whole are not—namely, political appointments. I do not know whether the House has noticed that the Resolution of the right hon.

Baronet is of a purely negative character. He tells us that the existing system is to be done away with, but he does not tell us what system is to be substituted. What does that mean? Earlier in the evening the right hon. Baronet the Member for Gloucestershire said he believed that if this Resolution were carried it would ultimately lead to the destruction of the existing system of Magistracy in England, and that statement was received with enthusiastic approval by hon. Gentlemen opposite. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes; but if you want to destroy the system have the courage of your opinions, and tell the House what the system is which you wish to substitute for it. For my part, if you come down to this House and say that you think, as labour questions are coming to the front, and that even on general grounds you prefer a Stipendiary Magistracy to the existing unpaid Magistracy, I should not agree with you as a whole; but I should see very great force in your argument. But I would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he would like to find £500,000 a year to pay for this Magistracy, and I might even feel called on to comment on the extraordinary cost which appears always to attend Radical reforms. But at least I should understand your policy. I should go further, and should have in many respects great sympathy with it. But that is not what you are doing. You have not the courage to attack the Magistracy; you want to make it look ridiculous—and, if I rightly interpret the cheers with which the right hon. Baronet's speech was received, you want to make it ridiculous for the purpose of ultimately destroying it. That is not statesmanship. That is not the way to deal with an institution which has existed for 600 years in this country, and which through these centuries has given, on the whole, great satisfaction. It is not the way to deal with a method of administering justice which I believe has the confidence of the people as a whole. Your plan, to put it shortly, is this: you wish to turn the patronage of the Bench of Magistrates in England into a wheel in your general electioneering machine. I object to that. Destroy the Magistracy if you will, but destroy it by legislation after full discussion, with the assent of the Representatives of the people having the whole matter before them. But do not attempt this extraordinary expedient by which you will throw upon a political officer duties which he himself repudiates, and which he is ill-qualified by his position to perform. Do not take away duties from men who undoubtedly, with all shortcomings, have, on the whole, performed these duties well; and, above all, do not destroy a great system of administering local justice throughout the country until you are prepared to come forward and propose to us a system which you desire to substitute for it.

*MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) [Loud cries of "Divide!"] said, that a considerable part of the opposition to this Motion arose from misconception. First of all, the right hon. Member for Gloucestershire—[cries of "Divide!"—] who spoke with great authority on county questions, was, he thought, mistaken when he assured the House that there was no dissatisfaction with the present system. [Cries of "Divide!"] He wished to speak because he took an interest in this matter, and had himself received hundreds of letters on the subject from County Councils and other Public Bodies in Wales and in England, and even from Conservative Clubs, complaining of the present system of appointment of Magistrates. [Cries of "Divide!"] The right hon. Gentleman who was formerly responsible for the administration of the Government of Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was, he thought, mistaken in saying that this was a strong proceeding on the part of Her Majesty's Government, because, as he (Mr. Dodd) understood the matter, the Resolution did not in any respect change the law, but merely asked that the Lord Chancellor should enforce it; and everyone who went to the trouble of understanding the question knew that the appointment of Magistrates rested with the Lord Chancellor alone. [Interruption.] It was because they were attacking a class that these interruptions were made. [Cries of "Divide!"] He had received a letter from a gentleman, who said he had never been made a Justice of the Peace because he was an advanced Liberal, notwithstanding that he had twice been returned to Parlia-

*MR. SPEAKER intervened, requesting that the hon. Member might be allowed a hearing.

MR. DODD said, that in the Division he represented there were 36 Magistrates, of whom one only was a declared Liberal. The same thing occurred in all the other Divisions of Essex—politics and social status, not fitness, were the present qualifications—and that was why one of the Conservative Members for Essex had joined in the crusade against the present mode of appointing Magistrates. He could give, but he did not propose to do so, letters from all parts of England where Nonconformists and Liberals had been excluded from the Bench. [Prolonged Interruption.] In Merthyr Tydfil, in Wales, there were eight Magistrates, seven of whom were Tories and one Liberal, and yet it returned two Liberals to this House, the lowest Liberal poll having been 11,756, while the defeated Tory polled only 2,304. [Cries of "Divide!"] Could they imagine a greater scandal? [Loud cries of "Divide!"] He recognised fully that the time had gone by for speaking on this matter. [Cries of "Divide!" and Interruption.] He knew that they had now to proceed to a Division, and felt confident that as a result this scandal would be put an end to.

MR. H. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) (who rose amid loud and continued cries of "Divide!" and Interruption) was understood to say that his chief ground of objection to the Motion was that it was a purely negative proposal. [Cries of "Divide!"]

*MR. SPEAKER intervened to obtain a hearing for the hon. Member, but to no purpose.

MR. HOBHOUSE was further understood to say that the result of carrying the Resolution would be that the County Bench would be packed at one time with Liberals and at another time with Conservatives. It would deteriorate the Bench and overload the hands of responsible Ministers.

*MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) (who rose amid cries of "Divide!") said, they had only ten minutes more, and it would not, perhaps, be too great a strain upon the House, in dealing with a subject which every one admitted was one of the greatest practical importance, if the time was devoted quietly to the consideration of the proposal before the House. He had a great difficulty in discovering for himself how he should vote on this Resolution. If any one were to suggest for the first time that the administrators of justice in each county should practically be intrusted to the selection of one man, chosen, perhaps, early in life, upon the development of whose character and opinions no one could speak with any certainty at the time of his appointment, that would be considered a proposal too ludicrous to be adopted. On the abstract question it was impossible to say that the present system was not open to the severest criticism, and he was free to confess also that too often the practical application of the system had been found wanting. There were to be found amongst the Lords Lieutenant of Counties some gentlemen who, not dishonestly, but from the force of prejudice, the preoccupation of their minds, or the bias of their inclinations, were able to discover judicial qualities only in those who agreed with them in political life. That was not a fault confined to Lords Lieutenant—from what had happened during the past few minutes it was evident that it prevailed amongst Members of Parliament. But what were they to adopt in exchange for the present system? An Amendment had been placed on the Paper suggesting a definite principle for the protection as much as for the guidance of the Lord Chancellor, if he should dispense with the recommendations of Lords Lieutenant, and the right hon. Gentleman (Sir. C. Dilke) had expressed his sympathy with that Amendment, but could not adopt it because it did not meet with the approbation of his friends.

*SIR C. DILKE said, that the Resolution correctly conveyed the opinion of his hon. Friends, who thought that the Amendment might be misapprehended.

MR. COURTNEY said, this was strange distrust. The Amendment expressed their own minds, but they were not sure that it expressed the minds of their friends. What was this but an unconscious confession that in the minds of some there lurked the feeling that Magistrates should be appointed, not on grounds of personal fitness, but as the reward of political support. He was sure the present Lord Chancellor, and he believed all Lords Chancellor, would beg protection against the pressure that would thus be put upon them. He hesitated to accept a proposition involving this danger. As the Prime Minister had often contended, voting against the Amendment to the Question that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair was only voting for the Previous Question. If the right hon. Gentleman (Sir C. Dilke) was not able to disavow, as he frankly admitted he was not, on the part of his hon. Friends, this suggestion of partisanship, though he himself was personally against it, then he (Mr. Courtney) considered himself justified in voting for the Previous Question. [Cries of "Divide!"] He had heard the Prime Minister use that argument scores of times. It was a good argument, and it would prevail with him on this occasion.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 240; Noes 293.—(Division List, No. 66.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): Mr. Speaker—

*SIR C. DILKE: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that the Question be now put.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): Do not divide.

MR. SPEAKER: I was about to put the Motion for the closure, but if there is no necessity for it I will not do so.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the appointment of County Magistrates should no longer be made by the Lords Chancellor of Great Britain and Ireland for the time being only on the recommendation of the Lords Lieutenant.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 8th May 1893.

Several Lords—Took the Oath.

MILITARY LANDS (PROVISIONAL ORDERS) BILL.—(No. 74).

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord SANDHURST), in moving the Second Reading, said, the Bill was merely to confirm certain Provisional Orders under the Military Lands Act, 1892.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Sandhurst.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

CANAL RATES, TOLLS, AND CHARGES PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS.

Commons Message considered (according to order).

LORD PLAYFAIR moved that this House do concur in the following Resolution communicated by the Commons—namely :—

"I. That Bills of the present Session to confirm Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade, under the 'Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888,' containing the Classification of Merchandise Traffic, and the Schedule of Maximum Rates, Tolls, and Charges applicable thereto, be referred to a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons."

He said this was practically the same Resolution as had been passed by the House of Lords for the last two years to consider Railway Provisional Orders under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888. The only difference was that on this occasion there were five Canal Bills to be referred to the Joint Committee instead of Railway Bills.

Motion agreed to, and a Message ordered to be sent to the Commons to acquaint them therewith.

VOL. XII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

BARBED WIRE FENCES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD MONKSWELL said, this Bill proposed to give power to Local Authorities having the control of highways to order the removal by occupiers of land of barbed wire fences so placed as to be dangerous to men or animals passing along such highways. If the barbed wire fences were not removed within the time specified in the order—namely, not less than one month and not more than six—a Court of Summary Jurisdiction might direct their removal. Clause 5, which related to fences over which wire was placed for the protection of property under the Act, might require amendment, as it hardly appeared well drafted as it stood. The Bill, he should mention, was not a Government measure, and he merely took it in hand to oblige a private Member of the House of Commons. He would also mention that "highways" in an Act of Parliament included footways, unless the contrary was expressed. When the Bill went into Committee it might, perhaps, be well for the benefit of occupiers and the public that a definition of "highways" should be given. He begged to move the Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Monkswell.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, his objection to it was that it dealt with a matter which ought to be left for proceedings under the existing Common Law. In Scotland a judicial decision in reference to highways had been acted upon ever since 1886. He thought it unwise that Bills should be introduced by private Members dealing with matters falling within the ordinary Common Law. This measure was introduced originally in a different form—namely, that any person might serve notice on an owner or occupier on whose lands barbed wire fence was erected requiring its removal within a month, and that in default the Local Authority might remove it and recover the cost of doing so from the owner or occupier. Its form was now very much changed, but these matters had much better be left to be dealt with by the ordinary law. Whether he should divide the House on his Motion to reject the Bill would depend very much upon the opinion their Lordships might express. In Scotland it had been decided that a barbed wire fence adjacent to a road must have the barbed wires on the inside towards the land it was to protect, and that the posts must not be more than a reasonable distance apart, which had been held, he believed, by the Courts to be something like 80 feet.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months").—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

*LORD THRING earnestly hoped their Lordships would read the Bill a second time, for it involved a much greater principle than at first appeared, expressed in an old Latin phrase which might be stated in English that "you must so deal with your property as not to injure others," and which involved the moral duty of "doing to others as you would be done by." Nothing was more calculated to destroy the amenities of country life than these barbed wire fences placed along highways and public footpaths. What reason was there why a child wandering along the roadside picking cowslips and blackberries should be liable to have its hands lacerated and its clothes torn by these fences, or why people walking along the highways and footpaths should run the risk of being dangerously hurt by them? There were no uglier wounds than those made by these fences. In regard to animals again, could anything be more shocking than to see a dog coming out of them torn and perhaps blinded? It was not right to expose hounds to such dreadful suffering. Plenty of means of protecting property existed without resorting to so barbarous a system. The noble Earl (Lord Camperdown) had said the existing Common Law remedy was sufficient in cases of injury occurring. What was the remedy? If an action were brought the lawyer would argue "contributory negligence," that the person had walked too near the fence, and so on. Was it fair to tell people, who suffered injury in walking along a road or footpath, which they had been in the habit of using daily, that they might bring actions? Then it was said an indictment might be brought, but their Lordships knew what that meant. There was, in fact, no practical remedy but that proposed by this Bill. As to the remedy by indictment, their Lordships knew that the sanitary laws had entirely failed so long as the remedy for nuisance was only by indictment. He believed that shutting up public footpaths did more real harm to the interests of property than all the Socialistic speeches which might be made in a century. These fences really interfered with the heritage of the stranger. Was not a wayfarer to be allowed to lie down by the roadside without fear of being injured by those horrible wires? This was, in his opinion, a most righteous Bill, and he hoped their Lordships would assent to it.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, the speech their Lordships had just listened to was not merely in support of the Bill, but in favour of the abolition of barbed wire fences altogether. He had had experience in these matters at the Aberdeenshire County Council. They had been told what the law in Scotland was under the decision of President Inglis as to putting up barbed wire fences along the roadsides; and he had brought forward a motion at the County Council that steps should be taken for their abolition; but it was pointed out that though sheep might suffer by having their wool torn in these fences, barbed wire was necessary in some parts of the country to keep the wild Canadian animals, imported by some proprietors and tenants, from invading their neighbours' lands: those animals were only kept in the fields by that means. He only mentioned that to show that there were two aspects to this matter. This was not only a question of the footpaths in suburban districts of London or Surrey, but it was one of considerable importance to farmers in the North and in rural districts throughout the country where, in many instances, these barbed wire fences were a necessary protection for the fields. If this Bill were passed the House would be setting up a most invidious distinction in regard to what was dangerous to persons or to animals. Notices would be served upon people who put up these defences to their crops, and if no attention was paid they would be hauled up before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. Thus an endless source of litigation would be provided. He had never read a more loosely-drawn clause than Clause 3 of the Bill. Who was to decide whether the fence was dangerous or not? And why should an occupier be called upon to come forward and prove that it was not dangerous? It seemed to him they would be putting into the hands of certain individuals a means of annoying one another, which would lead to no good at all. If the use of barbed wire were to be stopped altogether, by all means let a Bill be brought in to abolish it; but this Bill was only leaving the door open for the Courts to decide whether or not what a man was doing for the protection of his property was dangerous to animals or not—a question which it would not be very easy, perhaps, to decide.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I cannot say that I see any harm in this Bill. I believe it is in accordance with the law of Scotland, but I must protest against the strong language which has been used by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Thring), who got up an amount of feeling which I should not have thought possible on the iniquity of barbed wire fences. I am afraid I am guilty of having erected lately many miles of barbed wire. The real truth is that in the wild districts of Scotland and in the North of England there are large farms which have to be fenced, and there are no other means of fencing so effectively and so cheaply as by using this wire. Where you have heavy animals to deal with, their mere leaning against fences is sufficient to break them down, and the barbed wire is not put there to lacerate the animals, still less to tear the hands and clothes of people who pass by. It is simply to give notice to the heavy horses and cattle that if they press against that wire it will have the effect of hurting them. There is no doubt that the barbed wire has a most protective effect in preventing horses and other heavy animals leaning against and breaking down fences. I believe it is not in the least with the design of preventing human beings passing, but simply for the purpose of preventing the egress of animals from the fields, and for that purpose it is necessary. I quite agree with my noble Friend opposite that landlords ought not to erect such fences where they can be injurious to human beings; but I cannot understand how either man or beast properly using a roadway can come against a barbed wire fence. If a horse tries to leave a field, he may, no doubt, come against the fence; and if he succeeded in getting out, he would, in many districts in Scotland and parts of England, probably go over a steep bank into the sea. At the same time, my Lords, there appears to me to be a perfectly good remedy for any injury that may be done, as the Sheriff has power to move in the matter.

LORD HALSBURY: I doubt very much whether this Bill, beyond proposing to provide by a new Statute a new remedy, goes beyond the law as it is now, either in Scotland or in England. Of course, no one is entitled to put up along a highway, either to prevent trespass or otherwise, anything which will cause injury to man or beast. That, I believe, is the law. But if the Bill were read a second time, and words which I will venture to suggest were introduced, they will probably get rid of any objection. The object is not, I take it, to create a new offence, but only to create a cheaper and more easy and convenient remedy than the present procedure by indictment. I observe that some effort has been made to define "highways," and I expect, when you come to deal with that in a Court of Law, you will find some difficulty; but if you were to add the words "so as to create a nuisance," after that which constitutes the offence, the law would remain as it is now, and that which is the object of the Bill simply would remain—namely, to give a cheaper and more efficient remedy than existed before.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HERSHELL): My Lords, I quite agree with my noble and learned Friend that this does not alter the substance of the law. I apprehend that you would very well define one form of nuisance as putting up a fence adjoining a highway which would make the highway dangerous to persons properly using it. That, undoubtedly, would be a nuisance in point of law. But the noble Earl who moved the rejection of this Bill seemed to think that, as that might now be left to be established in a Court of Law, that was a conclusive answer to those who desire to deal with the matter by legislation and to pass this measure into law. It is quite true that that Common Law right to have the nuisance got rid of may be enforced by indictment; but everybody knows what the nature of a remedy of that description is, and how inconvenient it is. Surely if it be a right which those passing along the highway have to be guarded against a nuisance of this description, if the existing law is so cumbersome and so inconvenient that by reason of the trouble and expense that would be caused their rights cannot be asserted, that is an occasion when it would be more reasonable and right that you should provide a simple process for enforcing the law. That is all this Bill proposes, and, though it may be open to amendment in Committee, for that reason I support the Second Reading.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, after what had been said, would not put their Lordships to the trouble of dividing.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Original Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

INDIA—CASE OF MR. PHILLIPS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY called the attention of the House to the inconveniences of uniting executive and judicial functions in the same person in India; and asked the Secretary of State for India what notice had been taken by the India Government, or by himself, of the conduct of Mr. Phillips, District Magistrate of Mymensing, as set forth in the Resolution of the Bengal Government of 31st December, 1892, and of the conduct of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal in respect thereof; and moved for the Government Letter, No. 810, J.D., dated 5th October, 1892, to the address of Mr. Phillips, and the explanation submitted by him to Government. He said, that the case which he was going to bring before the House was a good example of the evils arising from the fusion of Executive and Judicial powers in India. It would be obvious that when the same person acted as police officer, Magistrate, and Judge justice could not be administered satisfactorily. From the outset the Indian National Congress had urged the necessity of reforming this state of things. If nothing had been done yet, it was partly due to the penury of the Indian Treasury; but, at the same time, if any people had a right to expect a good and sufficient Judicial system, it was the people of Bengal, where the suitors' fees pay for the whole, or nearly the whole, administration of justice in India. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for India might remember that he (Lord Stanley of Alderley) asked his attention to this subject and to Chief Justice Sir Richard Garth's Minute on it in July, 1884. He did not ask his noble Friend what had been done in the matter, since the fall of the rupee accounted for nothing having been done, but he mentioned it because it ought not to be forgotten, and because it added weight to the claim for reform of the Judicial Body. There was a Raja living at Mymensing; he had had a good English education, mixed freely in English society; he had spent large sums in works of public beneficence; not long ago he gave over a lakh of rupees for waterworks in the principal town, when the Lieutenant Governor, Sir Charles Elliott, declared that this Raja "was the leading benefactor of the district." He had also subscribed to most of the Viceroys' funds. This, however, did not avail to protect him, for last year he suffered a terrible disgrace; he was prosecuted under the Penal Code, and placed in the prisoners' dock, to stand there side by side with a common criminal. He had not yet told their Lordships what was the offence for which he was prosecuted; it was as described by Sir Richard Garth, formerly Chief Justice at Calcutta, in his article in India of 1st February last—

"The Raja was erecting a palace at Mymensing, and in building the outer wall of his compound he had inadvertently closed a small drain, which, in the rainy season, helped to carry off the water from the adjoining property. Upon his attention being called to this by the Municipality, the Raja at once proposed to build a more substantial drain at a cost of some Rs. 4,000, of which he had actually paid Rs. 1,000 in advance, and had been thanked for his kindness by the Municipality."

Lord Herschell

A similar case happened in this country, and last February Mr. A. Chamberlain questioned the Home Secretary as to the case of a Mr. Sankey whose chimney had been on fire; he had sent his clerk and solicitor to pay any fine that might be imposed, but the Magistrate had issued a warrant for his arrest. Mr. Asquith said that such a course was not usual in the Metropolitan Police Courts, and he concurred with the view of the Metropolitan Courts. Owing to the Raja being away on a shooting expedition, this work was not commenced as soon as it should have been; and Mr. Phillips, who knew of the arrangements made by the Raja and the Municipality, here intervened, and ordered his Deputy to try the Raja under the Criminal Law for a nuisance and malicious mischief, although no complaint had been made by the health officer. The Raja was eventually acquitted of both offences; but the trial, which might have been concluded in a few hours, was protracted to several days, so as to put the Raja to the expense of some £2,000 for counsel, &c. In addition to what he had already mentioned, Mr. Phillips was guilty of the following irregularities—during the trial he sent a posse of policemen with rifles and a number of labourers, who forcibly broke down the Raja's walk of inclosure and re-opened the drain. He constantly interfered with his Deputy during the trial of the case, and directed his action. This Deputy Magistrate was very much to blame, but as he appeared to have acted under compulsion of the District Magistrate he would not mention his name. The Raja appealed on the 6th August last to the Sessions Judge, who in the course of the proceedings said that Mr. Phillips

"Had acted improperly in writing to him while the appeal was pending."

He would now read to the House the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, Sir Charles Elliott's, opinion of Mr. Phillips' conduct, as published in a Resolution of the Bengal Government dated 31st December—

"In regard to all judicial matters connected with this case, the Lieutenant Governor accepts the decisions of the High Court and of the District Judge of Mymensing as final, and he has confined his consideration of the Raja's Memorial and of Mr. Phillips' explanation to those points on which Mr. Phillips' good faith and discretion have been impugned.

"2. In respect of the latter question whether a sound discretion was exercised or not, Sir Charles Elliott must at once say that he considers that the prosecution of the Raja need not have been instituted. Looking to the position and the status of the Raja Bahadur in the district, to the fact that the Raja has been honoured by Government, and has been a great benefactor of the town of Mymensing, it was the obvious duty of the Magistrate of the district to have exhausted every means in his power of amicably settling a matter of such a nature as the obstruction of a drain before resorting to the extreme measure of prosecuting the Raja in a Criminal Court; and it does not appear that he did exhaust all such amicable measures, or even accept them when proffered. Mr. Phillips' indiscretion was aggravated by the fact that he instituted the prosecution of his own motion without consulting any medical authority or sanitary expert, and without any complaint having been made to him, that the filling up of the drain had caused a nuisance. His subsequent procedure was not less unwise. After the prosecution had been instituted, but before proceedings had been taken in Court, the Raja arranged with the Municipality to construct a main drain to carry off the water which had been obstructed, and actually deposited Rs. 1,000 with the Chairman for this purpose. The Municipal Commissioners in meeting then thanked the Raja for his action. Mr. Phillips did not, however, withdraw from the prosecution, but recorded an order that he would do so if the Raja would knock down the wall which obstructed the drainage, re-open the obstructed drain all along the bye-lane, and then build the main drain above referred to. Moreover, after the prosecution had commenced, although the counsel for the Raja proposed in Court to make a temporary drain within a week to carry off the water and then to complete a main drain according to any plan which might be approved, and although it appears that the Chairman of the Municipality was prepared to accept this proposal, Mr. Phillips rejected it at once, and on the same day, and while the prosecution was still pending, caused an opening to be made in the obstructing wall, and re-excavated and restored the bye-lane drain. It appears to the Lieutenant Governor that throughout all these proceedings the action of Mr. Phillips was indefensible and characterised by a regrettable want of that discretion, suavity, and common sense which the Government has the right to expect from a District Magistrate of his experience in the service."

So far good, and he had now nothing more to say with regard to Mr. Phillips, as he had been removed to Monghir, and substantial justice had been done with regard to him; but he hoped that the Secretary of State would inform the House whether this had been done at the instance of the Viceroy or of himself. He said substantial justice, because it was as difficult for the Indian Government to dismiss an incompetent or misbehaving Covenanted Civil servant, as it used to be for a Bishop to get rid of a bad clergyman. It was possible that Monghir was a better post than Myensing, and that the friends of the District Magistrate might say that he was promoted; but Mr. Phillips would feel that it was not so. But the next paragraph of Sir Charles Elliott's Resolution was a perfect non sequitur, and after the censure which he had just read it proceeded to attempt to whitewash Mr. Phillips as follows:—

"3. At the same time Sir Charles Elliott is convinced that there is no justification whatever for any imputation on Mr. Phillips motives in conducting this prosecution. That Mr. Phillips was satisfied that it was his duty, and no more than his duty, to repress by all legitimate means what appeared to be a high-handed and illegal obstruction on the Raja's part, there can be no doubt. For months previous to the institution of the prosecution the attention of the Raja had been called by the Municipality to the obstruction he had caused by filling up the ditch along the bye-lane and building a wall across it; and although he had admitted his liability to carry off the drainage water therefrom, and had promised to construct a main drain, he had deliberately neglected to take any action in the matter until the Magistrate personally inquired into the condition of the premises. He was acting in wilful defiance of his own promise. Mr. Phillips was indignant with what he saw, and put the law in force. The Lieutenant Governor has commented on his indiscretion, but he has no doubt that he acted in what he conceived to be in the public interest and in good faith, and with perfect integrity of motive and honesty of purpose."

Now he was as ready to believe in the perfect integrity of motive of Sir Charles Elliott as Sir Charles Elliott was with regard to Mr. Phillips; and he was, moreover, certain and convinced of the integrity of purpose of the noble Marquess the Viceroy; but unless it were shown that the Viceroy has taken some steps to remedy the misconduct of Mr. Phillips, and the attempt to whitewash him by Sir Charles Elliott, the Viceroy would fall under the imputation of judex damnatur cum nocens absolvitur. It was said that the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal was coming to England on leave. That was fortunate, as it would facilitate the laying aside of the several unpopular measures he had brought in. He had reconsidered the provisions of the Mofussil Municipalities Bill; and the Behar Cadastral Survey Bill, which is equally unpopular, might perhaps also be reconsidered. It was possible he might not return to India, for he had been informed that he intended to endeavour to get into another place to swell Mr. Gladstone's majority. Though he might be glad if Sir Charles Elliott left Bengal, he would be sorry if a man of his undoubted energy and capacity succeeded in finding a place among Mr. Gladstone's followers; but, perhaps, if he did present himself on the hustings, the question of "Who tried to suppress trial by jury in India?" which would inevitably be asked of him, would effectually prevent his disturbing the Liberal Party as he had disturbed Bengal. He would conclude with a sentence from Sir Richard Garth, who wrote that—

"He thinks his readers will agree with him that the subordinate Magistrate who tried this case is virtually the same person who directs the prosecution."

He says—

"This is a disgrace, not so much to the Magistrates concerned, who are the mere creatures of this system, but to the Government of India, who cling to that system to give what they call prestige to the District Magistrate."

Moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for the Government Letter, No. 810, J.D., dated 5th October, 1892, to the address of Mr. Phillips, and the explanation submitted by him to Government."—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): My Lords, the first part of my noble Friend's question, which I apprehend arose from the late Lord Chief Justice's Memorandum or speech, has reference to the inconveniences of uniting the Executive and Judicial functions in the same person in India. My noble Friend was fair enough to say he did not suppose that in the present condition of the finances of India any great changes could be made in this respect. As the noble Lord has quoted from Sir Richard Garth, I am bound to state that I in no way admit Sir Richard Garth was justified in saying that the Government of India keep up this system for the purpose of enhancing the prestige of these officers. It is admitted on all hands that is contrary to right and good principle that the Civil and Judicial powers should be united in one person. That is not a matter in dispute. The difficulty is simply this—that if the present system in India is altered it will be necessary to double the staff throughout the Empire there, and it is impossible that the Government of India can find means at the present time of making this reform. Having said this upon the general matter, I hope, at the same time, your Lordships will understand that I am in no way insensible to the inconveniences which arise from the union of those two functions. As to the special matter the noble Lord has raised, the account he gave of the case is, no doubt, in the main correct. The whole matter arose about a drain, which the Raja of Myensing was liable, in the opinion of the District Magistrate, to put in order, and it seemed that the obstruction in the drain was not removed by the Rajah within the time specified. So far there is no dispute. But as to the conduct of the Magistrate, the noble Lord has read the opinion of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal on the proceedings of that official. The effect of it is that the Magistrate was, in the main, justified in the action he took by the strict letter of the law. The Raja, as the noble Lord has said, is a person of the very highest character and standing; he is a man of high position, and recognised as a public benefactor by the Government, and it is obvious that any man of common sense and discretion, in which, as the Lieutenant Governor says, the Magistrate appears unfortunately to have been singularly deficient, would not have proceeded in this way against the Raja until every possible effort to arrange the matter amicably had failed. That is the sum total, plainly stated, of the offence of the Magistrate. I do not wish to underrate it, for it was a grievous want of discretion, and a want of discretion of that kind which, no doubt, being exercised by a person in that position, does not reflect any credit on the Government. It appears to me that throughout those proceedings the action of Mr. Phillips was indefensible, for, as the Lieutenant Governor says, it showed a remarkable want of that discretion, suavity, and common sense which the Government has a right to expect from a District Magistrate of experience and standing in the service. In my opinion, the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal took a right and proper course in pointing out the faults which he believed the Magistrate had committed, and, at the same time, absolving him from the charge of having been actuated by bad motives. It is impossible over here to understand thoroughly the details of a local Indian matter of this kind. The Lieutenant Governor, on the other hand, was in a position to understand and judge the case. I protest against the notion that the Viceroy should interfere in local matters such as this. Of course, if the Raja had presented a Memorial to the Viceroy asking him to take notice of what had occurred, the Viceroy would have been bound to do so; but no such Memorial was presented. Neither the Viceroy or the Secretary of State ought to interfere in a case of this kind when there is no ground for thinking that the Lieutenant Governor has been guilty of any indiscretion. He expressed that kind of censure of Mr. Phillips which, as far as I understand the case, would have been expressed by any person holding a high position and looking fairly and justly at the matter; and in fairness to Mr. Phillips, who had conducted himself satisfactorily before, he added, knowing that motives had been attributed to the Magistrate, that he did not believe he had been actuated by anything more than a sense of public duty, though he had performed it with a great want of common sense. I see no reason to find fault with the action of the Lieutenant Governor. It seems to me to be thought that the Viceroy is bound to interfere in every local matter which may arise in any part of India, and that, if he will not do so, the Secretary of State should be invoked. I protest altogether against such a system. When you have appointed men to conduct such a Government as that of Bengal, and you find that they have dealt impartially and fairly with a case, I do not think it is advisable that the Viceroy should interfere. I am not surprised that the case has excited a good deal of feeling in India, and especially in the district; but I am satisfied that it is not a matter in which either the Viceroy or the Secretary of State ought to interfere, unless the Lieutenant Governor had been guilty of great indiscretion and want of knowledge of his duty. I do not say anything in defence of Mr. Phillips' conduct; but I say the matter has been sufficiently dealt with. I quite agree in the condemnation of Mr. Phillips' action which has been expressed, and I think the case may be allowed to rest here. I do not think it at all desirable to produce the Papers which my hon. Friend has asked for, inasmuch as the Resolution of the Government of Bengal, which states the Phillips' case with perfect truth and fairness, has been published.

VISCOUNT CROSS: My Lords, I should like to say, though I know nothing at all about this particular case, because it has only lately happened, that in regard to the main principle involved, that is uniting the Executive and Judicial functions, it is a matter of the greatest importance. It is a matter which I was anxious to deal with myself. What the noble Earl opposite has said is perfectly true—that in the present state of the finances of India it is quite impossible to carry out this improvement, which would be of vast benefit to India if it could be effected. I hope when the noble Earl has discovered some means of improving the finances of India that matter will be taken in hand. I think in this case the censure of the Lieutenant Governor was entirely deserved, and that it is very unfortunate that Magistrates should treat men as this Raja was treated, because it is absolutely essential these Rajas should know that at the hands of the English Government they will always receive justice, and that they will not be insulted.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, as far as the answer had gone he had every reason to be satisfied, and he, therefore, withdrew his Motion. This matter had excited great interest in the locality, and what had been said would allay the feeling of discontent which had been aroused. As the noble Earl had said the Papers could not be produced, he would not press his application for them; but, at the same time, it would hardly benefit Mr. Phillips that his explanation could not be produced.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

CHESHIRE LINES RAILWAY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. M'Lagan.)

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I object.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I hope my hon. Friend will not object to this Bill. It has been through all its stages, and has come down from the Committee without Amendment. I would point out to my hon. Friend that it is unusual, when a Bill has been through Committee, and has received the approval of the Committee, that it should be opposed in its final stage without any reason whatever being assigned for it.

MR. WEIR: I object.

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, that some hon. Members gave notice that unless between the First and Third Reading of these Railway Bills something was done in the matter of railway rates they would oppose the Bills on the Third Reading, and, if necessary, throw them out altogether.

*MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member persist in his objection?

MR. WEIR: I do.

Third Reading deferred till To-morrow.

MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY BILL (by Order.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now taken into consideration."—(Mr. M'Lagan.)

*MR. WEIR said, he objected to the Bill being considered. It was with extreme reluctance he opposed the measure; but it was in consequence of the failure of the President of the Board of Trade to give effect to the promise he had entered into with the House some weeks before Easter. The right hon. Gentleman promised at that time that, unless matters were satisfactorily arranged between the traders and the Railway Companies, he would take such steps as might be necessary to compel the Railway Companies to consider the interests of the traders. What had the right hon. Gentleman done in this direction? Absolutely nothing! It was true that last Friday evening he put on the Paper a Motion for the appointment of a Committee to consider the question of Railway Rates and Charges; but he (Mr. Weir) and one or two other Members objected to the composition of that Committee, and, therefore, it stood over. For the benefit of the right hon. Gentleman he might tell him he would continue to object to that Committee unless its proposed composition were altered, and that he would stay every night, and all night, if necessary, for the purpose of doing so. The constitution of the Committee was most unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it was proposed to give Scotland only one Member—England was to have 12, Ireland 3, Wales 1, and Scotland 1: he insisted that Scotland should have a larger representation. There were nine Scotch Members on the Treasury Bench—what had they to say to the composition of this Committee? How would they face their constituents if they allowed, without a protest, Scotland to be treated thus? Whilst there was only one Member for Scotland on the Committee, places had been found for four Railway Directors. With the names submitted to the House for the constitution of that Committee he and other Members, both behind Ministers and below the Gangway on this side of the House, thoroughly disagreed, and they did not intend to allow the Committee to be appointed in its present form. He begged to move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Weir.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. MUNDELLA : My hon. Friend objects to the consideration of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Bill, as it comes back from the Committee to the House, because he is not satisfied with the proposal on the Paper for the appointment of a Committee on Railway Rates and Charges. I fail to see how the hon. Gentleman finds any connection between the two matters. If all the Railway Bills before the House were rejected, it would have nothing whatever to do with the composition of the Committee. That Committee is composed, as old Members of the House know, of those hon. Gentlemen who represent the different sections of the House. The names are now before the House, and it is for the House to deal with them, and, if it is thought to be necessary to make alterations in its composition, the House will do it. But I do not see why the hon. Gentleman should oppose the consideration of this Bill on that account. The hon. Member for Peterborough has said that when we allowed the First and Second Reading of this and other Railway Bills, it was on the condition that something should be done in the matter of railway rates and charges. Something has been done, and we have proposed the appointment of this Committee to report to the House how these disputes between the Railway Companies and the traders shall be arranged. I hope we are not going to waste the time of the House this afternoon in the discussion of a Private Bill which has passed through Committee, and only comes before us for consideration. I hope the hon. Member will not persist in opposing this Bill.

SIR J. WHITEHEAD (Leicester) said that, having taken some part in the House in the discussion of railway rates, he thought he ought to say that he sympathised, to a very great extent, with what had been said by the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty. But, at the same time, he could not help saying that the course the hon. Member had taken in moving the rejection of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Bill did not altogether meet with his approval, or with the approval of those who were associated with him. In all probability, in the course of that Sitting, there would be an opportunity of discussing the Reference which had been put on the Paper with regard to railway rates, and also the names suggested. When that time arrived, he should probably have something to say upon the proposed constitution of the Committee, and also upon the terms of the Reference; but, in the meantime, he desired to make an earnest appeal to the hon. Member not to interrupt the progress of the Bill.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, this was their only way of dealing with the question of railway rates. If they allowed the Railway Companies to get all their Bills through they would then laugh at the House. He did not say the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty should go to a Division on this Bill; but he did say he had done quite right in calling attention to the matter. In his opinion, they were being played with by the Board of Trade, and so long as they gave way to the officials of the Board of Trade so long would they get nothing done. He hoped the House would have the courage some day before long to throw out one of those Bills, and so teach the railway monopolists and the Board of Trade that the traders and agriculturists of the country were not to be played with.

MR. SPEAKER : Does the hon. Member withdraw his objection?

MR. WEIR said that, after the discussion which had taken place and the statement of the President of the Board of Trade, he would withdraw his objection to the Bill; but he would warn the right hon. Gentleman that he would oppose any and every attempt to appoint the proposed Committee unless the claims of Scotland were fairly considered.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered; Amendments made; to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether there is now any objection to lay upon the Table of the House Papers relating to Newfoundland, and especially the important and satisfactory Despatch described in the telegrams from Newfoundland, which have appeared in the newspapers as having been recently addressed by the Marquess of Ripon to the Newfoundland Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The Correspondence referred to is not yet complete, and it would be premature to present it. I should, perhaps, add that the telegram which appeared in the Press on the 29th ultimo is not complete, and is, therefore, not altogether accurate.

THE CASE OF MR. SEYMOUR LUCAS, A.R.A.

MR. SAMUEL MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if any satisfactory reply has been received from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid respecting the claim for compensation from Mr. Seymour Lucas, A.R.A.; and whether further steps will be taken to obtain justice from the Spanish Railway Company, over which the Spanish Government has control, for serious injury inflicted upon a British subject while travelling on a Spanish railroad near Burgos?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): This matter has engaged the constant attention of Her Majesty's Ambassador, who reports, under date of the 1st instant, that he has now some hopes of an amicable settlement.

THE GAIRLOCH MEDICAL OFFICER.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that the Parochial Medical Officer at Gairloch has declined to act as District Medical Officer with the County Medical Officer for Ross and Cromarty, chiefly because the latter is engaged in private practice; if so, what is being done to look after the health of the population and the sanitary condition of that district?

THE LANCASHIRE MAGISTRACY.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he can state how many County Magistrates within the Duchy have been brought to his notice as Chancellor for having refused to take the declarations of members of a different political Party at election time and registration time during his tenure of office; and whether there is any official record of such cases?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The assumptions on which the hon. Member's question appears to rest are incorrect, nor would it be fitting for me to make such a statement as he asks for. There is no official record of such cases.

MR. HANBURY: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain what assumption of mine is incorrect?

MR. BRYCE: The assumption that there was any special reference to Lancashire, or to County Magistrates specially.

MR. HANBURY: Then the right hon. Gentleman had no special information as to Lancashire Magistrates when he made that statement?

MR. BRYCE: I never said anything of the sort. Such an inference would be quite unwarranted.

MR. HANBURY: I have a right to ask this question. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking as the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, brought certain charges against certain County Magistrates. Were those Magistrates within the Duchy of Lancaster or not?

MR. BRYCE : The limits of Order in answering questions are very narrow, and, therefore, I will only say that I did not bring any charges whatever. The statements I made were quite general.

THE GOLD STANDARD OF BRITISH HONDURAS.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the reasons which induced Her Majesty's Government in 1887 to abrogate the gold standard for British Honduras, and to substitute therefor a silver standard, composed of the coins of the Republics of Guatemala, Chili, and Peru, any longer exist ; and whether a decision has now been arrived at with respect to the Petition from the Colony wherein the inhabitants unanimously and urgently pray Her Majesty to abolish the present silver standard and to restore the gold standard as it formerly existed ?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON : I regret that I can only refer the hon. Member to my answer of the 13th ultimo. He will be aware that a question of such importance, presenting several points of difficulty, requires mature consideration before a decision can be taken ; but the decision will now, I trust, not be long delayed.

THE INDIAN SALT DUTY.

MR. CAINE (Bradford, E.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State has yet received a Memorial from the fishing people on the Kanara coast protesting against the prohibition of the manufacture and use of earth salt for curing fish ; and whether, seeing that the curing of fish by salt is the only means of livelihood for thousands of the poorer fishers on the Kanara coast and that great distress must result should the prohibition take place, the Secretary of State will at once communicate with the Governor of Bombay, directing him not to proceed with such prohibition until the whole facts have been considered by the Secretary of State ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.) : No, Sir ; no such Memorial has been received by the Secretary of State ; and, so far as he is aware, there has been no recent change of the law on the subject of the use of earth salt, either in South Kanara, which belongs to the Madras Presidency, or in North Kanara, which belongs to the Bombay Presidency. My hon. Friend's question will be forwarded to the Governments of Madras and Bombay, with a request that they will report whether any representations have been received or any fresh orders issued on the subject.

THE BHOPAL-UJJAIN RAILWAY.

MR. CAINE : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State has decided that the proposed line of railway from Bhopal to Ujjain shall be on the metre gauge, and that the greater part of the money will be provided by the Gwalior State, with a view to opening direct communication between Ujjain and the capital ; whether he is aware that the line already running between Gwalior and Bhopal, as well as the trunk line from Bombay to Bhopal and Gwalior, is made on the 5·5 feet gauge, thus necessitating a break of bulk on all traffic coming to Ujjain by the new line ; and if protests have been lodged by both the Begum of Bhopal and the Maharajah of Gwalior ; and, if so, is it intended to insist on the decision of the India Office to lay the metre gauge between Bhopal and Ujjain ?

MR. G. RUSSELL : No, Sir ; no decision has yet been made as to the gauge of the line by which it is proposed to connect Bhopal, on a broad gauge railway, with Ujjain, on a narrow or metre gauge railway. The Gwalior State offered to provide funds for a metre gauge line. The answer to my hon. Friend's second question is, Yes. The Secretary of State has no knowledge of the protests referred to by my hon. Friend.

THE KANAKA LABOUR TRAFFIC.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the account of an interview with Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson, in The Sydney Presbyterian of 25th March, relative to the Kanaka labour traffic, wherein he states that there is the greatest difficulty in any possible supervision of the labour traffic by the Queensland Government as it is impossible for a Government Agent to know the 80 languages which are spoken in the islands ; and whether he is aware that, in many cases, the labourers are returned to the wrong places, which involves their death, and which no Government Agent is sufficiently well-posted to prevent; and that it is the custom, when it is desired to compel labourers to re-volunteer, to bring the ship up opposite an enemy's bay, and tell the men they are to be landed there where their lives would be in danger, and give them, as a forced alternative, the choice of re-indenturing; and what steps are in contemplation to deal with these evils?

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I have read the interview referred to. As far as I can understand Mr. Stevenson's views, he is in favour of "recruiting" under proper supervision. The statements made by him in regard to the labour traffic appear to be founded on hearsay evidence, and seem to refer to the recruiting as carried on under the old system, which unquestionably led to much abuse. Papers are now being printed, and will soon be circulated, which will, I hope, prove to my hon. Friend that the conditions have been entirely altered, and that the greatest care is now taken to insure that cruelty, coercion, and kidnapping shall be eliminated from this labour traffic. I may add, as regards recruiting by foreign vessels in places under British protection, that Her Majesty's Government are considering how unsuitable practices can be prevented, and are in correspondence with the High Commissioner for the Western Pacific, who is shortly to visit the Gilbert Islands and to report upon the question after consulting with the Native Chiefs.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): Can the hon. Gentleman say when the Papers will be presented?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The printers are now dealing with them. I do not know how long it will be before they are ready, but I will inquire.

THE DEATH DUTIES.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E. R., Holderness): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state the amounts of the Succession and Estate Duties paid respectively by land and other real property in each of the three divisions of the United Kingdom?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): The figures can only be given approximately. As nearly as I can state them, the amounts of the Succession and Estate Duties paid by land and real property, including houses, for 1892-3 was £1,245,000 (Succession Duty, £1,166,000; Estate Duty, £79,000). Of this sum, about £1,020,000 falls to the share of England, about £100,000 to Ireland, and about £120,000 to Scotland.

TRACT DISTRIBUTION IN MALTA.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that recently an English lady was taken into custody in Malta, detained for 24 hours, and then given only a single day for leaving the island, merely for having distributed a number of religious tracts while travelling through the island; and whether any steps will be taken to prevent the repetition of such an occurrence?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this question. There is no truth, as far as we are aware, in the statement. In March, 1891, two Protestant ladies who had been distributing scriptural cards in the streets of Valetta were detained for about two hours in the police station to protect them from molestation by the people, who had been informed that the cards were intended to Protestantise them. Last March one of these ladies, Mrs. Lundin Brown, requested the Governor to provide a military escort to protect her during her stay in Malta with a view to the distribution of similar literature. The Governor very properly refused the military escort; but a plain clothes policeman was ordered to watch unseen to protect her from molestation should she carry out her intention. But shortly afterwards she left the island without anything further coming to the knowledge of the police.

CIVIL SERVANTS AS COMPANY DIRECTORS.

MR. FISHER (Fulham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is now the established practice of the Colonial Office to forbid the Chiefs of Departments and other highly-placed officials from seeking election as Directors of retail trading companies in which their subordinates, whose promotion depends upon their recommendation, are shareholders; and whether, in the interest of the Public Service, he is prepared to issue a Treasury Minute, whereby in future no high official in any branch of the Civil Service shall act as a Director of such a retail trading company?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The whole question of Directorships held by Civil servants was carefully considered by the late Government upon the Second Report of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments, with the result that the following Rule was laid down by Order in Council, namely:—

“No officer shall be allowed to accept any part in the management of any society or any trading, commercial, or financial company of whatever description which would require the attendance of such officer at any time between the hours of 10 a.m. and 6 p.m.”

I agree with this Rule, which is based on the principle that Government does not interfere with a Civil servant's employment of his time outside his official duties. The Rule in force at the Colonial Office, which is quoted by the Royal Commission in their Second Report, is within the limits of the Order in Council, and is, therefore, within the absolute discretion of the Secretary of State, or any head of a Department.

MR. HANBURY: The right hon. Gentleman speaks of Civil servants engaged in the management of companies. Does the Rule exclude them from acting as auditors?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: It excludes them from acting in any capacity between the hours of 10 a.m. and 6 p.m.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thinks it is a desirable state of things that head clerks in a Department should be dependent upon the votes of their subordinates for the retention of their positions as Directors of trading companies?

MR. FISHER: And would it conduce to the discipline of a Department that the heads of it should canvass their subordinates for Directorships in a Civil Service Company? That is the whole gist of my question, and the right hon. Gentleman has evaded it.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I deny that I tried to evade it. I answered it fully. I quite agree that no person in such a position ought to be allowed to canvass his subordinates for such appointments and that if in any Department such proceedings took place they ought to be stopped.

NEW STEAM SERVICE BETWEEN AUSTRALIA AND CANADA.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that a new steam service has been inaugurated between Australia and Canada, Sidney and Vancouver being the terminal points, and that the Canadian Government has promised a subsidy of £25,000; whether any application has been made for the Admiralty subvention to the steamers engaged in this service as armed cruisers; and, if so, whether any decision on the subject has yet been arrived at; and whether, having regard to the Imperial importance and the great commercial advantages of establishing direct and regular communication between Australia and Canada, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to co-operate with the Australian and Canadian Governments in promoting and encouraging the development of this new line of steamers?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): I believe the facts are as stated in the first paragraph of the question. No application has been made to the Admiralty in respect to this service. The third paragraph raises a large question of general policy, the decision of which does not rest with the Admiralty.

PAROCHIAL CHARITY ACCOUNTS.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint, &c): I beg to ask the Parliamentary Charity Commissioner whether Trustees of Parochial Charities are under a legal obligation to submit the accounts of such Charities to the annual meeting of the Parish Vestry; and, if that is the case, what steps can be taken to compel Trustees who decline or omit to fulfil their duties in this respect to submit such accounts to the inspection of parishioners?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire): It is provided by Section 44 of the Charitable Trusts (Amendment) Act, 1885, that in the case of Parochial Charities the Trustees shall deliver a copy of the annual accounts of the Charities to the churchwardens of the parish or parishes with which the objects of such Charities are identified, who shall present the same at the general meeting of the Vestry of such parishes next after the time appointed for the delivery of those accounts, and shall insert a copy thereof in the minutes of the Vestry. Section 45 of the same Act provides that the Charity Commissioners may make such orders as they may think fit in relation to the delivery or transmission of the said accounts, and that such order shall be executed by all Trustees and persons from whom the accounts to which they may relate are required. In any case in which the duty thus imposed upon Trustees is shown not to be discharged by them the Commissioners will be prepared to take steps for making and enforcing the requisite order for securing compliance with the law.

Mr. Fisher

INSUBORDINATION IN THE ARMY.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the case that during the last few months there have been several acts of open insubordination in the Army; whether the accounts of such acts of insubordination have in any, or in all cases, been exaggerated; whether any special steps are being taken to restore or improve the discipline of the Army; and whether the law provides any punishment for circulating exaggerated accounts of insubordinate conduct, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): I am inclined to think that some of the recent cases of insubordination, which have undoubtedly occurred, have excited somewhat exaggerated comment. No special steps are being taken, nor are any such steps considered by the Military Authorities to be necessary, for the purpose of restoring or improving discipline. I am not aware of any law of the nature indicated in the last paragraph of the question.

PROMOTION IN THE POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Postmaster General

whether, under the Regulations of the Post Office Department, post office employés transferred from one office to another are placed in the lowest class of the office to which they are transferred, irrespective of their classification in the office from which they come, and though the transfer may have been made for the convenience of the Department; whether, under this Rule, the person transferred, no matter what his length of service, is the junior for the purposes of promotion to the most recent appointment in the new office; whether this rule exists in any other branch of the Civil Service; and whether it is the case that it formerly existed in the Customs Department and was abolished with great advantage to the Service?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): In the Post Office the Rule is as stated in the first two paragraphs of the hon. Member's question. A contrary Rule—a Rule under which an officer transferred from one office to another should enter his new office according to his years of service—while an advantage to himself, would be a disadvantage, and, as it appears to me, an unfairness, to all those over whose heads he passed. At the same time, in the comparatively few cases in which an officer is transferred, not at his own request and not on the score of misconduct, the Department does what it can, with a due regard to the interests of others, to protect him from injury. I am not aware what the rule is in other Departments of the State.

GARRYDOOLIS POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received a Memorial signed by Rev. John O'Sullivan, Pallasgreand, and by about 40 of his parishioners, praying that a sub-post office be established at Garrydoolis, County Limerick; whether he is aware that the two nearest post offices—namely, Newpallas and Kiltelly, are seven and five miles respectively from Garrydoolis; and will he remedy this inconvenience by granting the prayer of the Memorial?

MR. A. MORLEY: Yes, Sir; the Memorial referred to in the question is probably one which I received from the hon. Member himself on the 5th instant. I will have inquiry made into the subject.

SLAVERY IN EAST AFRICA.

MR. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has any further information to give the House with regard to the escaped slave who was taken by the police of the East African Chartered Company from the protection of the British flag and ordered back to her owner by the administrator in the Company's Court, and finally released from enforced servitude by the missionary buying her freedom?

SIR E. GREY: We have received no official Reports on this case. We understand that there has been Correspondence on this subject between the British East Africa Company and the Bruce Road Free Methodist Church, in which the question, which is connected with that of the reception of fugitive slaves at Mission Stations, has been discussed.

THE IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will reconsider the proposal to charge the cost of bringing Native Indian troops to this country to form part of a London pageant to the Revenues of India, and charge the amount to the British taxpayer?

SIR W. HARCOURT: My hon. Friend should address this question to the India Office. I have no cognisance of it. It has not been brought to the notice of the Treasury at all.

MR. MACFARLANE: Has no Correspondence passed between the India Office and the Treasury on the subject?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am informed not.

MR. MACFARLANE: Then I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this matter in Committee of Supply, and move the reduction of the right hon. Gentleman's salary by the amount, leaving him his remedy against the Secretary of State for India.

THE DISPUTE ON THE LANGFORD ESTATE.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, at a meeting held on 18th April at Hay's Cross, County Cork, at which the parish priest of Meelin, Father Keefe, and his curate, Father Brew, attended, a resolution was proposed to the effect that any man taking grazing on the Langford estate was as bad as the landlord, and should be treated accordingly; and that, on the same night as the meeting, 11 armed and disguised moonlighters entered the house of a man named Brosna, who had taken grazing upon the estate; that one of the moonlighters said, "We have you now, you grass grabber," and, despite his brave resistance, Brosna was terribly beaten, had one eye destroyed, and barely escaped with his life; whether it is true that the moonlighters, after Brosna's escape, fired shots in the house, smashing the contents; whether Brosna's servants had been terrorised into leaving Brosna by a threat that their father would be murdered unless they did so; and whether he has any evidence that the outrage was a consequence of the meeting referred to; if so, whether any of the persons present at the meeting will be prosecuted?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The meeting at Hay's Cross was, I am informed, secretly convened, and there is no evidence yet forthcoming as to what happened at it. It is believed, however, so far as the police have been able to learn, that a resolution of the purport indicated in the question was adopted at the meeting, and they believe that there is some connection between the outrage and the proceedings at the meeting. At the same time, it should be stated that the police have reported that the two clergymen referred to in the question have always condemned outrage, and that their object in attending the meeting was, it is believed, to expedite a settlement between Mr. Langford and his tenants. The police are using their best endeavours to trace and bring to justice the perpetrators of this cowardly and brutal outrage. It is hoped that the result of intelligent police action will be successful in this matter.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER, who was nearly inaudible in the Gallery, was understood to ask whether there was any evidence to show that the two rev. gentlemen were present at the meeting, and that they protested against the passing of the resolution?

MR. J. MORLEY: As I have said, there could be no evidence whether they did or did not protest against the passing of the resolution, as the meeting was a secret one. The police, however, knew that they did attend the meeting.

MOONLIGHTING IN COUNTY CORK.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many cases of moonlighting, agrarian and non-agrarian, took place in County Cork between 22nd August, 1892, and 1st May, 1893, and between 22nd August, 1891, and 1st May, 1892, respectively; and if he can account for the great increase in moonlighting which has taken place in the Counties of Clare, Limerick, and Cork since August last?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Outrage Returns do not distinguish between cases of moonlighting and other outrages; but an examination of the official record shows that in the County Cork the number of outrages committed between August 22, 1892, and May 1, 1893, and falling within the category of crime described as moonlighting, is 12, of which four were agrarian and eight non-agrarian. In the period from August 22, 1891, to May 1, 1892, the number of moonlighting outrages in Cork was five, of which three were agrarian and two non-agrarian; in the corresponding period of 1890-1 the number was 13. As regards the concluding portion of the question, experience shows that outrages in the Counties of Clare, Limerick, and Cork fluctuate from time to time, and are confined to a small area in each county. These outrages have all been designated in the Returns under some one of the following heads—namely, firing at the person, firing into dwellings, robbery of arms, house attack, intimidation, or aggravated assault. The number of moonlighting outrages in County Limerick were stated on Friday as follows:—From August 22, 1892, to April 30, 1893, nine agrarian, eight non-agrarian—total, 17; from August 22, 1891, to April 30, 1892, one agrarian, no non-agrarian—total one. As regards Clare, the number of such outrages between August 22, 1892, and May 1, 1893, is 19, made up of six agrarian and 13 non-agrarian cases, and in the corresponding period of 1891-2 the number was 10, consisting of six agrarian and four non-agrarian cases.

[Mr. Arnold-Forster put a supplementary question, which was quite inaudible in the Gallery.]

VACCINATION WITH CALF LYMPH.

MR. WHARTON (York, W.R., Ripon): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in cases of primary vaccination and re-vaccination, when the Local Authority is prepared to pay the cost of obtaining calf lymph, the Local Government Board would agree to such a course being adopted, instead of insisting on the present system of arm-to-arm vaccination?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir W. FOSTER, Derby, Ilkeston): The Local Government Board are unable to signify any general agreement in the performance of vaccination with calf lymph which is procured at the cost of the Guardians. There is every reason to believe that extension of the use of preserved lymph as opposed to fresh lymph derived in the arm-to-arm system would lessen the amount of protection against small-pox which is at present afforded by vaccination. Pending the sittings of the Royal Commission who have been appointed to inquire “Whether any alterations should be made in the arrangements and proceedings for securing the performance of vaccination,” the Board do not consider it expedient to propose any change in the existing arrangements.

RAILWAY RATES FROM WOOTTON BASSETT.

MR. HUSBAND (Wilts, Cricklade): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the rate for the carriage of milk from Wootton Bassett to Paddington during the month of April was $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. higher than the rates in operation on 1st January, and that in spite of the Railway Companies' statement that the increase should in no case exceed 5 per cent.; and whether he will use his influence to bring about a return to the old rates?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): The answer is generally in the affirmative; but I have received letters from the Great Western Railway Company, dated 3rd and 8th of May, which show that they have reverted to the milk rates in force before 1st January last.

MR. HUSBAND: At what date did the company revert to the old rates?

MR. MUNDELLA: I cannot say; I shall be pleased to show the hon. Member the Correspondence.

POLICE COURT BAIL.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that Joseph Greenway, who was committed for trial at Bow Street Police Station in June, 1892, and who subsequently absconded, surrendered himself at Bow Street, on the 5th October last, that Thomas Siers, of 15, London Street, stood bail for him in the sum of £250, and that such bail was estreated when Greenway absconded; and whether, in view of the fact that the said Thomas Siers informed the solicitor to the Treasury of Greenway's whereabouts as soon as he discovered it, and thus did his best to assist justice, the whole or a portion of the amount of the bail can now be returned to Siers?

MR. ASQUITH: The facts are correctly stated in the first paragraph. As to the second paragraph, it is true that Siers gave information to the police as to Greenway's address in America; but this information led to nothing, as Greenway came over from America and surrendered himself. Siers made misleading representations to the effect that he had paid the whole of his bail of £250, whereas it turned out that £125 of the £250 alleged to have been paid by Siers had been found by Mrs. Greenway herself. Under these circumstances, the Treasury Solicitor advised that his want of good faith disentitled Siers to relief, and in this view I concur.

CO-OPERATIVE STORES AND INCOME TAX.

MR. E. H. BAYLEY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the profits of the Civil Service Supply Association, Limited, of Queen Victoria Street, were £46,700 for the year 1891, and that they were exempt from payment of Income Tax because the Association was registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Acts; whether he can state how many companies of a similar nature and similarly registered make profits of £10,000 and upwards per annum upon which no Income Tax is paid; and whether he will consider the desirability of so amending the law that the profits of such companies may bear their share of taxation?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Member has been misinformed. The Civil Service Supply Association, Limited, is not exempt, nor is any Society similarly constituted exempt, from payment of Income Tax.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN THE BALLYMENA UNION.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that some time ago a Committee of the Ballymena Board of Guardians was appointed to inquire whether any and, if so, how many labourers' cottages were required in the electoral divisions of Portglenone, Lisnagarrow, Ahoghill, and Ballyscullion, and that Committee reported that 28 such dwellings were necessary; whether any, and if so how many, have since been built; and, if not, why is it that the provisions of the Labourers (Ireland) Acts are disregarded in the Ballymena Union; and what steps he will take to remedy this neglect?

MR. J. MORLEY: I understand that the Guardians of the Ballymena Union did adopt the Report of a Committee which recommended the erection of 28 cottages in the Union, but that the Guardians, in view of the Reports made to them by the Medical Officers of Health relative to the dwellings of the various applicants for cottages now consider that six cottages will be sufficient to meet the requirements of the district. The scheme for the erection of these cottages has not yet come before the Local Government Board, who do not think they can properly interfere with the action of the Local Authority in this matter at the present stage of the proceedings.

COUNTY CARLOW POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the telegraph will be extended from Kiltegan to Hacketstown, County Carlow, in accordance with the promise given last November?

MR. A. MORLEY: Steps are being taken to carry out the extensions referred to. As the hon. Member was probably aware, it was necessary to postpone the work until the commencement of the present financial year.

ARBITRATION IN LABOUR DISPUTES.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that there are several Acts and portions of Acts still in force relating to arbitration and conciliation in the matter of labour disputes, and that these Acts are inoperative, the provisions relating to the intervention of Magistrates and Justices of the Peace being no longer applicable to such disputes now that the Masters and Servants Acts have been repealed; whether he can see his way to propose the repeal of these practically obsolete Statutes, or their consolidation into one amended Act; and whether the Government will consent, if the House so agree, to refer his Bill, and the other Bills now before the House on the same subject, to the same Committee, with the view of securing such legislation as may accord with the changed conditions of labour?

MR. MUNDELLA: If the Bill which I have introduced is referred to the Standing Committee, I shall offer no objection to Amendments repealing such of the Acts referred to as are obsolete and inoperative. And I should quite willing that the Bills introduced by private Members should be read a second time and considered by the same Committee. I am only desirous that we should as soon as possible provide legislation that will facilitate the settlement of labour disputes.

THE ATTACK ON THE REV. F. B. WALSH.

SIR ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the report in The Times of 29th April of an attack upon a clergyman, from which it appears that—

“The Rev. F. B. Walsh attended an anti-Home Rule meeting at the Town Hall, Bermondsey, but took no part in the proceedings. After the meeting Mr. Walsh was proceeding in the direction of his home, St. Anne's Vicarage. He was followed by a mob, who shouted, ‘Here is one of the d——d lot, let him have it.’ The crowd of roughs closed upon him and stoned him. Mr. Walsh was most severely and cruelly assaulted, and was rescued by two policemen and conveyed to the house of the nearest surgeon where the wounds were dressed and sewn up. Mr. Walsh is seriously ill and in bed:”

what steps are being taken to discover the perpetrators of this assault; and whether any reward has been offered for their discovery?

MR. ASQUITH: Yes; my attention has been called to the report referred to by the hon. Member. The facts as stated in the first paragraph of the question are considerably exaggerated. The statement made by the rev. gentleman to the police shows that when about half-way down Alscot Road something struck him on the head, and on his turning round he was struck on the eye, he believes by a stone. Two police officers came up and assisted him, but there was nothing that in any way could be termed a rescue, as he had not noticed that he was followed, and was not surrounded, nor was anyone near him. He has no idea by whom the stone was thrown, and can give no further information concerning the occurrence. Every endeavour has been made by the police to discover the offender. It is not the practice for the police to offer rewards in such cases.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Which of the facts are exaggerated? I am informed by the relatives of the rev. gentleman that Mr. Walsh had been very seriously injured and is still confined to the house.

MR. ASQUITH: The extent of the exaggeration will be found by comparing the statements in the first paragraph of the question with those I have just read.

THE NEW LABOUR BUREAU.

MR. ERNEST SPENCER (West Bromwich): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when he will be able to lay upon the Table his promised Memorandum on the functions and powers of the Labour Bureau, or as it is now termed the Labour Department, of the Board of Trade, and the names and addresses of the newly appointed Local Labour Correspondents; and whether he will also give, where possible, the politics of the latter?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Return was ordered and presented on the 28th ultimo. I hope it will be circulated in a day or two; I have made no inquiry into the politics of the persons named in the Memorandum, and I have no intention of doing so.

MR. E. SPENCER: Would the right hon. Gentleman have any more difficulty in doing that than the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster found in the case of the Lancashire Magistrates?

MR. BARTLEY: Is not the correspondent at Sheffield the right hon. Gentleman's chief organiser in that district?

MR. MUNDELLA: No, Sir.

RAILWAY RATES AT WEST BROMWICH.

MR. ERNEST SPENCER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, in spite of the Railway Companies' statements that they were revising their rates so that the increase should in no case exceed 5 per cent., the rates on bricks sent out from the West Bromwich district showed an increase from 12½ per cent to 20 per cent.; and whether he will call the attention of the Company to the matter?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have already stated to the House the information which I possess as regards the rates in the Staffordshire district in reply to a question from the hon. Member for North-East Warwickshire. The Company propose to receive a deputation from the Brick-makers on the subject, which I hope will lead to a satisfactory result.

THE ALLEGED OVERCROWDING OF SCOTCH PRISONS.

MR. WILLIAM WHITELOW: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, in view of the information supplied by the Fourteenth Report of the Scotch Prison Commissioners in regard to overcrowding in Scotch prisons, he will grant a Return showing the number of prisoners in the 11 largest Scotch prisons for each week, from 1st April, 1891, to 31st March, 1893?

Mr. Ernest Spencer

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The Prison Commissioners, to whom I have referred this question, are unable to discover that the information supplied in their 14th Report indicates any overcrowding in Scottish prisons. Such overcrowding, as already pointed out in the detailed reply to a previous question put to me by the hon. Member, does not exist. If the hon. Member will submit a statement to me of the overcrowding to which he refers I will send it to the Prison Commissioners; but till then a detailed Return which would involve considerable trouble seems uncalled for, and I am not prepared to grant it.

H.M.S. "WARSPITE."

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether H.M.S. Warspite is to replace the Triumph at Queenstown; and whether the repairs necessary for this vessel will be done at Haulbowline?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Yes; the Warspite will be the guard ship at Queenstown. I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on the 4th instant, as to the repairs of the Triumph, to a similar question addressed to me by the hon. and gallant Member for East Cork.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. CAINE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state about what time it will be possible for the Indian Budget to be brought before the House; and whether, in view of the large deficit budgetted for and the important debate which has taken place in the Viceroy's Legislative Council on the present condition of Indian finance and the possibility of large retrenchment and reduction of expenditure, he will arrange that two days shall be given for the discussion of the Budget?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): The hon. Member will agree with me that it is rather early for the Government to attempt to allocate a particular date for the Indian Budget at this period of the Session. I do not, however, entirely abandon the hope of taking it somewhat earlier and at a more seasonable period than in recent times had been the case. With regard to the discussion itself, I think it would be premature to attempt to determine at present the exact length of time over which the discussion ought to extend. In the view of the Government, the House will not be prepared for that discussion until the Report of the Committee now sitting has been received.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman use his great personal influence to expedite the Report referred to? The delay is causing the greatest possible uncertainty in India, and no thorough discussion can take place until the Report of the Committee on Indian Finance has been presented to the House.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I agree with the noble Lord, and if I can do anything in that direction it shall be done.

THE WHITSUNSIDE RECESS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now, for the general convenience of Members, state when the Government propose that the House should adjourn for, and re-assemble after, the Whitsuntide Recess?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is the intention of the Government to propose to the House that we should sit next as usual in point of time, but that the Morning Sitting on Friday should be devoted to Supply, and that the House should then adjourn until Monday week following.

THE HOME RULE BILL AND THE RETENTION OF THE IRISH MEMBERS.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government intend to adhere to or to depart from the provisions of Clause 9 in the Government of Ireland Bill, dealing with the retention of the Irish Members?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: If it is the intention of my right hon. Friend to ask whether we have finally made up our minds to adhere to or to depart from the provisions of Clause 9, he must excuse me if I point out that the regular and ordinary time of stating our intention is when we come to the discussion of the clause in the House. My right hon. Friend's intention must be to ask whether we intend to propose the clause as it is.

My reply to that is that we do intend to propose it, and to submit it to the House. There are a number of points of difficulty in relation to it, the merits of which we have endeavoured to set forth as fairly as we can. We will profit by the discussions, but we have at present no intention of recommending any change.

OMNIBUS DRIVERS' LICENCES.

MR. SAMUEL MONTAGU: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that drivers and conductors of omnibuses and tramcars must obtain the renewal of their licences at Scotland Yard, which in many cases entails an annual loss of a day's work or the payment of one or two shillings to a messenger; and whether he can arrange that such licences may be renewed at the police station in the district in which the licence-holder lives?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I understand that it is not necessary for a driver or conductor to attend at New Scotland Yard in order to obtain a renewal of his licence. The practice is for a renewed licence to be sent to the police station nearest to the address of the licensee, together with the amount (5s.) payable for such renewal. A memorandum is sent to the applicant to the effect that the licence has been so sent, and that it will be given him on production of his badge and delivering up the memorandum.

BORSTAL PRISON.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the grievances of the officers of Borstal Prison have been brought to his notice; and whether he will kindly promise to consider them; and, in that case, when he expects to be in a position to give a reply upon the subject?

MR. ASQUITH: I have looked into the facts in connection with the officials of Borstal Prison to which the noble Lord has drawn my attention, and do not find any ground for complaint. The Committee of 1891 went carefully into all the representations brought to their notice, and reported that, in their opinion, the hours of duty for convict prison officials were not excessive. In this opinion I concur. The system in force at Borstal is the same as at other convict prisons. I have directed a full reply to be sent to the noble Lord upon a number of specific points which he has brought privately to my attention. If the warders have any special matters of complaint, their proper course is to bring them in the first instance to the notice of the Visiting Director, who visits the prison every month.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he admits the allegations I have brought before him are founded on fact, and that the state of things entirely differs from the time tables set forth in the last Report of the Director of Convict Prisons?

MR. ASQUITH: I must refer the noble Lord to the detailed answer.

FUSSELL'S CHARITY, SOUTH WRAXALL.

MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): On behalf of the hon. Member for West Derby Division of Liverpool, I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire whether the Charity Commissioners can see their way to appoint three additional Trustees in the case of the Fussell's Charity, South Wraxall, as indicated in their letter of 18th January last to Mr. Pinckney, as it appears that is the only way the present unfortunate deadlock can be terminated?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: The Charity Commissioners have already intimated to Mr. Pinckney that they are prepared to proceed with the appointment of additional Trustees of the Fussell Charity. But, in order to enable such Trustees to take part with the Incumbent and Churchwardens in the selection of beneficiaries, it is considered to be advisable that the appointment should be effected by way of scheme. The Commissioners have requested Mr. Pinckney to apply for such a scheme, which he declines to do; and in these circumstances the Commission are unable to proceed with the matter.

THE EXPLOSION AT DUBLIN.

MR. WRIGHTSON (Stockton-on-Tees): I wish, in accordance with private notice, to ask whether the Chief Secretary has any information to give to the House with reference to the dynamite explosion which occurred on Saturday night at the Four Courts in Dublin?

Mr. Asquith

MR. J. MORLEY: I am sorry to say that I can add nothing to the information which is given to the public in the ordinary prints. An explosion took place in the Four Courts on Saturday night. It seems to have been of precisely the same kind as we had experience of in the Castle in December, 1891, at the offices of The National Press in Abbey Street, and near the Castle, in Exchange Court, on Christmas Day last. We are taking every possible measure to obtain some clue to the perpetrators of the outrage. One of the officers of the Home Office leaves for Dublin to-night. It is premature, however, to assume that it is a dynamite outrage; that we cannot state until this officer has examined the spot. The Police Authorities are not without hope of being more successful than on previous occasions.

THE VALUE OF IRISH SECURITIES.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question of which I have given him private notice, and from which I have done my best to eliminate all matters of a controversial character—namely, whether his attention has been directed to the fact that the bulk of Irish securities, especially those of Guinness, the Bank of Ireland, the Great Northern of Ireland Railway, and the Belfast and Down Railway, have rapidly and continuously improved in the market since the passing of the Second Reading of the Bill for the Better Government of Ireland; and whether such improvement is not, in his opinion, due to the confidence inspired by the immediate prospect of the better government in Ireland; and whether the Government will justify that confidence by pressing forward the Bill now before the House with all convenient speed?

SIR W. HARCOURT: These are matters about which I have no official cognisance, and I hope that the hon. Member will not, like a previous Member, move the reduction of my salary on account of my ignorance.

MR. BODKIN: These are matters of public notoriety.

IRISH EDUCATION ACT (1892) AMEND-MENT (No. 2) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. J. MORLEY : I have to ask the House to be good enough to give me leave to bring in a Bill, the object of which is merely to remedy certain minor defects in the machinery for the provision of school sites which have been discovered in the Education Act passed by the right hon. Gentleman my Predecessor in 1892. These difficulties are of a formal character, and the object of the Bill, which I will explain more fully in a Memorandum to be affixed to it, is to substitute the machinery of the Labourers' Dwellings Act for the machinery now in the Bill in certain small matters, such as the giving of notices, the publishing of advertisements, and the method of confirming orders.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend 'The Irish Education Act, 1892.'"—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Morley and Mr. Arthur Acland.

Bill presented, and read the first time.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.
(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE. [FIRST NIGHT].

Order for Committee read.

*MR. SPEAKER : There are three proposals to instruct the Committee standing upon the Paper. The first stands in the name of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, to confer on the Committee the power to suspend the operation of Standing Order No. 35, and to allow the Motion to be revived that the Preamble be postponed. The first observation I have to make is that technically it is out of Order, inasmuch as it empowers the Committee to do what I have never heard of this House empowering a Committee to do—to alter or suspend a Standing Order of the House. A Standing Order can be altered by Resolution of the House, but a Committee cannot do so, and it has never been delegated to a Committee to exercise such a power. Looking at the importance of the substance of the Instruction, I am bound further to observe that the object of the noble Lord is clearly to promote a discussion on the question of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, and he proposes to take that discussion at once on the question that the Preamble be postponed. Before 1882, when the Standing Order was passed which directed that the Preamble should stand postponed, so that it should, as a matter of course, be taken last without the possibility of discussion, great abuses had sprung up in this House from a repetition of Second Reading Debates, sometimes of great length, on this usually formal Motion on the Preamble ; and it was deliberately enacted by the House that the Preamble should stand postponed without any Motion, and be always and without question, as it was usually, taken last. The object, of course, was to enable any alterations to be made in it consonant with any alterations made in the Bill in the course of the Committee. It would be impossible to discuss the Preamble first and then to amend the Bill, as it might well be that the Preamble would not be consistent with the alterations made in Committee. That is the object of postponing the Preamble, and I am afraid it is not within my duty to sanction such a grave departure from ordinary practices as to deliberately undo the Standing Order of this House relating to the conduct of Bills in their passage through this House. This is my reason for saying that the first Instruction is out of Order. With reference to the second Instruction, standing in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for Hammersmith (abolition of office of Lord Lieutenant), I think it is competent for the hon. and gallant Member in Committee to do what he proposes in this Instruction, to abolish, if he pleases, the office of Lord Lieutenant, and to transfer the office hitherto performed by the Lord Lieutenant to the Crown. With reference to the next Instruction, standing in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Deptford, to re-establish the House of Lords in Ireland and to transfer the judicial business on appeals thereto, I think also that what he proposes may be achieved in Committee, and it will be in his power to constitute a House of Lords in any way he thinks expedient, and he may clothe it with any appellate or other jurisdiction he may think proper. On these grounds I am bound to conclude that all three Instructions are out of Order.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: With great respect, and without challenging your ruling in any way, may I put a further question? Is it the effect of that ruling that no Standing Order passed by this House for the conduct of legislation can be suspended by the House? Would not an Instruction of the House to the Committee empowering it to suspend on a particular Bill a particular Standing Order be equal to a Resolution of the House itself, and was Standing Order No 35 when passed intended to be subject to no exception, but to be absolutely permanent and unchangeable in its effect; and whether, if the question of the supremacy of Parliament is not raised on the Preamble of the Bill, on what clause and when can it be raised? The only words in the Bill which refer to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament are contained in the Preamble. I desire to repeat, Sir, that I put this question to you with the utmost respect.

*MR. SPEAKER: I did not say that on no occasion could a Standing Order be abrogated. What I did say was that I had never heard, and that I am unwilling to set the precedent, of this House instructing a Committee to abrogate a Standing Order of this House ad hoc. If such a thing were done I think that it ought to be done by distinct Resolution, and not by merely an enabling power to overrule the Standing Order conferred by a contingent Motion. The other question of the noble Lord was as to when he can raise the question of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I am bound to decide these questions only as they arise on points of Order; but I had the less compunction in deciding as I have done when I see the first Amendment in Committee on the Paper in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Deptford will enable the whole question of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament to be raised. Therefore, I think that there will be no inconvenience to the noble Lord or to the House in the decision which I have arrived at.

Motion made, and Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Legislative Authority.

Clause 1 (Establishment of Irish Legislature.)

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg to move that Clause 1 be postponed, and if I am able to induce the Government to assent to that Amendment I would then follow it up by a consequential Amendment and move the postponement of all the clauses down to Clause 9, my object, of course, being that we should commence the discussion of the Bill at that very important point in the Bill. I thought that possibly I might have been spared the necessity of making this Motion by the answer I hoped to gain from the right hon. Gentleman just now. The question I put to the right hon. Gentleman was whether he intended to adhere to Clause 9 as it stands in the Bill? Of course, in putting that question, I was not seeking to pledge the right hon. Gentleman to every letter and comma of the clause; but it embodied one of the various suggestions that have been put forward from time to time for dealing with the question of the retention of the Irish Members, and I wanted to know whether the Government in principle adhered to that proposal and intended to make it a vital point of their policy, because, if so, we are discussing the provisions of the Bill in absolute ignorance of what the intentions of the Government are with regard to this important point. If we pass the 1st clause of the Bill and declare that there shall be a new Legislature set up in Ireland, we shall do so being utterly unaware of what is to become of the Legislature of Great Britain. Well, now, Sir, I maintain that it is the custom of Governments in this House to lay their whole policy before the House, and to adhere to and make vital all the essential points of that policy. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has, I suppose, more experience of the House of Commons than any other living Member; but it will, I think, puzzle his memory to give us any case in which the Government have introduced a Bill of this considerable importance, but have kept an open mind upon one of its most vital and essential provisions. The only case which I can recall, as being in any degree a parallel, is the Reform Bill of 1867; and certainly I do not think that the analogy of that Bill is one that is likely to commend itself to my right hon. Friend. On that occasion the Government of the day, which allowed important clauses of the Bill to be altered in Committee, was strenuously accused by its own friends of bad faith; and, on the whole, the course which they adopted did not strengthen their position in this House, nor conduce to increase their popularity in the country. The point, therefore, I venture to put is that, with regard to the main provisions of this Bill, we have a right to know that the Government intend to adhere to those provisions. Otherwise we are liable, at any point of this discussion, to have an entirely new Bill sprung upon us. If that be true with regard to the main points it is exceptionally and especially true of Clause 9, because it is upon this clause, as it stands—that is to say, upon the particular principle which the clause involves—that the Government have obtained their majority in this House and have carried the Second Reading of the Bill. There are only three ways of dealing with this question of the Irish representation at Westminster.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Order, order!

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Member is not the Chairman. The first way is by the total exclusion of the Irish Members.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to Order. I desire to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in thus discussing the various ways of dealing with the representation of Irish Members in this House and in Dublin on a Motion to postpone Clause 1?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Before you reply, Sir, to the point of Order, may I explain that my object is to show the essential importance of the clause in question, and of the undesirability of allowing any alteration to be made in it by the Government, and the necessity of knowing the course the Government intend to take in the matter before we come to deal with the rest of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think that the right hon. Gentleman is in Order. I think that he is justified in bringing this forward as a reason for postponing Clause 1 and the other clauses down to Clause 8 inclusive.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish, therefore, to know whether the Committee will be in Order in discussing Clause 9 before we come to it?

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already said that the right hon. Gentleman is in Order.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have said that there are only three ways of dealing with the Irish representation. These are—(1) by exclusion: (2) by what is known as the plan of omnes omnia; and (3) by the plan proposed in the Bill. So far as regards the first of those proposals, which was the proposal of the Bill of 1886, that was so unpopular in the country that it was one of the causes why the Government of that day failed to obtain a majority, and there are hon. Members who are still Members in this House who are pledged in most positive terms by their election addresses not to accept—

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the election addresses of hon. Members constitute a matter for discussion upon a Motion to postpone the 1st clause of this Bill?

THE CHAIRMAN: I really must point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that it is difficult for me to judge of a question of Order if he continually rises to Order himself. I have already said I think that the right hon. Gentleman is in Order. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman will not go into details in discussing the clause.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The fact that so many hon. Members are pledged against total exclusion justifies the statement which I made previously—that if the Government were now to adopt that plan it would be practically a breach of faith, because they obtained their majority upon the assurance that they would not again proceed upon the principle of total exclusion. That is, therefore, excluded from their consideration. I come next to the second proposal, which is, that the Irish Members shall be retained for all purposes and in their full numbers.

In regard to that, I would point to a statement which my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury made some years ago. My right hon. Friend was then dealing with this very matter, and said, in the plainest and clearest of terms, without any qualification or addition—

"I will never be a party to allowing the Irish Members to manage their own affairs in Dublin and at the same time to come over here and manage British affairs."

That being so, and seeing that my right hon. Friend has never in the slightest degree varied that pledge, it appears to me that it would be incompetent for the Government at the last moment to adopt that plan. There remains only the plan embodied in the Bill. If my right hon. Friend, in answer to my question, had said that he intended to stand by the proposal in the Bill, I should not have thought it necessary at this point to deal with Clause 9. But this is not the position that has been taken up by my right hon. Friend, and I am therefore obliged to contemplate the possibility that, in spite of the pledges given by my right hon. Friend, and in spite of the pledges given by his supporters, the Government have in contemplation, at all events, the possibility that when we get into Committee on Clause 9 it may be altered in one of the two ways suggested. I should have been prepared to admit that Clause 9 contained an honest attempt, at any rate, to deal with the difficulty, by keeping Irish Members at Westminster without giving them power over British affairs. I do not say how far it would succeed in that object; but the clause as it stands was regarded as an endeavour by the Government to find a solution of what at one time we were told passed the wit of man, and it was on the faith of that endeavour that the House allowed the Second Reading of the Bill. Suppose the House were now told by my right hon. Friend that he intended to propose the absolute exclusion of the Irish Members, where would be the majority which he had on the Second Reading? It would be absolutely impossible, under these circumstances, for the Government to go on with the Bill; and, that being so, it is perfectly ridiculous and would be a waste of time for us to consider Clauses 1 to 8 until we know whether upon this point, which I have endeavoured to show is the real essence of the Bill, the Government do or do not adhere to their original views. Surely it is not too much to ask my right hon. Friend. The Government have had seven years to consider this Bill. From the very first they have known that it was a very difficult matter. They have pledged themselves to give, and have, no doubt, given, their careful consideration to it. As a result they carried the Second Reading on the proposals before the House, and now, at the last moment, they refuse to say that the proposal in the Bill may not be changed. Let me point out what an important bearing this has upon the discussion of the Bill. The first operative clause declares that there shall be a Legislature in Ireland. The majority in this House have agreed to that, provided that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is not seriously interfered with, is not hampered or weakened, as it would be, either by the exclusion or by the retention for all purposes of the Irish representation. I should like to know whether the vote would be the same, if it is taken on the assumption that this clause is going to stand, or upon either of the other two assumptions I have put before the House? It is perfectly certain that if hon. Members kept to their pledges they could not vote for the 1st clause of the Bill if they knew that Clause 9 was going to be altered. Then there is the question of supremacy. Upon the question of supremacy, the Irish Secretary said that if you keep the Irish Members here for all purposes they will be supreme, not only in Dublin, but at Westminster. What is the use, therefore, of our discussing the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament when we do not know what the constitution of the Imperial Parliament is to be? I quite understand that hon. Members opposite (pointing to the Nationalist Members) do not want any discussion at all to take place upon the Bill. I quite understand that hon. Members on this side, too, would like to ram it down our throats. Well, let them try. We were told at the former stages to wait till we got into Committee to discuss the details of the Bill, and we are going to discuss them—and discuss them thoroughly—until you put the gag on us. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] In spite of the ironical cheer of my right Friend, I maintain that this is a perfectly legitimate question to raise, and that it is raised on account of his refusal to give a plain answer to a plain question. We are no longer in the position we were in before. Whenever we attempted to discuss this Home Rule scheme we were told to wait until the right hon. Gentleman was in power. Now the right hon. Gentleman is in power; he has produced his Bill; he is pledged to tell the House of Commons what his policy is; and when we have good reason to assume that he is contemplating, it may be, a change of policy, we have the right to ask from him an assurance that there is no truth in the rumours to that effect which we have seen in the public Press, and which he has refused, up to the present time, to contradict. I move that the clause be postponed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 1 be postponed."—(Mr. J. Chamberlain.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I will not follow my right hon. Friend through all the details of his speech, because my duty would be to contradict almost every one of his assertions. The present proceeding of my right hon. Friend, who is admittedly within his liberty as a Member of this House without breach of Order, appears to me to be a proceeding, the adoption of which would result in all effective and practical discussion upon all Bills whatever being rendered impossible. When some objection was raised to the course he has taken, my right hon. Friend immediately proceeded to charge those who objected to his course with entertaining an intention that there should be no effective discussion whatever on this Bill. Well, now, Sir, that is an intention which I should not be disposed to charge upon my right hon. Friend as his view or desire, but it is the certain and necessary effect of the Motion he has made. Is the right hon. Gentleman justified in setting up this or any particular clause of the Bill as the essence of the Bill, and saying that no progress can be made with the Bill until that clause had been disposed of? In my opinion, there are—I will not say how many, but not less than six or eight—clauses in this Bill which my right hon. Friend might just as well have chosen as that which is the subject of this Motion, and which he might much better have chosen than the clause upon which he has based his Motion. My right hon. Friend asked that I should give a pledge to abide by all the essential points of Clause 9. Exactly so; and he reserves to his own breast to determine what are the essential points of the clause. My right hon. Friend chooses to refer to previous declarations and expressions of mine, and evidently reserves to himself, upon all important matters connected with this Bill, a universal, an infallible, and an exclusive power of interpretation. If I told my right hon. Friend that I intended to adhere to all the points which he considers essential in Clause 9, I should be liable to be thrown over by him the next morning by his informing us, with the same supreme authority which he has used to-day in all his interpretations, that we had broken faith with him in the promise we had given to adhere to all the essential points. My right hon. Friend says he does not know what is to become of the British Parliament. Nothing can become of the British Parliament at all. It can undergo no change from what it is now until some change is proposed by the Government, and until we come to the proposal of that change he is perfectly safe, and need entertain no apprehension at all. It seems to me that there are many clauses which might become with equal propriety the subject of the attack which he has made, but I cannot conceive any clause which he could have chosen with less propriety than Clause 9. I am entirely wrong, of course, because he says so, and my own poor private judgment must lurk in the shade until I receive the encouragement and guidance of my right hon. Friend. Here is a Bill which, in order to deal with it practically, we must take point by point, according to the natural order. The object of the Bill is to establish a Local Legislature in Ireland for Irish purposes. We have put that which is the object of the Bill in the forefront of the Bill. From the forefront of the Bill my right hon. Friend proposes to dislodge it, and why? Because of the opinion, widely entertained, that if a Local Legislature is to be established in Ireland, the consequence of that will be to raise the question of the modification of the position of the Irish Members in the British Parliament. How can you discuss the position of the Irish Members in the British Parliament with reference to their having a Parliament established in Dublin until you have determined whether they are to have a Parliament established in Dublin or not? I desire to avoid hard words in this Debate; but I must own I felt I could not give a complete, an adequate, and a satisfactory description of the proposal of my right hon. Friend without using rather hard words, and I shall, therefore, leave it to stand in its naked beauty. If my right hon. Friend could by any possibility persuade the majority of this House to adopt his Motion, or to persuade the minority to adopt it—though there are some doubts even about that—he would then carry us to Clause 9, and we should find it necessary to make Clause 9 a contingent and hypothetical clause, because there is no purpose whatever in discussing Clause 9 unless and until we have decided upon a Local Legislature for Ireland. What a mockery to discuss Clause 9 now! I am now showing my great desire to meet my right hon. Friend. With the hypothetical acceptance of his Motion, we should absolutely begin the discussion of a knotty and thorny clause, by making it entirely dependent upon the adoption of this 1st clause which my right hon. Friend seeks to put aside. But we pursue what we think is the rational course, and the course agreeable to common sense, in putting into the first line of the Bill the main object of the Bill, upon which every other clause of the Bill is based. What can be more vital than the Veto Clause? [Opposition Cries of "What clause?" and "We can't hear!"] I do not believe that the two or three gentlemen who are attempting interruption are adopting a mode of expression which is agreeable to those among whom they sit. All the clauses of this Bill—the Retention Clause, the Finance Clause, the Veto Clause—are entirely dependent upon and consequent upon the establishment of a Local Legislature in Ireland. I say, therefore, that in point of reason the only course for us to take is, to consider, first, whether we shall or shall not establish such a Local Legislature, and when we have determined to have a Local Legislature in Ireland, then, and not before, will be the time to consider under what conditions it is to exist, and what changes, if any, it is to bring about in the composition or the proceedings of this House. I must, therefore, object to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): Before I deal with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, may I, just by way of explanation, say that I think the right hon. Gentleman misunderstood certain exclamations which came from hon. Gentlemen behind me, who had no desire to interrupt him? It so happened that the right hon. Gentleman very naturally turned to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham, with the result that he could not be heard by some hon. Gentlemen near me; and it was for that reason, and that reason alone, they made the observations the right hon. Gentleman complained of. The right hon. Gentleman, under the excuse that the occasion is not propitious for dealing with the facts brought forward by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham, has really, in discussing this vital question, confined himself to generalities, and the value of those generalities may be judged from one of them. He said my right hon. Friend had asked the Government whether they meant to adhere to Clause 9 in all essential particulars. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham is a judge of what are the essential particulars; but the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House said, "If we give the pledge required, we may find, in adopting some alteration, we have varied the clause in regard to something which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham declares to be essential." My right hon. Friend made it absolutely clear what he meant by essential conditions. He laid it down that there are three, and only three, ways of dealing with the Irish Members, and he asked the Government which of those three possible methods they were going to adopt. He did not ask to be informed as to the details by which any one of those methods could be carried into effect; all he asked—and the request was surely a reasonable one—was that we should know from the Government whether they meant to adhere to the discredited plan of 1886?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said we intended to propose the plan embodied in the Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : My word was "adhere," and not "propose." My right hon. Friend wanted to know whether you adhere to the discredited plan of 1886, or to the little less discredited proposal of 1893, or to some possible proposal which may come on in June, 1893? Is that not a reasonable request? It is perfectly true that the Government cannot pledge itself to the details of any plan, and we do not ask them to do so. We make no unreasonable request. It is also perfectly true that the Government may be forced to recede from proposals which the right hon. Gentleman believes to be the best; but has a single word fallen from the Government indicating their own faith that the proposals embodied in this Bill are the best? We have fresh in our recollection the speech made by the Prime Minister on the First Reading, and the speech made by the Home Secretary on the Second Reading. Both dealt with Clause 9, and I venture to say the impression left by both speeches was that, whatever views these two eminent Members of the Government might have as to the merits of other proposals, they were perfectly convinced of the demerits of the proposal they were laying before the House. If the Members of the Government obviously hate their own proposals, what ground have we for thinking that they mean really to vote for them? They are merely going to toss Clause 9 on the Table to be turned and changed at the will of the House without exercising their authority as a Government to retain it in the main in its present shape, and by so doing they are absolutely preventing the House dealing with clauses antecedent to Clause 9 in a rational and reasonable spirit. The right hon. Gentleman says—

"This is a Bill for the establishment of a Legislature in Ireland; if you do not establish a Legislature in Ireland the whole of the rest of the Bill falls down by its own weight; therefore pass Clause 1, at all events, embodying that principle before you deal with anything else."

I admit that Clause 1 proposes to establish the principle that there shall be a separate Legislature in Ireland; but on the clause other questions and one especially must be raised, and, as Mr. Speaker has pointed out, that question can be raised fully upon the very first line. On the very first line we shall have to discuss the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Until we know what is to be that Imperial Parliament which is to be supreme, how can we discuss this question? Until we know what is to be the future constitution of the most important Member of the Imperial Legislature, how can we possibly discuss adequately the question of Imperial supremacy? The thing is absurd; and I venture to say that if the right hon. Gentleman will bear in mind, firstly, the vital importance of the question of the supremacy; secondly, the impossibility of discussing the question of supremacy without knowing what is to be the constitution of the Imperial Parliament; and, thirdly, the ambiguous character of his own utterances on this question, he will feel that the doubt and uneasiness with which we are beset is based on reasonable grounds; and that the least he can do is to satisfy us that the Government do mean to bring forward on their responsibility some plan to which they mean to adhere, and that they will tell us what that plan is before we proceed with one iota of the Bill. I venture to say, with some experience of carrying difficult Bills through the House, that the Government will certainly not lose time by endeavouring to meet what I think even the right hon. Gentleman will admit, after reflection, is not an unreasonable request preferred by the whole of the Opposition on this matter.

MR. J. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) said, the question was one on which the House was entitled to have something more than mere fencing. The Bill proposed to constitute an Irish Parliament, but it did something much more important than that; it proposed to alter the constitution and the nature of this House of Commons. Before they considered any question in regard to the Irish Parliament, they were entitled to know what the intentions of the Government were with regard to this Parliament; they were entitled to know which of the three alternatives the Government chose to stand or fall by. In his speech introducing the Bill the Prime Minister did not say that this principle was a vital principle; he merely said it was an important and organic detail of the Bill, and they were entitled to know what an organic detail was, and what a vital principle was. It was impossible to discuss the previous clauses of the Bill until they had a direct answer upon the questions put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. [Cries of "Divide!"]

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I rise to a point of Order. I wish, Mr. Mellor, to call your attention to the fact that the hon. and learned Member for Louth is interrupting and organising disorder. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask if it is in Order for the right hon. Gentleman to charge me with organising disorder?

THE CHAIRMAN: All interruptions are disorderly. I hope hon. Members will remember the extreme importance of this matter.

*MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask you whether it is in Order for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet to charge a Member of this House with organising disorder?

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman has made this statement. If the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes to say anything with regard to it he is perfectly entitled to do so.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will it be in Order for me to tell the right hon. Gentleman it is untrue?

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: On a point of Order, I beg to say that I distinctly heard the hon. and learned Gentleman say "Divide, divide!"

THE CHAIRMAN: I said all interruptions are disorderly. I cannot say it is disorderly for an hon. Member to say "Divide, divide!"

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That being so, I wish to submit to you, Sir, if that is the only foundation the right hon. Gentleman has for his charges, that it would be seemly that he should tender some apology.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: Mr. Mellor, I distinctly heard the hon. and learned Member for North Louth leading a chorus of "Divide!" It was not the word "Divide!" pronounced once, but a chorus of "Divide, divide!" for the purpose of creating disorder.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the charge he made against the hon. and learned Member for North Louth was that he called "Divide, divide!" That is not an uncommon expression in this House. It may not be disorderly. It depends altogether in the manner in which it is done. I think it is a very slight foundation on which to make a charge of that kind.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: The reason I made the statement—and I now repeat it—is because Members upon this side of the House during the present Session have been repeatedly subjected to interruption. [Cries of "Order!"] I have myself upon repeated occasions seen the hon. and learned Member for North Louth—[More cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN! Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to bring general charges against the hon. and learned Member. It is altogether out of Order, and I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman's experience. I will do my best to preserve order in this Committee; but in order to do that I must rely upon the assistance of Members in all parts of the House. I think this question ought now to terminate.

MR. PARKER SMITH said, that the heat which had been generated at this early period of the Committee did not seem to him the best augury. [Cries of "Question!" and "Divide!"] He was perfectly prepared for any amount of fair Parliamentary interruption; but when a question of vital importance was raised and discussed for something under an hour they were entitled to discuss it without disorderly interruption. The question that had been put was not one of detail, but one of vital principle, and it was one on which they were fully entitled to an answer.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, the Treasury Bench pretended that that Bill simply set up an Irish Assembly; he contended that it did more, and by Clause 9 proposed to alter fundamentally the constitution of the Imperial Parliament. Doubts had arisen in the public mind as to whether the Government intended to stand by the vital principle of Clause 9. If these doubts were not well-founded, if the Government intended to stand by the principle of Clause 9, why did not the right hon. Gentleman say so? Why did the Prime Minister completely burke the whole question? He thought they had a right to have an answer, and he hoped the Opposition would insist upon it.

Mr. J. Parker Smith

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 213 ; Noes 270.—(Division List, No. 67.)

*MR. DARLING (Deptford) rose to move the following Amendment in Clause 1, page 1, line 11, before “on,” insert—

“Without in any way whatever impairing, restricting, or altering the supreme power and authority of Parliament in all matters, as well local as Imperial, and over all persons in Great Britain and Ireland.”

He said he hoped the Committee would believe, although he had addressed the House on other occasions, that he felt very considerable diffidence in submitting to them any proposal whatever with regard to a Bill of the magnitude and complexity of the Bill now before the Committee. But he thought it would be the desire even of the Government themselves that anyone who could in any way improve the measure which they had submitted to Parliament should have the opportunity of doing so before the Bill finally took its shape ; and he gathered that the Government themselves were not wholly precluded from making Amendments in the Bill on very important particulars, although at present they had not been able exactly to ascertain in what direction these improvements were likely to proceed. The argument had been used that it did not become those to amend the Bill who were resolved, when it had gone through Committee, to do what they could to prevent it becoming law. He imagined there was little force in that suggestion, and he would like hon. Members opposite to apply to the Bill what a celebrated gourmand recommended should be applied to the dressing of the cucumber. This person advised that they should add a little salt, a little pepper, and a little oil in order to make it palatable and agreeable ; and having done so they should throw the preparation out of window. If it happened that those for whose delectation this Bill was served up should treat it in the same way he did not think the Government would be surprised. The Amendment he proposed was one which was forced upon them by the fact that, perhaps, the most important provision of this Bill was put into that portion of it which was not an enacting part of the measure in any sense whatever ; and it behoved the English Members, at any rate, to see that no kind of uncertainty was left upon this point, because, as he understood it, the attitude of Members representing Irish constituencies was now entirely different, and the claim they made was entirely different from what had been the attitude of former Irish Leaders and the claim they made. Former Leaders, and particularly Mr. Parnell, claimed that the Parliament of Ireland should be absolutely unfettered in every particular ; free from this Parliament, and free to shape the course of Ireland among the nations of the world. He did not know how many Irish Leaders there now were, but one and all of them had abandoned the position of the late Mr. Parnell. [Mr. J. E. REDMOND : No, no !] Well, there was one of them—and he was bound to say he thought the most influential of them—who had not abandoned that position ; and, that being so, there was all the more reason, therefore, for passing the present Amendment. He understood, at all events, that the great bulk of them had receded from the position of the late Mr. Parnell, and were content to take a Parliament subordinate to this Parliament, and which would have no power to deal with a large number of matters. That was a Parliament which Mr. Parnell certainly did not demand, and never would have accepted, because it was well known that Mr. Parnell claimed that Ireland would not take anything but a Parliament with—

“Full and complete power to arrange our own affairs, and to make our land a nation ; to secure for her, free from outside control, the right to direct her own course among the people of the world.”

That Bill did not offer them anything of the sort. It did not offer them a Parliament free from outside control, but it offered them a Parliament by a Bill the Preamble of which said the supreme authority of another Parliament should be preserved. It was because he wished that the position should be understood at the earliest possible moment, and not in a Preamble when the rest of the Bill was passed, that he desired, with diffidence, to submit this Amendment to the Committee. The contention from Ireland had always been that the laws of this Parliament were not good, because they were the laws of an alien Government. But they in this Parliament always thought they had a right to make laws for Ireland, because, in this Parliament, Ireland was fully represented. That must still be the view of Her Majesty's Government, because the Irish representation was maintained. They did not know exactly in what proportion the right hon. Gentleman would give them Irish Members in that Parliament; but they had no doubt he would give them in a measure they in England neither deserved nor desired. It was for that Parliament he wished to secure, by enactment in an Enacting Clause of the Bill, the fullest powers to make laws for Ireland, and having it well understood that if any law made by the Irish Parliament conflicted with any law of this Legislature henceforth, whether made before or after the Irish law, that the law of this Legislature should be supreme, and have precedence over a law made by the Irish Legislature. He knew that that would place Ireland in a position which few nations would accept; but the Preamble professed to do it, and he was anxious it should not only profess to do it but should do it. He knew perfectly well that it made of the Irish Parliament what, to use the words of Mr. Sheridan, was "a sort of National Vestry for the Parish of Ireland." He should not have thought there could be any doubt that it was necessary to put the strength of the Preamble of the Bill into the Bill itself, and he should not have thought it necessary to establish that contention by precedents and decisions if the Home Secretary had not said that the Preamble was quite sufficient to secure the supremacy of this Parliament without having a section in the Bill, when it became an Act, to secure that supremacy. The Home Secretary had quoted, in his speech on the Second Reading of the Bill, the words of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who had said—

"The second condition is that the local Legislative Body or Bodies to be created shall be admittedly, from the first, subordinate Bodies. If they are co-ordinate and equal, you cannot have supremacy."

Thereupon the Home Secretary said—

"First of all the continued supremacy of Parliament is expressly declared."

Then an hon. Member on that (the Opposition) side asked "when?" and the Home Secretary proceeded—

Mr. Darling

"In the Preamble. . . . Ever since the days of Lord Coke it has been well said that the Preamble is the key-note of the Statute. . . . If hon. Members were in doubt, let them bring up a clause; if they wish to make such an unnecessary declaration, let them bring up a clause to be inserted in the body of the Bill saying that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is preserved, and I think I may say on the part of the Government that the clause will not meet with opposition."

The Home Secretary said that Lord Coke had declared the Preamble was the key-note to a Statute. Lord Coke, he regretted to say, said nothing of the kind. At all events, if Lord Coke did, he did not say it anywhere where he could find it. He had found, however, what Lord Coke did say, and what he thought misled the Home Secretary, who had many other matters to consider besides Lord Coke. Lord Coke, in his Fourth Institute, chap. 74, page 330 said this—

"The Preamble is to be considered, for it is the key"—not the key-note—"to open the meaning of the makers of the Act."

He wished this key could open the meaning of the makers of the Act. There was one maker of the Act whose meaning had not been opened by any key, let alone the Preamble of this Bill.

"To open the meaning of the makers of the Act and mischiefs which they intend to remedy."

Lord Coke, again, in the same Institute, said this—

"The rehearsal or Preamble of the Statute is a good means to find out the meaning of the Statute, and, as it were, a key to open the understanding thereof."

Lord Coke's Institute had been commented upon by Hargreaves and Butler as follows :—

"Lord Coke's manner of expressing himself on the operation of the Preamble in the construction of Statutes is very observable. Instead of saying generally that the Preamble should control the Enacting Clauses, or of limiting precisely how far it shall have that effect, which would have been attempting to make a line where one cannot be drawn, he cautiously says that it is a good means to find out the intention."

Lord Coke, again, in the 1st Chapter of his Fourth Institute, had a marginal note, which was this—

"A mischievous Act, with a flattering Preamble"—

Of what was he thinking?

"A mischievous Act, with a flattering Preamble, in 11th Henry VII."

In the text Lord Coke said—

"There was an Act of Parliament made in the 11th year of King Henry VII, which had a fair, flattering Preamble, pretending to avoid divers mischiefs, which were :—1. To the high displeasure of Almighty God ; 2. The great let of the Common Law ; and 3. The great let of the wealth of this land, and the purview of that Act tended in the execution contrary, ex diametro—namely, to the high displeasure of Almighty God, the great let, nay the utter subversion of the Common Law, and the great let of the wealth of this land, as hereafter shall manifestly appear."

He might have been describing the present Bill, with its flattering Preamble, pretending to avoid these things. Did Lord Coke say that the Preamble controlled the Statute? Did he say it prevented the Statute doing harm to the Common Law, or to the wealth of this land? No; he said distinctly, in spite of its fair, flattering Preamble, it produced all the harm that it professed to make impossible and to avoid, and Lord Coke could nowhere be found to say that the Preamble was the keynote to the Statute. He said it might be a means to find out what those who made the Statute meant; but what Lord Coke said had been misinterpreted, as the quotations he had made abundantly showed. What were the words of Mr. Dwarries? Mr. Dwarries, in his work on The Construction of the Statutes, said—

"A Preamble is not only not essential, and often omitted, but it is, strictly speaking, without force, in a legislative sense; being but a guide to, and not the vehicle of, the import of the Statute (c.). And to what is it properly a guide—to the meaning of the enactment? No; but to the intentions of the framer, which is only the first stage on the road, in the construction of Statutes."

He (Mr. Darling) dared say he had not yet convinced the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. It would be necessary to that right hon. Gentleman's conversion that he should read from some American authority, or that he should quote the decision, perhaps, of a modern Lancashire Magistrate. He had not got the decision of one of these, so he would read to the Committee the words of Mr. Justice Story, which, with the Chancellor of the Duchy, at all events, would have some weight. Mr. Justice Story said—

"The Preamble is properly referred to when doubts or ambiguities arise upon the words of the enacting part. The Preamble can never enlarge; it cannot confer any powers per se. Its true office is to expound powers conferred, not substantially to create them."

VOL. XII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

The Preamble had no enacting force; it could not confer any powers; and it did not come into existence until doubts arose. Suppose this Bill became an Act, and it then came before an Irish Court with a modern Irish Judge, and it was argued that a certain power was given to the Irish Parliament. Did they think that an Irish modernised Home Rule Judge would ever have the slightest doubt that it did give that power, and if he did not, it would be useless to refer him to the Preamble. Unless they could raise a doubt, the Judge would not look to the Preamble, but in such a case he would have no doubt. They would, therefore, never get to the Preamble, and the Preamble did not come into question as an enacting part at all. It did not come into question even for the limited purpose of acting as a guide to unlock the mind of the Treasury Bench and their followers, who said on Tuesday they were going to vote against the Bill and on Friday walked into the Lobby for it. The Preamble did not come into action at all unless doubt existed in the mind of the tribunal who had to place a construction upon the Bill. He thought he had shown that if the Government were in earnest in desiring to preserve the supreme and unquestioned power of the Imperial Parliament, they were bound to do more than put words in the Preamble. Their bona fides would be judged by the way in which they dealt with the Amendment. By a subsequent Amendment he proposed to declare that any Irish Act contrary to any English Act passed after this Bill became law should be void if inconsistent with any such English Act. That was what supremacy meant. That was the way in which supremacy must be interpreted; that was the way in which supremacy was interpreted before Grattan's Parliament, and that was the way in which supremacy was bound to be interpreted if the Imperial Parliament was to remain in any real, effective sense supreme. That was what was decided in Calvin's case in the reign of James I., and that decision was acted upon until Grattan's Parliament came into existence. In Calvin's case it was decided—

"Albeit Ireland was a distinct dominion, yet the title thereof being by conquest, the same by judgment of law might by express words be bound by Act of Parliament of England."

The judgment in that case was written by the Legal Authority whom the Home Secretary above all preferred—Lord Coke. He wished there to be no mistake about this question of supremacy—that Ireland had not been made a nation, but had been created by the generosity of hon. Gentlemen opposite the parish vestry of the parish of Ireland—that it had got itself into the same position as it occupied in the days of James I. It was for these reasons he desired—relying upon the words, of which he thought there could be no evasion of Lord Coke, and of the authorities he had quoted—to do, in effect, what he believed the Government had not done—to preserve the supremacy in every single particular of the Parliament of Great Britain. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 11, before the word "on," to insert the words "without in any way whatever impairing, restricting, or altering the supreme power and authority of Parliament in all matters, as well local as Imperial, and over all persons in Great Britain and Ireland."—(Mr. Charles Darling.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not object to the way in which the hon. Member has exercised his wit upon me; but he complains of the absolute impossibility of getting at any knowledge of my intentions. It is the understood privilege of the entire Opposition to expose my unfortunate incapacity to make intelligible anything I have to say. The hon. Member has made a proposal to us, but his argument goes much beyond it. His general argument is that in such a matter as the supremacy we ought to enact. ["Hear, hear!"] I am very glad that sometimes I can make myself intelligible. The hon. Member has bound himself in the most solemn way to the proposition—he has given us his professional authority for it—that this Bill is destructive of the Common Law.

*MR. DARLING (interrupting): I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I read a quotation from Lord Coke, describing an Act which was subversive of the Common Law, but the particular part of it which I meant to apply to this Bill was that which referred to the "great let of the wealth of this land."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE; Then there are other people, besides the unfortunate gentleman who now addresses the Committee, who ought to take pains to make their meaning clear. The hon. Gentleman said that Lord Coke's words were most admirably applicable to this Bill. He says that we ought to enact, instead of merely putting these words in the Preamble. But all he does is to propose a Preamble. The words of the Amendment enact nothing whatever; they are a mere Preamble. But the difference is this: the words are a Preamble to be inserted in a particular clause, and, therefore, their effect is limited to the Preamble of a clause. Our words being in the Preamble of the Bill, and not in a clause, apply to the whole Bill, and supply what is called the keynote of the Bill. Now, Sir, I do not intend to go beyond the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member. I must oppose that Amendment, but I must oppose it on the ground that, in my opinion, it distinctly tends to the limitation of the supremacy. I believe that it was the case with regard to Mr. Parnell—I believe it might have been the case with some other Irish Members, although I am not prepared to assert it as a matter of fact—that in early days, before he had a prospect of the concession of Home Rule for Ireland, he did use large, general, and, perhaps, inconsiderate and dangerous words as to the nature of the powers that ought to be conferred upon Ireland. I do not look to those declarations of Mr. Parnell—they were not made here, or on his responsibility as a Member of Parliament and as a Leader of the Irish Party. I look to the declarations of Mr. Parnell when he sat upon the Bench opposite, when, in 1886, the Home Rule Bill was introduced, and when Mr. Parnell, in direct contradiction to what the hon. and learned Member quoted from Mr. Parnell, declared on the part of himself and on the part of his Party that he accepted the proposal of that Bill in the main, and that he said he accepted it as constituting a subordinate Parliament for Ireland. It is material for all purposes that that should be understood. The hon. and learned Member also says that, according to his view, a law passed by the Irish Parliament in contrariety to the law of the Imperial Parliament might be accepted by the Judges and might run in Ireland. Has the hon. and learned Gentleman read Clause 33, which expressly abolishes any Irish Statute that runs counter to an Imperial Statute in so far as it is counter? I come to the Amendment, and I take what I think to be the main objection to it. My opinion, and the opinion of the Government, respecting the supremacy is that it is absolutely without limit, and we do object to any declaration, or any words in whatever form, which tend to limit this supremacy. I must, therefore, object to the Amendment upon the ground that it tends to limit that supremacy, and that by the most distinct implication it does limit it. What is that supremacy? What is its range? Is it one in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland? No, Sir; it is a supremacy throughout the entire Empire. The hon. and learned Gentleman does not propose any enactment. There is no enacting force whatever in his words, which are a mere repetition, in substance, of what we say in the Preamble. He says it is necessary to uphold "the power and authority of Parliament in all matters"—very good, so far—"as well local and Imperial"—very good—"and over all persons." Where? "In Great Britain and Ireland," and not elsewhere. Then there is no supremacy in British North America, in the West Indies, Australasia, the Cape, or anywhere else, but only in Great Britain? This is the mode in which the hon. and learned Gentleman proposes to maintain the supremacy. Whatever we assert of this supremacy, we shall always assert that the supremacy is a supremacy reaching and prevailing alike in each and every quarter of Her Majesty's Empire. Therefore, it is impossible for us to accept the Amendment.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said, the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to minimise the force of certain references made by Mr. Parnell by stating that his speech was delivered not in the House, but in the country, and in the next place that it was not delivered by him as Leader of the Irish Party. Mr. Parnell had said that, speaking for himself, and, he believed, for the Irish people and for all his Colleagues, he had to declare that they would never accept anything but the full and complete right to manage their own affairs and make Ireland a nation, and to secure for her, free from outside control, the right to direct her course among the peoples of the world. The Unionist Party held that that declaration of policy was inconsistent with the policy of the Government as delineated in the oft-quoted words of the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith). Turning to the second contention of the Prime Minister—that they were not to attach any importance to the words of Mr. Parnell because they were not uttered in that House—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I did not say that.

MR. WYNDHAM said, in that case he must have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman. For his part, he attached more importance to words used in the freedom of addressing one's constituents. But, at all events, they must face the question of supremacy in the light of the innermost convictions of the Irish Members, if they could arrive at those convictions. Putting that matter on one side, the Unionist Party intended, if it were possible, to see that the Government gave real effect to the supremacy of which they had talked so much. The Prime Minister had said that in Clause 33 some such supremacy as the hon. and learned Member had described was reserved to that House, and that by that clause, as he understood the Prime Minister, any Act of that House would over-ride any Act passed by the Irish Legislature. As he read the clause, however, it only applied to those matters which were specifically excluded from the Irish Legislature in Clauses 3 and 4.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): No.

MR. WYNDHAM said, he was not a lawyer, and he hoped some hon. and learned Gentleman would be able to reassure the Committee on that point, which was very obscure in the Bill. The Prime Minister told the House that the supremacy was maintained in the Preamble; but hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House felt that it was too like chaos, without form, and void, and that it might have a protean tendency to take different shapes in proportion to the opportunities which hon. Members might have of coming from Ireland. The references to supremacy made by Members of the Government, on which they won the last General Election, and as understood by the audiences to which they were addressed, were to the effect that that House would still be able by law to provide such safety and liberty as now existed in Ireland. In respect of such pledges the hon. and learned Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond), in discussing this question out of doors, had said that they were threats. This supremacy was the only watch it would be possible to keep over the action of the Irish Parliament. The right of that House to pass laws for Ireland had always existed except during the interregnum of Grattan's Parliament; if any hon. Member had a doubt on the subject let him read the admirable work on Irish Legislatures by Mr. J. P. Ball, and they therefore had a right to see that the supremacy of the House should exist in the future without any limit. He based his support of the Amendment very much upon the argument used by the Prime Minister in opposing, earlier in the evening, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). The Prime Minister's contention in that instance was that the governing principle of the Bill should be given in the 1st clause, and the Home Secretary had said that the Government accepted the principle of supremacy, and they were also told that if anyone would frame or draft a clause it would be accepted into the body of the Bill. But if the 1st clause was the proper clause for embodying the principle of the Bill, the Unionists preferred to have it in the very forefront of the Bill. Whether the principle of the necessity for a separate Parliament in Dublin was abandoned for some other principle, and whether this Bill were to pass or not, the principle of supremacy was imperative now and must always remain imperative.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, the Prime Minister found some fault with hon. Members on a Opposition side of the House at not finding his remarks intelligible, but he thought that the right hon. Gentleman was himself to blame. On a recent occasion the House learnt that "marching through rapine to the dis-memberment of the Empire" meant the opposing of a Land Bill. He had never understood the statement of the right hon. Gentleman in that sense until it was explained the other evening. But now the right hon. Gentleman was equally unintelligible. On the question whether the Irish Members were to be retained in their present number, or the number mentioned in Clause 9, or whether they were to be excluded, hung the meaning and authority of Clauses 1 and 2. Clause 1 proposed to set up a Parliament in Ireland which was supposed to be a subordinate Parliament. If the Irish Members were retained at Westminster in their present number, there certainly would be a subordinate Parliament, but it would not be the Irish Parliament. The Imperial Parliament would be the subordinate Parliament. [Cries of "Order!" "Chair!" and cheers.] Gentlemen called "Order!" but this was a question of supremacy, and it was impossible to discuss a clause dealing with Parliamentary supremacy without taking into consideration the clause which would materially affect the question whether the Imperial Parliament should be supreme or subordinate. If, therefore, Clause 9 was changed, as they supposed it would be— [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not competent for the hon. Member to discuss Clause 9. This is an Amendment to the first part of Clause 1, and he cannot discuss the question embodied in another clause.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): Mr. Mellor, I rise to a point of Order. We have had a ruling of the Speaker on the Instruction that the question of supremacy could be raised in the largest manner on Clause 1. Are we to understand that it is now decided that Clause 9, which proposes the retention of the Irish Members, is not an essential part of the genuineness or want of reality of that supremacy?

THE CHAIRMAN: I entirely concur with the ruling of the Speaker with regard to the Instruction and with his explanations as to this Amendment. It is perfectly open to any hon. Member to discuss the question of supremacy in the fullest manner on this Amendment; but while, with regard to Clause 9, it is competent for an hon. Member to refer to it, it is not competent for him to discuss it in detail.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he was not going to discuss Clause 9, but he desired to point out the impossibility of discussing adequately the supremacy of Parliament without taking into consideration a clause which must absolutely affect that supremacy. As far as that clause was concerned, the Prime Minister had given the Committee absolutely no information. Would the right hon. Gentleman tell the Committee what amount of elasticity he would display when it came to consider Clause 9? [Cries of "Order!"] He was in a slight difficulty with reference to this Amendment—indeed, difficulty on his part must arise on all Amendments to this Bill. Personally, he should move no Amendment, because no Amendment of any kind that could be devised by the wit of man could make a Bill of that kind tolerable to him and, he believed, to the majority of his colleagues. As far, however, as he could make out the meaning of this Amendment, his hon. Friend wished to establish fair play between the Irish Parliament and the British Parliament. The Government proposed, on the other hand, that the Irish Members should have the absolute control, not only over the destinies of Ireland, but at the same time over the destinies of this country. There were certain facts clearly before the Committee as to the Irish Parliament in Dublin and the Irish Government to be created. They maintained that from the record of the men who would form that Parliament and constitute that Government the Loyalists had a perfect right, if Home Rule was granted, to demand that there should be safeguards placed in the Bill which should curb the instincts of those whom it was proposed to make their rulers in Ireland. They knew exactly how the Government would be composed and how the Parliament would be elected. Those men who were to be their future governors had left a record behind them to which all eyes were ever open.

*MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I rise to Order. I beg to ask you, Sir, if the Amendment relates to the legal supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, in what way the composition of the Irish Legislature can arise upon it?

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment is intended to establish the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in all matters, local as well as Imperial, and over all persons. Although I cannot say that the hon. Member is keeping very closely to the point, I do not think he is out of Order.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he did not see how he was to avoid this line of argument, because he and his friends had grounds for believing that the men who were to compose the Government of Ireland were not to be trusted, and that the Amendment of his hon. Friend would place a curb on the action of the Irish Parliament and Government. If a Home Rule Government and Parliament was established in Dublin the record of those men who would form it and the Executive proved this: that that Government would be a Government of robbery, jobbery, and beggary. That being their belief, it was their bounden duty to support any Amendment which would effectually curb the predatory propensities of a squid Parliament and a hungry Executive floating on whisky. The object he had in rising to speak to the Amendment undoubtedly had been to try and extract from some Gladstonian Radical his views upon this clause and upon other clauses of the Bill. But none of them showed any alacrity in rising. They had had two speeches from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister of a very light and good-humoured character, as though he had been dealing with a Parish Councils Bill or with some minor act of legislation instead of a great question which touched the vital interests of Ireland and the Constitution of the Empire. But they had witnessed no sign of alacrity on the part of the right hon. Gentleman's followers to get up and support him on the clauses of the Bill. Well, he (Colonel Saunderson) had not expected that there would be. It was a "personally conducted" Party—conducted by Lord "Cook." However, the right hon. Gentleman's followers might feel, with regard to this Amendment or with regard to the clauses which followed if the right hon. Gentleman showed his determination to stick by the clause no matter how they objected, they would adhere to it. They had a new policy presented by the Prime Minister and his followers had now invented a new "ism." [Cries of "Question!"] They had Protestantism, Mormonism, Roman Catholicism, and now they had Grand Old Manism. [Cries of "Question!"] None of the Members of the Gladstonian Party would dare to get up to express their opinions until they knew how their Leader wished them to vote. The speeches of hon. Members were of a funereal character. They all knew that this Amendment and all the discussions that would take place during the next two months or three or four would be discussions over a dead Bill. It was a sort of oratorical wake. The Bill was a dead Bill. It would be buried in August, but the discussions in the House which they had undertaken to-day, and which they would carry on to-day, were addressed to those who would give the final decision; and when that final decision came, he believed the Bill of the Ministry and the policy they had started would disappear together.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.) said, he did not intend to follow the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Saunderson) through a speech which appeared to him to be very wide indeed of the subject-matter before the Committee, nor would he follow him into the references of a personal character which he had made to the Prime Minister. If the hon. and gallant Member desired to know why the supporters of the Government maintained silence on this as on the other stages of the Bill, he would tell him. It was because they wanted to see the measure passed into law, and because they were conscious that for that purpose it would be very unwise to fall into any of the numerous traps that were laid for them by hon. Members opposite. If this Bill were to be fairly discussed in Committee by hon. Members opposite with a desire to solve a most difficult question, and with a real desire to agree upon some settlement, they would find the expressions of opinion of hon. Members on the Government side of the House much more numerous and perhaps very much more satisfactory to any fair views they might themselves entertain. He now wished to say a word with regard to the Amendment. It involved a principle on which, as he understood it, both sides of the Committee were entirely agreed. Hon. Members opposite were anxious that there should be an effective and real supremacy of the Imperial Parliament safeguarded in adequate terms in the Bill, and he understood that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and every right hon. Gentleman on the Government side of the House had expressed precisely the same opinion. The Bill contained a statement of supremacy in the Preamble, and, for his own part, he believed that, in point of law, if the rest of the measure were absolutely silent upon the subject, that supremacy would remain unimpaired without a shadow of a doubt in the mind of every lawyer and every Judge in the country. Out of excessive caution the Government had inserted that declaration of their intentions in the Preamble, and he had no doubt that the declaration would be an adequate guide to any Judge, however blind, to lead him into the right path. It was possible to move in another direction. It was possible to put a plain statement into the Bill such as was found in all Statutes setting up our various Colonial Governments, which would make the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament absolutely clear. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith) had said that the Government were willing to accept such a clause. It would have been better to have put down a clause of that kind than to have put down an Amendment which was merely a preface to the clause and inadequate for its purpose.

*SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I am sure that many Members of the Committee heard with satisfaction the declaration of the Prime Minister that the sovereignty of the Imperial Parliament was an indisputable fact. It was especially satisfactory to hear the right hon. Gentleman express as his principal objection to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Deptford that it did not go far enough. The argument of the Prime Minister was that they ought to go as far as to express this sovereignty of the Imperial Parliament in respect to all the Queen's Dominions. If the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say so, that statement of his goes to contradict his own Bill. The Preamble of the Bill does not express that. In a Bill of this kind, referring to Ireland alone, the Preamble would also be read as referring to Ireland alone. It may be said that the words of the Amendment are not the most apt words, and that they are not proposed in the best place; but the object in moving this Amendment is that, before we commence the further discussion of the measure, hon. Members shall know whether the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is to be an admitted fact or not. It should not be left to implication, but should be admitted expressly. The Preamble is not the enacting part of a Bill, and it never could be referred to unless doubts arose as to other parts of the measure. The Prime Minister referred us to the 33rd clause. In one sense he is right, because it will not allow the Irish Legislature to interfere with Acts passed by the Imperial Parliament after the passing of this Act. Still, in the course of time it may come to be thought that the Imperial Parliament has only supremacy in relation to those particular Acts. The supremacy of Parliament consists of two ingredients—authority to enact and power to enforce its legislation. Unless those two things are expressly admitted, difficulties will arise in respect of the construction of the Act. It is not alone lawyers and Judges who will have to consider it. If the Bill is passed every Petty Sessions in Ireland will have to construe the measure. This matter can easily be placed beyond doubt, and I hope the Home Secretary will adhere to the statement he made on the Second Reading, that there is no objection to a clause declaring that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament shall exist. If he does, and a clause is inserted, it will get rid of all question on this point. The Prime Minister said that the words of the Amendment do not go far enough.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That is not my only objection.

*SIR H. JAMES: It was, I think, the principal objection of the right hon. Gentleman. My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. R. T. Reid) says there is no objection to an express clause, and once it is framed this discussion will come to an end. If the Government say they cannot take this course, will it not be said that in the conduct of this Bill the Government have had some reason for abstaining from explicitly declaring the supremacy of Parliament? If Irish Members are excluded from this House, and if in some Petty Sessions Court in Ireland it is asked, "Is the Parliament of England to pass laws for Ireland?" will not the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament be imperilled if there is no explicit declaration of that supremacy? I ask the Government to consider the promise of the Home Secretary that there should be an express admission by a clause of the supremacy of Imperial Parliament, and I would urge the Prime Minister to put the question beyond dispute by accepting the advice of the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I have listened to the discussion with a certain amount of surprise, because I understood, after I had spoken on the Second Reading, that it was practically conceded by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that, so far as paper declarations are concerned, the supremacy of Parliament is amply safeguarded by the Bill as it stands. ["No, no!"] If that is disputed, I must refer to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition in the Debate on the Second Reading. At the close of the Debate, after referring to my speech, and saying that I had explained at considerable length that the Imperial Parliament would still be supreme, he went on to say—

"Legally, of course, it would be supreme; no one has doubted it. But what layman takes the slightest interest in these paper supremacies? For my part, I take no more interest in the question of whether the Imperial Parliament is on paper superior to the Irish Parliament than I do as to the order of precedence at a London dinner party. The thing is of no public interest or importance whatever. What we want to know is where the power lies. Who is going to exercise supremacy? Who is going to be the de facto ruler of Ireland?"

Well, what is proposed now? Why, to add another to the list of paper safeguards of the supremacy. Furthermore, if the offer I made were accepted, and a declaratory clause asserting the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament were inserted in the Bill, according to the right hon. Gentleman it would not make the least difference—it would not be a matter in which any layman would affect to take any interest, because the question which is the de facto ruler—not the de jure ruler, not the ruler on paper—will remain precisely the same. I am, therefore, surprised that so much time should be occupied on the discussion of this purely academic question. I would repeat what was said by the Prime Minister—namely, that the Amendment before the Committee, if it does anything, tends to cast a doubt upon the supremacy of Parliament. It is a preamble to the clause, and will only govern the clause; and if there is any doubt—I deny that there can be—lawyers and Judges will look not to a clause, but to the Preamble for a key to the Statute. As to the appeal of my right hon. Friend (Sir H. James), what I have to say is that if a clause bearing in express terms upon the supremacy is placed upon the Paper, when the time comes for the discussion of that clause—which, I may remark, is not now, but when the new clauses come to be considered—the Government will carefully consider its terms. [Laughter.] Well, if hon. Gentlemen suppose that the Government will bind themselves in advance to accept any form of words which may be put on the Paper, they are making a very unreasonable demand. I do not in the least degree recede from the statement I made on the Second Reading; I do not go back one step. All I do say is that at the proper time—and certainly this is not the proper moment to discuss the question—the Government are as determined as any hon. Gentleman opposite can be that when this Bill finally passes through Committee the supremacy of Parliament shall be amply and unequivocally safeguarded.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should not have intervened thus early if it had not been that the right hon. Gentleman appears to have relied upon some statement of mine on the Second Reading fortifying his own view of the legal position in which we stand. It would be rash of me to make any statement on the legal aspect of the Bill, but I frankly admit that I have been told by lawyers of high authority that if the Bill passes in its present shape, or amended as we desire to amend it, competent lawyers will hold that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament has not been interfered with. But, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury has pointed out, the Bill will have to be interpreted in Ireland by persons who are not competent lawyers. It is possible that the Magistrates in Ireland may be as ignorant of Constitutional Law as I am myself, and it will be quite as necessary to guide them into the true path as it would be to guide a lay Member of the House. But there is another point which, to my mind, is much more important. I still adhere to the view that a paper supremacy is not a thing in which lay Members need take great interest; but the value of this clause, in my opinion, is that if it is followed, as it ought to be, by a specific proposition intended to make it effective in practice, the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament will be a real supremacy, and not a paper supremacy. The question in the future will be as to how far the Imperial Parliament can with propriety—I do not say with legal justification—interfere in Irish affairs in so far as all matters, local and Imperial, and all persons in Ireland are concerned. This question of the propriety of interfering in those affairs will be constantly coming up for decision. If we are going to leave the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament unmentioned in the clauses of the Bill, and are not going to specify what the duties of that Parliament are to be, it will be open for gentlemen to argue that, although this House undoubtedly has a right to interfere, it cannot with propriety do so in Ireland any more than it can with propriety do so in Canada or Australia. My view is that we should put this matter beyond doubt in the Act itself, and declare distinctly that the Imperial Parliament not only has legal right—about which lawyers are quarrelling and will go on quarrelling—to deal with Irish local affairs and with any person in Ireland, but that the Act contemplates the exercise of that right. Therefore, I attach the utmost importance to placing in the first line of the 1st clause of the measure words implying the deliberate determination of the Imperial Parliament as a matter of concrete fact and everyday practice to deal with any matter in Ireland, local or personal, if on the matter being brought before them they should think it proper so to do. But I go further than that. Valuable as I think these words would be if they stood alone, and cordially as I shall support the Amendment if carried to a Division, in my opinion their greatest value will be as a preface to the future provisions to be introduced creating machinery for enabling the Imperial Parliament to control local and personal affairs in Ireland. This is not the time for considering what that machinery should be, but undoubtedly it will be our duty—a duty from which we shall not shrink—to endeavour to put within the Bill the actual instruments and implements with which the Imperial Parliament will exercise supervision over the acts of the Irish Legislature and extend protection to all individuals and to every local interest in Ireland. By seeking to introduce these words into the Bill we are not dealing with a legal quibble, but are endeavouring to introduce a great and important modification into the Bill.

*MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid) thought he could explain why the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had withdrawn from the position he took up on the Second Reading. It was because the Irish Members took exception to his view. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid) had said that even if there was no mention of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in the Bill there would be no doubt as to the existence of that supremacy. If the hon. and learned Member was as familiar with this particular controversy in Ireland at a time preceding the Union as he (Mr. Barton) was, he would know that, of all questions which had ever been disputed by the Nationalists of Ireland, this was the one most disputed. If the hon. Member for Waterford and his friends were to agree to a clear statement of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament being inserted in the Bill they would find it difficult to explain their conduct to those who at present regarded them as the trustees of Irish nationality. They were first told that they need not place the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in the enacting part of the Bill, because it was in the Preamble, and now they were told that it was unnecessary because of an admission alleged to have been made in Debate by the Leader of the Opposition. That was a high compliment to pay the Leader of the Opposition no doubt; but the right hon. Gentleman had sufficiently explained that his words were not to be taken as justifying the Government in omitting this Amendment from the Bill. The supremacy of Parliament over Ireland was of two kinds—judicial and legislative. The judicial supremacy was seriously affected by this Bill. By Clause 22 of the Bill the most important branch of the judicial supremacy was abolished, as it was enacted that appeals from Courts in Ireland to the House of Lords should cease. That was important, because the appellate jurisdiction of the English House of Lords had in 1719 and 1783 played an important part in the struggle between the Parliaments of Great Britain and Ireland. Therefore, by abolishing it the Government had removed one important branch of the Imperial supremacy. There were other branches of the judicial supremacy which would require definite words, especially impeachment. Would an Irish subject be impeachable after this Act, and, if so, where? But the legislative supremacy was the most important branch of the subject. How did this stand? He ventured to say that Clause 33 of the Bill did not do that which the Government would lead them to suppose. It omitted an important part of what the opponents of the Bill insisted upon. Would it be competent for both Parliaments to legislate upon the same subject? If so, would this Parliament be supreme? Unless it were made clear that this Parliament could pass a special Act with reference to matters within the powers of the Irish Legislature, there would be no effective supremacy. He was aware that they would be told they would have the veto, but that would not do for them. That was indirect supremacy, similar to the supremacy exercised by the Privy Council under Poyning's Act. They wanted a complete Parliamentary supremacy, and wanted it to be made clear in the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries had said that the supremacy would be secure, even if it was not mentioned in the Bill, but a slight knowledge of Irish history and law would soon undeceive him. No subject had been more disputed by every generation of Irish Nationalists. There had been three cases on the subject in the Law Courts, a glance at which would show how doubtful the question was. In Pilkington's case, in Henry VI's. reign, it was decided in the English Courts that the granting of a subsidy by the English Parliament would not be binding in Ireland. In the case of the merchants of Waterford, which was finally decided in the first year of Henry VII. conflicting decisions were given by the Judges. First, they decided that the English Parliament could not bind the Irish people by an Act restricting external commerce. Then they re-considered their Judgment, and having been reinforced by the Chief Justice, they decided the contrary. Finally, in Calvin's case, early in the reign of James I., in a case about Scotch naturalisation, it was laid down by Lord Coke and the other Judges that the laws passed in the English Parliament might by express words bind Ireland. This was decided on the ground that Ireland was a conquered country. But the Irish people had always disputed the fact of conquest, and, therefore, the ratio decidendi of Lord Coke's Judgment was traversed and disputed in Ireland. The House would see from these three cases the question was one which, so far as case law went, was by no means clear, and was not one which could be lightly passed over in an Act of Parliament. He would next deal with legislation and the action of Parliament. After Calvin's case was decided the Irish Parliament of Charles I. consulted the Irish Judges on this very subject of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament; and having received an ambiguous reply, the Irish Parliament, disregarding the judgment in Calvin's case, declared solemnly that the English Parliament had no right to bind Ireland, but that the laws for Ireland were the Common Law of England and the Statute Law of Ireland. That was in 1641-2. In 1689 they had the brief and notorious Parliament of James II., the Parliament which confiscated the property and sentenced to death all the leading members of the Protestant community in Ireland, and it repudiated, among other things, the right of the British Parliament to legislate for Ireland. Hardly had the Parliament of William III. assembled than the same question was again raised, and early in the next century Molyneux, in his Paper on The Case for Ireland, argued that the Imperial Parliament had no power to legislate for that country. The question created such a degree of interest that about 1718 the Irish House of Lords decided the point one way and the English House of Lords another, and both claimed appellate jurisdiction on the ground of Parliamentary supremacy. It was this controversy between the two Houses of Lords as to judicial supremacy which led to the Declaratory Act of 1719, commonly called the Statute of 6 Geo. I. This Parliament then found it necessary to declare the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, and if it was found necessary to declare it then why did Her Majesty's Government not think it necessary to declare it now? That was the last time the Imperial Parliament declared its supremacy. Thus, in 1719, this Parliament found it necessary to declare it by deliberate enactment; but so violently was it disputed by the Irish leaders that Parliament, in 1782, had to repeal that Act, and remove it from the Statute Book. The independence of Grattan's Parliament depended upon the repeal of that Declaratory Act, and yet they were told that it was not now necessary to declare, in specific terms, the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. In 1783 this Parliament renounced any right of supremacy it had over the Irish Parliament. He asked hon. Members whether the question of supremacy could be satisfactorily dealt with in a Preamble when all these great events of Irish history and all these great Constitutional movements and circumstances turned upon that question? By the Act of Union the question was settled, as the supremacy was practically established by that measure which made Ireland a partner with England and Scotland in the government of the Three Kingdoms. How had the Members of the Government treated the Act of Union which thus practically established the Imperial supremacy? They had gone up and down the country endeavouring to discredit it. They declared that that Act, which was now the sole foundation of the supremacy of Parliament, was gained by force and fraud. Under these circumstances, the Opposition were entitled to say that the Imperial supremacy must be expressly safeguarded in the Act. He was entitled to ask those who represented the historic Nationalist Party what was their view on the question? Were they willing to admit the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in the sense in which it had been described? Whatever was their reply, the Opposition was at least entitled to ask the Government, who had tainted the title deeds of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, to set up in its place something that would be a sure basis for the supremacy in the future.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) rose to make a suggestion which he thought might possibly meet the opinions which had been expressed on both sides of the House. He understood that both sides were equally agreed that the supremacy of Parliament ought to be effectually maintained. With that object in view, he thought both sides were agreed that the Irish Legislature was to be really a subordinate Legislature. The Prime Minister had raised the objection to the Amendment that it was not of an enacting character, but was rather a preamble to the clause. He (Mr. Bousfield) suggested that the words "subject to and" should be prefixed to the Amendment. If this suggestion were adopted, it would make the Amendment of an enacting character. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Darling) did not think this Amendment necessary, but he understood that he would accept it.

Amendment proposed, to the said proposed Amendment, before the first word "without" to insert the words "subject to and."—(Mr. Bousfield.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'subject to and' be there inserted in the proposed Amendment."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: We cannot accept the Amendment. We do not think that the best mode of dealing with the supremacy is by means of a preamble to a particular clause.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I cannot help thinking that perhaps the Government have already seen some reason to doubt the wisdom of the course they have taken in refusing all information as to their intentions with regard to subsequent clauses. We are anxious, as far as we can, to confine ourselves strictly to the immediate matter under discussion, and not to refer, if we can avoid it, to future parts of the Bill when we do not know how they are going to be treated by the Government. I am not going to say another word on Clause 9 because, as far as I am concerned, Clause 9 no longer exists. It does not represent any settled intention of the Government. It is merely a pious opinion which is thrown upon the Table of the House and to which it would be perfectly useless and unnecessary for us to refer. But I cannot help referring to the question which is treated in Clause 9—namely, the future condition of the House of Commons. We are told that it is a matter of agreement between the two sides of the House that there shall be real and effective supremacy. I confess I am sorry to say I do not share the view of my hon. and learned Friend the Members for Dumfries (Mr. Reid). I doubt very much whether we are agreed on both sides of the House. Taking it for granted that that is true, as far as my hon. and learned Friend and those who act with him are concerned, I ask how can you have an effective supremacy or how can you devise words to secure it until you know what is to be done in regard to the Parliament at Westminster? The one argument which we urged against the extinction of the Irish Members in 1886, and the argument which was accepted by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in subsequent speeches as being a very reasonable argument, was that without the Irish Members at Westminster we could not have supremacy.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Nothing of the kind. I never said such a thing.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon. I was not going to refer to his words; but as he challenges me I must. On July 18th, 1886, my right hon. Friend at a tea, I suppose, given by the hon. Member for Cumberland (Cockermouth) (Sir W. Lawson) said—

"Moreover, I will go so far as to admit that it is impossible not to respect the feeling that in many minds has led to the entertainment of that desire. It is in order that there may not be as much as the slightest shadow of a presumption that the real union between the countries is about to be impaired that is a feeling to which the greatest respect should be paid."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: If my right hon. Friend agrees with that I really do not understand what the difference is between us. I assert that in 1886 the argument was that if the Irish

Members were excluded the supremacy could not be maintained. If the Irish Members are not retained it would be very difficult to argue logically that this House should have the right to tax them or impose its views upon them. My right hon. Friend says that is a feeling which is deserving of respect. I say that, under these circumstances, it is clearly impossible that we should discuss this question of supremacy without discussing possible methods of dealing with the Irish Members at Westminster. At present we have not the least idea what is the intention of the Government in this matter. We are obliged to argue on three different assumptions, and to show what is necessary to secure the supremacy of Parliament on each of these three assumptions. If my right hon. Friend, who knows of course what his intention is, would only frankly take the House into his confidence, as he has already no doubt taken hon. Members from Ireland into his confidence, he would shorten the Debate, because, instead of having to discuss on every clause as it comes up three separate hypotheses and propositions, we should only have to discuss one. Why are we to be the only people who do not know the future intentions of the Government? I think my right hon. Friend will find he has made a mistake in not saying yes or no to the simple question I asked him whether or not he adheres to Clause 9. I think some of my hon. Friends behind him, when they note his persistent silence, must have some qualms of conscience as to the position into which they are to be led. [Ministerial cries of "No!"] I find it is not so. They have been so accustomed to swallow their opinions that nothing the future can have in store for them can arouse the slightest alarm. I come now to the particular words suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman. To my mind, they are words which are very insufficient, and will have to be added to and extended to other parts of the Bill. But what are the objections taken to them? We are told by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Reid) that both sides of the House are agreed in principle. A proposition is made from the other side of the House in order to secure what all of us want to secure. We get no suggestion from this side of the House, except the suggestion that the proposal we make is unacceptable. The reason given by the Prime Minister was that the proposal did not go far enough, or rather, that the Amendment would affect a limitation of that immense, complete, unimpaired, entire, and satisfactory supremacy which the Government are determined, at all hazards, to maintain. But then, Sir, what does it amount to? Only to this: that while, as far as matters are concerned, the supremacy declared by the hon. and learned Gentleman is thoroughly satisfactory because it includes all matters everywhere——

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Well, my right hon. Friend, in his speech, passed over as satisfactory that portion of the Amendment which deals with matters, and it was only when he came to persons that he raised an objection.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: To both.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Well, then, I am one of those unfortunate persons who did not understand my right hon. Friend. I take it then as both. My right hon. Friend will see that "Great Britain and Ireland" only refer to persons, and the rest of the Amendment to matters. We will assume, however, for the sake of argument, that "Great Britain and Ireland" limits both the matters and the persons. My right hon. and learned Friend (Sir H. James) differs from the Prime Minister as to the legal operation of the words; but there is this to be said for them: that they are taken from the language of another lawyer, the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith), who gave them as a satisfactory definition of Imperial supremacy. When we accept them the Government find them entirely unsatisfactory. If they want enlargement, why does not some one on the Front Bench give us a suggestion for an enlargement? The Prime Minister may be quite sure that we shall not disagree with him on that point. The Home Secretary says, if we will bring forward a clause, he will consider it. This is a Bill to be dealt with not by discussion, but by consideration. This Bill is thrown on the Table, and we are to provide clauses to turn it into a good Bill, although the Government will not let us discuss their clauses. We are to provide clauses dealing with finance and dealing with Ulster, and until we do those subjects are to be postponed. This is the most absurd way of dealing with a great Bill. If the Government have a mind let us, for goodness sake, know what it is! Do not let them ask us to help them in the drafting of their Bill. The second objection is that this is not an enacting clause. That is a most strange objection to come from the Government. I think my right hon. and learned Friend (Sir H. James) has an idea that it is an enacting clause. But, putting this aside, what a curious thing it is that the Government, who think it satisfactory to deal with this matter by means of the Preamble with no enacting value, should complain of the Amendment that it does not go far enough. It is perfectly evident that the objection is taken for the sake of objecting, and that it is perfectly impossible to support it on any logical or reasonable ground. The Home Secretary complained that we are now increasing the number of safeguards, although the Leader of the Opposition has said he attaches no importance to paper safeguards. I think we are all agreed that there is no importance in paper safeguards if they stop there. But to place them in an Act of Parliament is the first step to enforcing them. The Government is in too great a hurry. We shall come to the enforcement after they accept the insertion of the principle. I do not believe they want to assert it. Of course, they are willing to assert it in Debate because words used in Debate are of no value subsequently in the interpretation of an Act. But I think if they were to put those words into the Bill, they would find they would have to enter into some discussion on the subject with some of their supporters. The hon. and learned Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond)—and this is a most extraordinary thing to which I must call attention—declared in terms that he would not be satisfied unless he inserted in the Bill a clause declaring that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament should not extend to these matters expressly relegated to the Irish Parliament. We are now discussing the supremacy, and the hon. and learned Member is absent. I take it for granted that if he were here he would object to the insertion in the Bill of the words which right hon. Gentlemen say they accept in principle. They tell us they agree with us in principle; and while all they have to say against our Amendment is that it does not go far enough, they will neither accept it nor teach us how to amend it. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Reid) laid down certainly a most extraordinary doctrine as to the policy which apparently he and his friends are going to adopt in this discussion. He said—"If you were willing to assist us in this Bill, we should be very happy to discuss it with you; but, as you are opposed to the Bill in all respects, as you have a bitter and undying hostility towards it, we are not going to discuss it with you at all." Well, what on earth is the good of a Committee of the House of Commons if that attitude is to be adopted? This is the doctrine laid down by a Member of this House who calls himself a Liberal—by one of those Members the tradition of whose Party it is to obtain free discussion. Committee is the place for discussion of the details of a Bill. We are now informed, and we are told, on the first Amendment on the 1st clause, that there is to be no discussion except by the Opposition. Only two right hon. Gentlemen have risen to speak in answer to the many speeches which have been made against them. This is the policy of silence. Our arguments are not to be answered. We are to be left to carry on the Debate alone. It cannot be said that we are carrying on an obstructive Debate.

MR. LITTLE (Whitehaven): Oh! oh!

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Not even the very young Member behind me would, I should think, have the hardihood to get up and say that the discussion of an Amendment of this importance has been obstructive.

MR. LITTLE: I have read the right hon. Gentleman's speeches, and those of the Leader of the Opposition, and that is the construction I place upon their assertions.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It is not my business to defend the Leader of the Opposition, but the construction the hon. Member has put on my speech is a most unauthorised and a most impertinent one. I defy him to find a single word in any of my speeches which justifies the interpretation he has placed upon them. I say again that, for my part, I am absolutely indifferent whether the Government answer our arguments or not. That will not prevent us, however, from bringing our arguments before the House and the country. If the Government do not answer our arguments it is because they cannot. Never before, I should think, in the history of Parliament has a Debate on the Second Reading of an important Bill gone on without an answer being given to any one of the principal arguments used against the measure. I am not speaking of the quality of the arguments. That, of course, is a matter on which I should be a bad judge; but what I say is, that to the principal arguments not a single word has been said in reply. If throughout the Committee stage the Government are going to treat us in the same way, that is to us a matter of the most perfect indifference; but the country will understand it perfectly well, and we shall challenge the Government to take the opinion of the country upon it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): With one remark of my right hon. Friend I entirely concur, and that is that the country will understand it. The country will understand my right hon. Friend's objects and the method by which he is seeking to secure them. We are perfectly prepared to answer the arguments of my right hon. Friend. What we will not do is to follow him in his method of discussing the 9th clause on the 1st clause. That is not a thing which we are bound to do or which we ought to do. The House, by a significant majority, has pronounced its opinion on the first Amendment, which was that of my right hon. Friend. What adjective belongs to that Amendment I will not say. Upon the Amendment before the House I will answer in two sentences so much of the speech of my right hon. Friend as can be called argument. About nine-tenths of my right hon. Friend's speech was not argument but denunciation. What is the part, the infinitesimal part, of my right hon. Friend's speech, which may properly be called argument? He says it is necessary to put this Amendment into the 1st clause. We have said we think it sufficient to put it into the Preamble. Hon. Gentlemen say the Preamble is not sufficient, and in order to cure the defects of the Preamble of the whole Bill, they introduce the Amendment into the preamble of a single clause. Even a layman will see that the Amendment is not of an enacting character. The hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Bousfield) is so confident that it is not enacting that he has suggested certain words which would make it not an enacting clause at all, but a saving clause. That in itself is an objection fatal to gentlemen opposite. My right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Chamberlain) asks why we do not bring up an enacting clause. We say we do not think an enacting clause necessary. We think it is sufficient to call attention to the supremacy of Parliament in the Preamble. If you do not think it sufficient, bring up your enacting clause. It is for you to supply any defects you think there are in the Bill. That is an answer to the whole argument. To say that we should bring up an enacting clause when we do not think such a clause necessary is totally unreasonable. That is our position in this matter, and it is perfectly fair and intelligible. We say that even without the statement in the Preamble the supremacy of Parliament would be legally intact. If you are not satisfied bring your proposal forward.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans) said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down argued that it was the business of the Opposition to produce an enacting Amendment. They had done so as a matter of fact, but the right hon. Gentleman said it was not of an enacting character. If the right hon. Gentleman was sincere in his desire to see the supremacy of Parliament asserted in the most absolute manner why did he not give the Committee the benefit of his advice and try to improve the clause? The right hon. Gentleman spoke about mere paper declarations. No one despised paper declarations more than he (Mr. Gibbs) did; but he was desirous of bringing into contrast the difference of opinion that existed on the question of supremacy amongst the supporters of the Government. Certainly some of the supporters of the Government desired that the supremacy should not be impaired; but hon. Gentlemen below the Opposition Gangway equally desired that it should be impaired. That was the real reason which was actuating the Government in opposing the clause. What was the position of the Home Secretary in this matter? When the Prime Minister spoke, he (Mr. Gibbs) supposed that the Home Secretary had been thrown over; but after hearing the Home Secretary he could only suppose that the right hon. Gentleman had thrown himself over. The right hon. Gentleman said on the Second Reading that the Government would have no objection to a clause, and now he said that he would consider one if it were brought up. The right hon. Gentleman said that the supremacy of Parliament was unquestionable; but when he was asked whether or not he was prepared to give way on Clause 9, he had no reply to make; in fact, there was such a mass of nebulous hypotheses floating around each clause, and the action of the Government was so uncertain in regard to every point, that it was impossible to tell what the Government might do at any moment. The hon. Member for Waterford had asserted that he did not depart from Mr. Parnell's statement that

"The Irish Parliament should be free from outside control, and should enable Ireland to take its place amongst the nations."

He could not imagine any nation, however small or unimportant, accepting such a Bill as this if it were a nation. The Unionists refused to recognise the separate nationality of Ireland, and on that account they opposed the Bill, because it did recognise the separate nationality of Ireland. It was perfectly clear, however, that the Bill was insufficient to satisfy the national aspirations of Ireland. They could have no better assurance of that than the statement of the hon. Member for Waterford, that he maintained the same attitude as Mr. Parnell. Of course, the hon. Member did maintain it; he would be afraid to face those who had returned him to Parliament if he did not maintain that attitude. The Prime Minister said they had very little to say in this matter, except that he could not give a plain answer to a plain question. They did certainly say that, but they had more to say besides. The right hon. Gentleman should not put it down entirely to the stupidity of the Tory Party that they used that argument, for he should consider that he had always shown himself supremely expert in explaining away anything he had said on any subject on any occasion in any part of the United Kingdom whenever it became inconvenient for him to admit it.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I rise to Order, Mr. Mellor. Is the hon. Member speaking to the Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot say the hon. Member is out of Order.

MR. VICARY GIBBS said, he had not the practised experience of speaking which other hon. Members enjoyed, so that when he was interrupted it wasted the time of the House, which he should have thought hon. Members below the Gangway should be desirous to economise, because it took him some time to recover the thread of his argument when he was interrupted. He was saying when interrupted that the Prime Minister had only himself to thank when he said they could not understand him; and if the right hon. Gentleman ascribed it to the stupidity of the Tory Party they might cheer themselves by the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham—whom he had often heard abused, but whom he had never heard charged with stupidity—was precisely in the same difficulty as the Tory Party. They need not go beyond the present Debate for proof that it was very difficult to understand the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman gave as his reason why he did not attach weight to Mr. Parnell's statement that it was said long ago, and said outside the House. But when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham put forward that reason the right hon. Gentleman interrupted, and said that that was not his reason at all; that he had another reason, which was that he had no official knowledge of Mr. Parnell's statement. He had listened most attentively to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and he did not say a single word about official knowledge, and he was confirmed in that view by his Colleagues who sat around him. If the assertion of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was confined to the Preamble of the Bill, he was perfectly certain that it would be brought up against them in Ireland that there was no assertion of the Imperial Parliament in the Bill itself.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, this Debate was one of very great importance, and up to the present the legal element had figured most conspicuously in it. No doubt it was, to some extent, a legal question; but a great many people who were not lawyers would read this Debate and have to make up their minds about it. He did not pretend to be able to discuss this question from the legal standpoint; but there were some things about it perfectly plain even to the non-legal mind. Let them assume the Irish Parliament at work, and it was only by assuming this that the necessity for supremacy could be said to arise. If there was one thing that a Roman Catholic Parliament—as this was bound to be, and he did not use the words offensively—if there was one thing more certain than another that a Roman Catholic Parliament would take umbrage at it was the doctrine of civil marriages. That was a matter acutely felt by Roman Catholics, and he could not imagine an Irish Parliament, dominated by priests, sanctioning civil marriage. Assuming the Irish Parliament passed an Act that made civil marriage illegal, it was quite certain that in that case the Imperial Parliament would interfere. Its right to do so had never been questioned—he did not question it, and he did not know anyone who did question the right of the Imperial Parliament to interfere with the Acts of any Assembly in the British Empire; the real matter for discussion was not the right to interfere, but the best way of interfering. Assume such an Act passed by the Irish Assembly and a Petty Sessions Court called upon to decide the question of the legitimacy of the children of such marriages, and, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) very properly said, the Act would have to be construed by gentlemen who were not lawyers—assume an Act like that passed, and a Petty Sessions Court called upon to decide the legitimacy of the children of such marriages, could anyone imagine that a statement in the Preamble of the Act would have as much effect on the Petty Sessional Court as a direct Enacting Clause. [An hon. MEMBER: This is a Preamble to a clause.] He did not admit that, and, with all due respect to his hon. Friend, he would rather take the legal opinion on this point of the right hon. Member for Bury (Sir Henry James). A distinct Enacting Clause in the Bill asserting the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament would be a better guide to these Magistrates; an assertion in the Preamble would not compare in effect and strength with an Enacting Clause in the Bill.

MR. J. MORLEY: What on?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The question of legitimacy.

MR. J. MORLEY: How could it come before the Petty Sessions Court?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: There are many ways in which it might arise. But let them take another question; take the Land Question, and that was not going very far afield. Let them suppose this Irish Assembly passed a Land Act, after the statutory period of three years had passed—an Act which that House considered oppressive and unjust. It did not require very large powers of assumption to assume that if there was one thing more certain than another it was that this would come about; and the reason he said so was that he believed that on this question hon. Gentlemen opposite would be true to their word, they would be true to the pledges they had given to the Irish people, and therefore it was not a large assumption to imagine a thing of that sort. Suppose the Imperial Parliament deemed the Act of the Irish Legislature oppressive, and made up its mind to interfere, he wanted to know if it was not better to have the right and the power to interfere put into an Enacting Clause than merely to have an assertion in the Preamble of the Bill?

MR. SEXTON: It is in Clause 33.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, they had been a long time finding it out, and he did not believe it was.

MR. SEXTON: The words are, "The Irish Legislature cannot repeal or alter," and so on.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he was not speaking of a British Act extended to Ireland by the vote of that House, but of an Act expressly passed by the Irish Parliament to deal with the Land Question. The Committee ought to remember there was no dispute as to the question of asserting the supremacy of Parliament in the Bill. If the Government took the ground that it was not necessary to put it in the Preamble at all, that the supremacy of Parliament was inalienable, if it took that ground he could understand them; but the Government did not take that ground—they put it in the Preamble. His argument was that if the Government took the position it was not necessary to assert it at all, either in the Preamble or a clause, he could understand that position. It was a mere question of assertion in the Preamble versus an enactment in a clause, and the Committee ought to be able to come to a judgment on an issue like that very easily. The Debate had taken place to-night in a House in which there was scarcely a Member on those (the Ministerial) Benches but was pledged up to the chin to the supremacy of Parliament. If there was one thing more than another English Members pledged themselves to their constituencies upon it was the supremacy of Parliament. [An hon. MEMBER: Agreed!] Yes; and when they were brought face to face with an Enacting Clause making that supremacy unquestionable, not a man rose in his place to say a word about it. He believed the reason why the Government would not accept the Amendment, and why they were keeping silent, was because they did not mean the supremacy of Parliament to be real. What did the hon. and learned Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) say? His argument was that, although he could not destroy the supremacy of Parliament, he and his friends would not be content with anything less than an arrangement in the Statute that it was not to be exercised so long as the Irish Parliament existed. He was obliged to assume, from arguments like these, that this was part of the understanding and agreement that was referred to in past Debates between hon. Gentlemen opposite and the Front Bench. If the Government meant to assert the supremacy of Parliament let them put it in their Bill; and if they did not the country would understand what they did mean was that the supremacy of Parliament was not to be a real supremacy at all.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he rose to ask a very plain question of the Government. Would they be so kind as to refer him to the passage in which the late Mr. Parnell said that he would accept either the Home Rule scheme of 1886 or some other Home Rule scheme of that kind as constituting a subordinate Parliament in Dublin to the Parliament in Westminster?

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): It will be found reported in his speech.

*SIR R. TEMPLE said, he took down the word "subordinate" at the time the Prime Minister used it, when he pointed with outstretched arm to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, and said—"These words were uttered from there." Therefore, if they were so uttered, they must be in Hansard.

MR. J. MORLEY: They are in Hansard.

*SIR R. TEMPLE was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for referring him to it, as he should be glad to see the passage in which the late Mr. Parnell used the word "subordinate." He did not pretend to be acquainted with Mr. Parnell's views; but he had heard every speech that gentleman ever made in that House since 1885, and he did not remember ever hearing him say that the Parliament in Dublin should be subordinate. Certainly, he should have thought such an idea was wholly foreign to the hon. Gentleman's mind. He brought forward the point because the Prime Minister seemed to attach great importance to it as affecting this particular Amendment which was under the consideration of the Committee, and he quite agreed with the Prime Minister in thinking that Mr. Parnell's opinions were still important, and that, although dead, he still spoke to many people in Ireland. If he might judge from the brilliant speech of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) on the Second Reading, he did not think that hon. Member was imbued with the idea of the Dublin Parliament being subordinate; the very notion was contrary to almost all he uttered, and he seemed to be true inheritor of the Parnellite tradition. He understood the hon. Member for Waterford to say that if there was anything like a supremacy it could only be tolerated so long as it was kept dormant. How far the idea of such subordination would be entertained by other Nationalists—by the Leader of the anti-Parnellite section, he did not know; but he imagined there must be large sections of Nationalist electors in Ireland who would reject the idea of the Dublin Parliament being subordinate to the Parliament here. The Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith) made some remarks upon some criticisms that were very justly and appropriately used by the Leaders of the Opposition as to the insufficiency of what were called paper securities. They on that side of the House agreed in that, but still it was better to have a paper security than none at all; though it might not be worth much, still it was worth something more than the paper on which it was written. It was the law, after all, and in this civilised age it was always an advantage to have the law on their side, though they had no means of carrying it out. Now, with regard to this Amendment as affecting the Preamble. He listened with great respect to what fell from the Home Secretary; but he would like to express to that right hon. Gentleman and all who sat on the Front Bench the fear and apprehension that was entertained on his side of the House was that the Government were willing enough to have words about supremacy so long as they were in the Preamble and in the air, so to speak. But the Opposition were not satisfied with the Preamble. Some lawyers told them the Preamble was sufficient, others told them it was insufficient, and hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway told them that subordination was always to be kept in a state of suspended animation; therefore, could it be wondered at that they were wholly dissatisfied with a Preamble of that description? Their fear was increasing almost to a point of suspicion when they found a Government, so willing to put words about supremacy in the Preamble, hesitating the moment they came to put them into a real clause—a clause about which there could be no doubt. They wanted to have the words of supremacy put into an Enacting Clause, and they contended that this was the proper clause to put them in—a clause which laymen could understand, which lawyers would accept, which Courts would enforce. As to its being a limiting clause, it was nothing of the kind. It was a governing clause, a fundamental enactment, and the very basis and foundation of the whole matter. The words of the Amendment were not only necessary, but this was the only clause into which they could be inserted. The words proposed, he considered, were a very salutary and necessary qualification.

Sir R. Temple

It was wholly unjust and a misdescription to say that this was not an Enacting Clause and that this was not an Enacting Amendment. The Home Secretary said, in effect, that they need not trouble to press this Amendment, because he promised there should be a sufficient clause introduced later on. He did not doubt the sincerity of the right hon. Gentleman's intention; but still there were many ways of carrying out an intention, and the right hon. Gentleman must forgive them if they felt some distrust, especially when they considered the somewhat shifty manner in which the Government dealt with the question of supremacy in the Preamble and declined to put it in a clause. There might be a clause of some kind intended; but who knew whether it would be satisfactory or not until they had had an opportunity of considering it? Moreover, if such an important clause as that were in contemplation, why was it not drafted, printed, and put on the Notice Paper, so that hon. Members would have an idea of what was to follow? It would have given them some confidence in the sincerity of the Government if a clause of that kind had been already put on the Notice Paper; and as it was not, they should certainly vote with his hon. and learned Friend in the Division, for assuredly a more important matter could not be brought before the House. There was no ground whatever for accusing them of any intention of impeding the passage of this Bill through Committee, because they insisted on debating the ins and outs of this important question. They desired that the supremacy of Parliament should be enacted in a manner from which there was no evasion and no escape; therefore, he trusted the whole Unionist Party in the House would insist upon this question being thrashed out, and an Amendment thoroughly competent and workable being inserted in the Bill.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): I hope the Committee will allow me to say a few words upon the Amendment, because, to my mind, a great alteration has been made on this question by the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Armagh (Mr. Barton), to which the Government have made no reply. I was always myself of opinion that this question of supremacy was one which the Government were very glad to air in speeches to the constituencies, because it was a great thing to be able to say to the British electorate that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was in no way interfered with; but it had very little meaning. I was myself of the same opinion that the Home Secretary seemed to be—namely, that you could not impugn the authority of the British Parliament, whether you have Preambles in your Bill, or whether you have Enacting Clauses in your Bill, or whether you left them out, that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was undoubted—that nothing could add to it and nothing take from it. I am glad to see that opinion shared by hon. Members opposite. But that was also tempered by the consideration that if that was all that Imperial supremacy meant there was very little in it, because that meant the Imperial supremacy would enable you legally to enact laws for Australia or for New Zealand; but who on earth in this age and Parliament would ever dream of suggesting, though Parliament had legally the power of doing it, that we should presume to pass laws for either the domestic affairs of Australia or New Zealand? If that sort of supremacy was all you meant in your declaration about Ireland, it would not have prevented Ireland from becoming, under a Home Rule Bill, as entirely a separate legislative community as either Australia or New Zealand. I thought supremacy was a mere fiction and figment; that Parliament would obtain a nominal power to legislate; but that it was a power which could practically never be exercised. I confess that, in my mind, an entirely new complexion has been put upon this question by the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Armagh. That speech was made in a very full House. The Prime Minister was present, and not only the Prime Minister, but the Legal Adviser of the Government, the Solicitor General was sitting in a corner of the Bench, and was smiling in interested attention to that speech; and I confess I thought, when my hon. and learned Friend sat down, after making what I consider an extremely powerful and quite a new argument upon this question, that after the professions that had been made by the Government of their readiness to answer any real point, the Solicitor General would at least have risen to have advised the House upon the striking argument of the hon. and learned Member for Armagh. But, as I understand now, this argument and new view of the position is to be treated as so many other arguments have been treated in this Debate—with silence and contempt. I would like to press upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who is, I believe, a gentleman of candid mind, who will appreciate an argument even by an opponent, what the argument used by the hon. Member for Armagh is. My hon. and learned Friend stated, as I understand, that so far from the supremacy of Parliament in Ireland resting, as it does in all other parts of Her Majesty's Dominions, upon the undoubted rights and prerogative of the Crown and Parliament, in the particular case of Ireland it rested only upon Statute, and only upon one Statute—the Act of Union. My hon. and learned Friend showed that previous to the Act of Union, the power of the Legislature at Westminster to have laws to have effect in Ireland had been disputed, and had, by a decision of Judges, been refuted, and in other cases had had very considerable doubt cast upon it, and that, so far as the power exists at the present moment, it rests not upon the general law by which this Parliament can make laws for every part of Her Majesty's Dominions, but rests upon one single Statute—the Act of Union. What Parliament has enacted Parliament can take away, and if the power to legislate in Ireland rests upon Statute that power can be taken away also by Statute. And, therefore, so far from the general power of Parliament surviving the passing of any Act of this particular Parliament—so far from that surviving, it seems to me, if words were used in passing a Statute taking away that power which exists only by virtue of the Statute of the Act of Union, the power to legislate in Ireland might be gone. That may be right or it may be wrong; but I think hon. Members below the Gangway will admit, for the credit of their countrymen, that that is one of the first new things said this Session on the Home Rule Bill. It was said by one of their countrymen, of whom I dare say they are proud, although they differ from him. But there was a real, serious, sober argument which demanded some answer. Her Majesty's Government have not the advantage of the presence of an Irish Law Officer, because, notwithstanding the confidence of the Irish people in the present Government, they are not willing to supply them with a Law Officer to advise them on Irish legal questions. But they have the Solicitor General there. The Solicitor General heard the argument of my hon. and learned Friend, and I saw his eyes twinkling with pleasure at the powerful legal argument addressed to the House. I was once, in former days, a learned Member myself, and though I have long since ceased to have any claim to that character I hope I retain enough of my professional powers to be able to appreciate a good legal argument when it is used by someone else, and I confess I was very much struck and moved in my mind by the powerful argument addressed to the House by the hon. and learned Member for Armagh. I must say that the Committee is entitled, in a situation of this kind, to the assistance of the Solicitor General, because it has been often stated in this House that the Solicitor General is not only the Law Officer of the Government, but of the House; and when the House is puzzled by the ingenious arguments which gentlemen of the long robe address to it, they have a right to call on the Law Officer of the Crown to state what his official and responsible views are, and to guide the House in the decision it may come to. Unless the Solicitor General can refute the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Armagh, I submit this question is not in the position it was in when the Prime Minister addressed the House. It is not a case in which the Government can say—"Oh, we did not think anything necessary, and we leave it to the Opposition to bring forward a clause." Unless you refute the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Armagh a clause is necessary; and, if so, it is the duty not of the Opposition, but of the Government, to submit such a clause to the House. Really, I rise as a sort of protestant. I do not like to be left in the legal darkness in which the reticence of the Government has left me, and I am merely in the position of what Tennyson calls "a child crying for light." Let me be enlightened by the legal luminaries opposite. Let my faith, which has been rudely shaken since the speech of the Prime Minister in consequence of the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Armagh, be rehabilitated; and if the Solicitor General, who is one of the ablest lawyers in the House, can rehabilitate that confidence which I felt in the law as laid down by the Prime Minister, and if he can rehabilitate the faith of the House in that law, then, perhaps, the Government can stand on the position that a further clause is not necessary; but, unless this argument can be answered, a further clause, in my opinion, is necessary.

MR. J. MORLEY: As the right hon. Gentleman has appealed to my candour—an appeal I always find it hard to resist—I feel bound to say a word or two—and a word or two will be quite sufficient—on what he calls the new position established by the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Armagh. The main part of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Armagh was an account of the various cases in which the supremacy of the Parliament in London had been denied by the Parliament in Dublin. Yes; but the hon. and learned Member left out of the sight of the House the whole of the reply to that argument, which was that that Parliament was not the Imperial Parliament in the ordinary sense, but the Parliament of Great Britain or the Parliament of England. Therefore, the whole of the elaborate structure the hon. and learned Member built up—and I was able to follow him as he went along, as I happened to have before me the source of his argument—the whole of that fabric falls to the ground the moment it is considered that the supremacy which was denied in those cases was not the supremacy which we are discussing; it was the supremacy of a Parliament which no longer exists—namely, the Parliament, first, of England and then of Great Britain. The hon. and learned Gentleman contended that the supremacy of this Parliament rests upon the Act of Union. Very well; whatever the supremacy as established by the Act of Union was, that it is and remains in spite of this Bill. If this Bill becomes an Act in the form in which it is now presented to Parliament, there will not be a line in it which impairs or restricts the supremacy as constituted by the Act of Union, and that is my answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

*MR. H. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.): I think the right hon. Gentleman hardly apprehended the force of the argument which he has to meet. The question which we are now discussing is how such Parliament as is left to this country by this Bill will have supremacy over Ireland, how far it will be able to legislate for Ireland, and how far you will be able to interfere with the Acts of the Irish Legislature you are going to create? The hon. and learned Member for Armagh adduced an argument which is perfectly unanswerable, I think, showing that up to 1782 the rights of the Parliament sitting on this side of St. George's Channel were never recognised. Its power over the Irish Parliament was always disputed by the authorities on the Irish side of the Channel. It was always asserted by them that this Parliament had not any real right to legislate for Ireland, and their contention was conceded in 1782, and in the most formal and solemn way the Parliament of Great Britain recognised and acknowledged that the sole right to legislate for Ireland was in the King, Lords, and Commons of Ireland. Then came the Act of Union, and I quite agree that under the Act of Union it was put beyond all doubt that the Parliament constituted by the Act of Union was a Parliament having supreme authority over Great Britain and Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman has just said there is not a line in the Bill touching the supremacy of this Parliament. No; but you destroy that Parliament. The Parliament left by your Clause 9 is not the Parliament of the Union. Certainly not; it is a Parliament in which at least 103 Members are shorn of part of the privileges which the Act of Union gave them. The Parliament left by your Clause 9 is not the Parliament of the Act of Union. What do you do by your Bill? By Clause 2 you give the exclusive right of legislating for Ireland to the new Irish Legislature. You give that in terms as wide as any Parliamentary language can possibly be. You give it the right to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Ireland. That means the absolute right of legislating on all subjects so far as Ireland is concerned. It is true you keep alive a certain Parliament by Clause 9; but it is no longer the Parliament created by the Act of Union and to which the supreme right of legislation was reserved by that Act. But the Act of Union is the sole foundation upon which the right of this Parliament to legislate for Ireland rests. [Sir W. HARCOURT dissented.] I see the Chancellor of the Exchequer shakes his head. I would agree with him if it were conceded Ireland was a conquered country. If it were, I agree, according to the sound Constitutional principles of English law, the supremacy of this British Parliament would prevail over Ireland. But that has never been conceded in Ireland. We may maintain it, but the Irish have always denied it; and when your Bill is going to be interpreted by Irish Judges and Irish Courts, can you expect that the Irish Judges and the Irish Courts will not construe the clauses of that Act in the way and in the sense in which the Irish contention has always proceeded in this matter—that is, deny that Ireland is a conquered country, and deny that the inherent right of supremacy over the legislation for Ireland rests with the Parliament of this country as the Parliament of the conquering race? The Act of Union is the sole document which gives this Parliament any supremacy over Ireland. That is an argument I should like to hear refuted by the Law Officers of the Crown. The Parliament of the Act of Union will disappear under your Bill, and it will be a different Parliament under your Clause 9. If Clause 9 is modified by excluding the Irish Members, I fail to see any ground upon which any Constitutional lawyer will venture to argue that the Parliament from which the Irish Members are excluded is the heir, or representative, or the equivalent of the Parliament under the Act of Union which could legislate for Ireland. The truth is that, though Her Majesty's Government in Debate across the floor of this House tell us they are as anxious to assert and maintain the supremacy of whatever Parliament will be left to us if this Bill pass as it is, for some reason or other they shrink from saying so plainly. The Prime Minister met this Amendment by arguments which I should think did not carry the slightest conviction to any human being. I speak with all respect of what falls from the Prime Minister; but his arguments were simply criticisms as to the manner in which the hon. and learned Member for Deptford had attempted to assert the principle in which we all agree. This, forsooth, was a recital and not an enactment ! His next objection was that we did not assert the supremacy of the Parliament in the Island of Ceylon or in some remote Colony of the Crown. But the supremacy of Parliament in the Colonies is not in question. The only point in question now is as to the supremacy in Ireland, and it is in Ireland that the dispute has always been. I defy any Constitutional lawyer to say that you can tamper with the Parliament constituted by the Act of Union, alter its constitution, its functions, and the right of the Members who sat in it, and not require some express words to keep alive the right to legislate for Ireland which this Parliament undoubtedly possesses now. Another argument of the Prime Minister was to fall back on Clause 33 ; but that clause shows the same extraordinary coyness, the same shrinking modesty, about asserting the principle of supremacy, that characterises the whole of the rest of the Bill. Do the Ministers of the Crown mean that Parliament shall have the right to pass an Irish Act alone, not coupled with an English Act, and to interfere with, alter, and, if necessary, repeal, Acts of the Irish Legislature ? If so, Clause 33 does not say so. If you mean that, why do you not say so in terms ? I should like to hear whether the hon. and learned Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) assents to the proposition of the Prime Minister ?

MR. T. M. HEALY : Would you like to hear the whole of us ?

MR. MATTHEWS : No ; I would select the hon. and learned Member as a Representative ; I would be content with his views, and would challenge him to say whether he understands that this Bill, as now drafted, means that the Imperial Parliament, which, under Section 9, would have some of its Members lopped off and which would not be the Parliament of the Act of Union, but a different Parliament created for the first time under this Bill—I would ask the hon. and learned Member whether he understands that that remnant of a Parliament is to have power to review and repeal the whole of the Irish legislation, and to see that the Acts of the Irish Legislature shall not run counter to any enactments passed by this Parliament upon any of those subjects which are expressly left to the Irish Parliament ? That is what the Government are unable to say. If they are really sincere they will give us the information for which we ask and which we have a right to demand.

*MR. J. G. BUTCHER (York) said, if they were going to make a lasting compact by this Bill, it was essential that all the Parties to that compact should mean the same thing. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries had said that they were all agreed on the subject. He, however, thought that it was a pertinent question whether that were so or not. He took it that the main and fundamental question involved in the matter of supremacy was whether this Imperial Parliament was, or was not, to legislate upon matters that were given over to the competence of the Irish Parliament. He should like to hear what were the intentions of the Government on this vital question ; and it would have been more satisfactory if the Government had given a promise to bring in a clause on this point. The Unionist Party knew what they meant : they meant that power should be reserved to the Imperial Parliament to legislate upon those questions that were left to the Irish Parliament. The views of the section of the Irish Nationalist Party of which the hon. Member for Waterford was the acknowledged head were also known. The hon. Member, speaking on February 14 this year, had said that the Irish should have some guarantee that the Imperial Parliament would not exercise its rights of legislation over Ireland over their heads upon the questions committed to the Irish Parliament. That was a view not expressed in the heat of Debate. Again, in The Nineteenth Century for April last, the hon. Member stated that he asked for an amendment to prevent by express enactment any interference by the Imperial Parliament in the legislative sphere of the Irish Parliament. Again, The Irish Independent newspaper, on February 17 last, stated that the Independent Party would demand a clause providing that the power of concurrent legislation should not be exercised while the Irish Parliament existed. That clause was not on the Paper as yet. Whether it appeared on the Paper or not would depend on the exigencies of Debate—

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford) : And on the tactics of the Opposition.

Mr. H. Matthews

*MR. BUTCHER said, he was astonished to hear that a question which was admitted to be of vital importance to Ireland and to its Legislature should depend simply upon the tactics of the Opposition. A conference of the Independent Party was held in Dublin not long ago, and the proceedings were reported in The Irish Daily Independent of March 10 last. On that occasion a resolution was passed to the effect that the Irish Parliament should have full power over all the affairs of Ireland, including the land, and that the laws enacted by it should be subject only to the veto of the Crown, or the representative of the Crown in Ireland. What were the views of the other section of the Nationalist Party, the Party who had been squared, or who had, at any rate, been reduced to a degree of silence which was somewhat unusual, and which must be most galling and irksome to them? He trusted before the Debate concluded there would be some expression of opinion from that section. They would not probably be prepared to repudiate the views of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford. If the views of the Nationalist and Unionist Parties were as he had stated them, he thought the Government ought to introduce a clause which would say which of those views most nearly represented their own views. He would press upon hon. Members opposite the enormous importance of introducing into this Bill a clause which would settle the question as between the various Parties in the House, and which would, rightly or wrongly, say that this House should have power to deal with questions within the competence of the Irish Parliament, and which would put an end to questions which otherwise would prove of the greatest difficulty and danger to the harmonious working of the Irish Legislature.

Opposition cries of "Rigby" [meaning the Solicitor General for England (Sir J. Rigby, Forfar)], but the hon. and learned Gentleman did not rise.

*MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General does not appear to be prepared to address the Committee at this moment, but I hope I may have the privilege of hearing him in a few minutes. The Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley), in discussing the arguments of the hon. and learned Member for Armagh (Mr. Barton), has pointed to the fact that we made an entirely new departure in the Act of Union—that in 1782 we renounced the authority which up to that time had been continually asserted and often exercised, and that the Act of Union was an Act between two independent Parliaments. He argued that the precedents cited by the Member for Armagh were out of date. I myself should have been glad to take the Act of Union as a dividing line from which to start; but, unfortunately, I have to recognise that the Act of Union is a discredited fact; it is a product of blackguardism. We have also heard it forcibly asserted that the Irish Parliament had no moral authority to consent to the Act of Union. That being the position of affairs in regard to the Union, according to the highest authority who drew this Bill and otherwise widely maintained, the Act of Union cannot be safely taken as the starting point from which to proceed to the re-establishment of two Parliaments in Great Britain and Ireland. I cannot accept the doctrine which some legal authorities have laid down as to the impossibility of restoring two independent Parliaments. It is a very singular commentary on the omnipotence of this House that, composed as it is of Members for Great Britain and Ireland, it could not, even if desiring to re-establish two Parliaments independent of one another, effectively embody in an Act what it wished to accomplish. I believe this difficulty to be a mere figment of some Constitutional jurists. It would be quite possible to re-establish that which the Irish Nationalist feeling says ought to be established, which according to their belief was never destroyed with any moral justification—the relative independence and authority of the two Parliaments. I admit that under this Bill that line has not been taken. The Bill technically preserves the authority of Parliament, and I am content to take my stand on the admission that theoretically the supremacy of Parliament is maintained by the Bill. But what is the question? Has the Committee, then, been arguing an empty abstract question? I venture to think that there was a substantial basis for the argument which has occupied the attention of the Committee, and it is this:—Admit that the supremacy is technically maintained, that it is a paper supremacy, a supremacy of the same kind as that over the Parliaments of Australia and Canada. Is that supremacy a working supremacy? Is that supremacy something which represents a real power which can be exercised when occasion calls for it, or is it a supremacy only called so in name, to be put on the shelf, and incapable of being used? The test of the argument is this—Do you wish to have a real, vitalised supremacy through which the conscience of Great Britain can act with the authority of Parliament, with definite machinery to express its will if the occasion arises; or do you wish for a sterilised supremacy which means nothing except an empty respect paid to a dead idea? We are here testing two distinct lines of conduct of the argument which has prevailed during the last six or seven years as to the relation of the Parliament at Westminster towards the Parliament at Dublin. I can refer to Members on the Government Bench, and probably to still more hon. Members behind them, who have said over and over again in the country that they are not going to consent to the setting up of a Parliament in Dublin which may do what it chooses; but that they mean to have guarantees which shall give the power of securing that whenever the Parliament in Dublin does anything unjust, injurious, or prejudicial to the interest of a considerable section of the people of Ireland, the Parliament at Westminster shall be able, actively and fruitfully, to interfere. That has been the language used by a great many hon. Members of the Government Party, and it has helped very considerably to establish them in their present position. The issue raised by the Amendment is this—Do the Government intend to consent to the introduction of Amendments, of which this is the first, which shall incorporate in the Bill the guarantees which they have been professing they would insist on securing if ever the Bill became law? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has indulged in repudiation of this idea; and the Prime Minister assures us of the stability of the Imperial supremacy as it now stands. We have reached the first stage of this controversy. Is Parliament to be endowed with an empty vague supremacy, or is Parliament to have a supremacy that would be operative—that will be a real supremacy, that can be called upon if occasion should arise? Are we to have such a supremacy, or are we to have one for which we are to entertain only an empty respect? I hope we shall now hear a few words, giving clear information upon this point, from my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General (Sir J. Rigby).

There were loud cries of "Rigby" on Mr. Courtney resuming his seat, but as Sir John Rigby did not rise several Members of the Opposition sought to address the Committee.

MR. J. MORLEY, at 9.55, said: I beg to move, Mr. Mellor, that the Question be now put. [Cries of "Oh!"; "Chair!""; "Shame!""; "Scandalous!"]

MR. BARTLEY: It is scandalous.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Remember 1887.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 243; Noes 195.—(Division List, No. 68.)

Question put accordingly, "That these words 'Subject to and,' be inserted in the proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 222; Noes 276:—(Division List, No. 69.)

MR. J. MORLEY claimed, "That the Question on the Amendment be now put."

Question put,

"That the words 'without in any way whatever impairing, restricting, or altering the supreme power and authority of Parliament in all matters, as well local as Imperial, and over all persons in Great Britain and Ireland' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 233; Noes 285.—(Division List, No. 69.)

LORD R. CHURCHILL: The recent occurrences in the proceedings of the House compel me to submit to you, Mr. Mellor, a Motion, and that Motion is that you do now report Progress. It is obvious that in placing that Motion before the House I am not speaking my own mind alone. I am representing, I am certain, from what I have heard from communications which have taken place between the general body of the Unionist Party during the opportunity which the right hon. Gentleman has given us, the opinion of that Party. It is evident, from the attitude of the Unionist Party, that this is a Motion which is going to be persisted in. [Interruption.] I cannot help speaking strongly. Hon.

Members below the Gangway must feel that we have a Parliamentary position in this Motion which we have a right to put forward and to which we have a right to adhere; and it will not help the discussion of this Motion if it is met with nothing but clamour and noise. I should never have made this Motion if it were not that there are a very large number of Members who are prepared to support it. I hold that the House is not in a condition, after what has passed this evening, to continue the discussion of such business. I move to report Progress because we are engaged in discussing the greatest measure that could be brought before the British Parliament, and because it has been shown by indisputable evidence that neither the supporters of the Government, nor the Chief Secretary for Ireland, nor the First Lord of the Treasury, are prepared to extend to the constitutional Opposition which is opposed to this Bill the slightest fair play. These tactics we must meet at the outset, not only in our own defence, but in defence of the interests which are committed to us. We are bound by every conception of Parliamentary duty to nip in the bud the policy of silencing the arguments of the Opposition against the Irish policy of the Government. That cannot be. Give us the rights and limits of the Opposition to which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has been accustomed for 50 or 60 years. Never before has such conduct been pursued towards an Opposition numbering nearly half the House, and an Opposition which represents the majority in Great Britain, and who are engaged, and were engaged, in discussing what everybody must admit to be—what you yourselves must admit to be—one of the most important features of this Bill. At this hour of the evening, when the Debate might have terminated perfectly peacefully before the close of the night, and when one or more Members were prepared to discuss the question as reasonably as they could, and to advance what arguments they could, on this important Amendment, the voices of the Opposition were silenced, and is this to be the manner in which the Bill is to be conducted through the House? Let me tell the right hon. Gentleman that this is not the manner in which the Bill can be carried through Committee. He will have to resort to proceedings which he has never dreamed of if he thinks he is going to silence the Opposition. If he imagines he is going to carry this Bill without argument and only by brute force and the Closure—I tell him, on behalf of everyone on these Benches, that never before will he have encountered an Opposition so determined. I appeal to him, from his enormous experience of Parliament, to say why he now introduces this new procedure. Perfectly useless it is—perfectly without precedent. Yes, taking into account the nature of the issue between us, I say it is unprecedented. It cannot help him in the progress of his Bill. It will only lead to what he seems to like most—it is based upon the only argument he seems to have recourse to—the argument of the gag. It is perfectly possible that if it comes to a trial of physical strength we shall prove to have as much tenacity as the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues. Hon. Gentlemen from Ireland below the Gangway, no doubt, disapprove of my action; but they have known what it is to resist the Prime Minister. They did it, and they certainly carried their resistance to extraordinary lengths. But this is a far more aggravating danger, and I hold that every length of opposition on our part, every act which can possibly be justified by precedent in regard to resistance by the Opposition of a tyrannous majority can be used, and I expect will be used to the fullest extent if this kind of policy be persevered in. So, now, Sir, I move that you report Progress, that the Government may, at any rate, have time to consider this question. I say that the Committee will do well to consider seriously the whole position between the two Parties before they finally decide on a continuance of the policy which the Government have adopted. I think it is necessary to have time to consider all the issues of the new development you are giving to a struggle which God knows is bitter enough—a development which will lead you further than you have ever heard of, and may even disorganise for a long time and break up almost all the order of the House of Commons and all the customs of Debate—because, believe me, I pray you believe me, in this matter, we will not yield.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Although this is an occasion of some excitement, it is the duty of Members in prominent positions to endeavour to allay it. At any rate that is my opinion, and I will endeavour to resist the infection of the noble Lord's excitement. I see no occasion for it whatever. At the same time, were there occasion for it, I hope I should be inclined to take a very different direction from that which the noble Lord has taken, for I am certain that nothing but mischief can arise from the course he is pursuing. Let us see what are the noble Lord's points. He has made a Motion to report Progress—to stop the Business of the evening, out of which a little more than an hour has been left to us by those who have chiefly consumed the time of the Committee. What does he allege in support of that Motion? His first reason is that this is a most important Bill. I cannot myself perceive that from the importance of the Bill it flows legitimately, and as a consequence, that we ought to stop discussion upon it. Next, he says that I have introduced a new procedure. Sir, I am not the author of the procedure under which the discussion which was just now in progress has been stopped. The honour of that authorship belongs to Gentlemen opposite. By virtue of that procedure I have seen liberty invaded, a Coercion Bill forced upon Ireland without any discussion whatever in Committee of this House—upon some of its most important provisions. I disclaim the honour altogether. Were I to set out upon a course which would be new to me, and to endeavour to give large application to the principle of Closure, in vain should I struggle to imitate the noble and unsurpassed examples of those who have gone before me. But if the principle of Closure is in use, I imagine that there are certain occasions when resort ought to be had to it. Has this been an unreasonable occasion of resort to it? On what ground is it that so extreme a case has arisen as the noble Lord suggests? The noble Lord is getting into the habit of stating these extreme cases. He gave us one the other day. What is the basis of this complaint to-day? In 1886 we introduced a similar Bill without any declaration in the Preamble of the supremacy of Parliament, because we thought that supremacy was at once unlimited and perfectly secure. We have introduced into this Bill a declaration of that supremacy in the hope of offering some consolation to some of our opponents. Gentlemen opposite differ from us as to the mode of expressing that supremacy, and they speak of a clause as the proper mode of declaring it, we differing from them upon that point, but expressing our willingness to consider their clause when we see it. Can we do more? We have declared our readiness to give full consideration to the recommendations which may be placed before us—

LORD R. CHURCHILL: By moving the Closure at a quarter to 10.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The Amendment contains a proposal which we think is altogether a bad and dangerous method of attempting to secure the supremacy—a method which does not secure it, but weakens it. Have we attempted by silence to bear down the proposal of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Darling)? [Cries of "Yes!"] Sir, four Ministers spoke from this Bench on the Amendment. We gave our reasons. I presume there was satisfaction with our arguments on this side of the House. We did not attempt to shut out the question. Our pledge holds good to consider your proposals when we see them. Under these circumstances it is that the noble Lord has used the somewhat inflated language that has fallen from him to-night. I do not know whether he intended to intimidate me or not; but if he did I do not think he will succeed.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I did not in the least try to intimidate the right hon. Gentleman. I tried to tell the Government and the House the real truth.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord speaks of our position as an extreme one. We believe that this declaration of supremacy is unnecessary. We have opposed, and we have explained by four Members of the Cabinet our opposition to, the particular proposal made, which even its supporters found so faulty that they were obliged to set about amending it. We have offered to consider further proposals on the subject when they can be presented to us. The only answer made to us is that we have been challenged to produce a clause ourselves which we think to be totally unnecessary, and which we fear, if skilfully managed, may prove hazardous to the supremacy. It is in these circumstances that the noble Lord threatens us with the extremest measures of an opposition with unheard-of numbers and power in debate. He threatens us with these measures after we have had four Divisions, in every one of which we have been supported by numbers exceeding the relative superiority of the Parties. These being the state of the facts, it is our duty, and will remain our duty, in whatever way such a Motion as this is made, provided no better grounds are given than the noble Lord has alleged, to resist it to the uttermost.

THE CHAIRMAN: I just wish to make one remark. I have permitted this Debate to go on to this point because I think there was some feeling in the Committee. The noble Lord has made his explanation, and the Prime Minister has answered it; but it is irregular and out of Order that there should be any further discussion on the Closure, which, having been accepted by the Committee, was the act of the Committee, and, according to the Rules of the House, can no longer be questioned.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: In the Motion I made to report Progress I carefully avoided discussing the act of the Committee, but discussed the general question, on which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister replied.

THE CHAIRMAN: I watched the noble Lord, and he came very near the line. But I really want to point out that, this discussion having taken place, it would be altogether out of Order any longer to question the action of the Chair.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I shall confine myself strictly to the speech to which we have just listened from the First Lord of the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman commenced by saying he did not see any necessity for excitement. Neither do I, and, as far as I myself am concerned, I am as cool as a cucumber. But, at the same time, I must point out to my right hon. Friend that the position of the two Parties is rather different. When a worm is trampled upon I do not think there is any necessity for excitement on the part of the person who tramples upon the worm; but I suppose, if one could in any way estimate the feelings of the worm, one might find that there was considerable excitement there. My right hon. Friend considers that our excitement or our feeling is altogether unreasonable, and he complains of the noble Lord for moving to report Progress. He says this is a very important Bill, and he does not see why the discussion on it should be stopped. That is precisely the point which we wish to raise. [Cries of "Order!"] I am answering my right hon. Friend, and if he was not out of Order neither am I. I say that this is the question which we desire to raise—why discussion upon important questions—I am not speaking now of the past, I am speaking of the future; the past is over; you cannot mend what you have done. You will feel the consequences before the end of this Debate. Let us consider what is to happen in the future—whether the discussion of this important Bill is to be stopped whenever the Chief Secretary dances up and moves the Closure. The Prime Minister says, as a reason apparently for what has happened, that we have chiefly consumed the time of the House. That is perfectly true. We have been putting our arguments, and I venture to say they are important and serious arguments.

MR. E. H. BAYLEY: I wish to ask whether, after your ruling, the right hon. Gentleman is in Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman, I understand, is speaking of the future. He is not entitled to refer to what is past.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: With all respect, Sir, I will endeavour to tread the very narrow bridge you have laid for me. I say, then, that we have laid arguments before the Committee; in future also we hope to lay before the Committee further and important arguments, and we shall consume the whole of the time of the Committee unless the Government will reply to us. We have yet had no adequate reply whatever. It is quite true that four Ministers have made brief speeches; but I contend that arguments, and important arguments, have been laid before the Committee which have received no answer at all. What is the case? What might happen in an important Debate at a future stage of this Bill? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin might get up and make an absolutely unanswerable speech—such a speech as has never been heard in this House before without a reply—and the Government might refuse to reply to it. I say that, under these circumstances, of course we should consume the time of the House. There was another argument of my right hon. Friend which must, I think, be called a tu quoque argument. We apparently, throughout this Debate on the Home Rule Bill, are to be subjected to the Closure whenever it pleases the right hon. Gentleman or his Colleagues to think that we have sufficiently consumed the time of the House, because in the past—he refers, I think to the year 1887—the Irish Members were closed upon a Crimes Bill. I may remind the Committee that that was not the first occasion on which the Closure was used. It was used in 1882, and on that occasion it was used by my right hon. Friend the Head of the Government, of which he and I were Members. What I want to point out is that, at all events, that case was entirely different from this. We were dealing then, rightly or wrongly, on both occasions with a Bill the passing of which we believed to be urgently necessary for the peace and order of Ireland. We are dealing now with an immense Constitutional reform, with a totally different subject. It cannot be pretended by anybody that it is a matter of importance whether this Bill passes on one day or another. The Government do not pretend that the matter is so urgent that a few hours or days longer in passing the Bill can make any difference, because the appointed day for the Act coming into operation is postponed considerably after the time when they hope to pass it. That was not the case with regard to the Crimes Act, and therefore I maintain, in spite of the right hon. Gentleman, that his tu quoque is not in any way applicable. The last argument he used was to the effect that he should be justified in the future in putting the Closure upon us because he has been supported on the present occasion by majorities larger than his normal Party majority. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say by that that Members of the Unionist Party have differed from their Party and voted with him? [Cries of "Order!"] I am answering an argument, and I intend to do so. The only force in the argument of my right hon. Friend would be if the Division showed that his majority had been increased by dissensions among the Unionist Party. That is not the case. On the contrary, there were Members of his Party in our Lobby; and although they can take a great deal from my right hon.

Friend, they are unable to follow these very arbitrary proceedings on his part. I make a suggestion for the future in the interest of peace. Why should we go on in this state of comparative warfare? Why should we excite ourselves by continual Motions made, Amendments proposed, and prolonged discussion? Why should not the right hon. Gentleman get up and move that this Bill be reported on Thursday? It is a foregone conclusion. It is the result of a bargain made with hon. Members opposite. They have been "squared"; both sections of the Nationalist Party are now prepared to vote for the Government.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I wish, Sir, to call your attention to the disorderly conduct of the hon. Member for the Shipley Division of Yorkshire, who called out to my right hon. Friend—"How much will it take to square you?"

THE CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon. Member whether he used that expression?

*MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley): I did, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then I must say that it is an expression which ought not to have been used, and the hon. Member ought to withdraw it at once and apologise.

*MR. BYLES: Do I understand you to ask me to withdraw the words?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member ought to withdraw the words and apologise for having used them. I am sure that the hon. Member, on reflection, will do that at once.

*MR. BYLES: It is not for the first or second time that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has insulted my friends opposite. If the right hon. Gentleman will withdraw his imputations against them I will withdraw mine.

THE CHAIRMAN: As I understood the right hon. Gentleman it was this: that in Debate he made a general statement, using the word in a somewhat different sense. I have now to call upon the hon. Member to withdraw, and to draw his attention to the fact that the expression ought not to have been used in this House towards a Member. I therefore think that the hon. Member ought to be called upon at once to withdraw it.

*MR. BYLES: I used the word precisely in the same sense as the right hon Gentleman.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not know whether I am in full possession of the facts, because it is difficult to hear exactly what took place; but I understand that my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham has spoken of the Irish Nationalist Members as having been "squared." Upon that I understood the hon. Member to say—"Would it take much—"[Cries of "No, no!" and "How much?"]—I rather imagine you, Sir, like myself, were not able to hear without the aid of explanation. I do not think such language ought to be used, and it appears to me that it would be greatly to the advantage of the House if both hon. Gentlemen would withdraw.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for his interposition. There is so much noise in the House that I did not exactly hear what the hon. Member said. I heard merely the statement of it as it was repeated to me. If I had understood the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to have used the words he did of the Irish Members in the sense I understood the hon. Member for Shipley to have used them, I should have requested him to withdraw them. The hon. Member for Shipley, as I understand him, says that he only used the words in the sense in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham used them. I can only say I did not so understand him, and that I was mistaken. If so, I think the incident might be allowed to drop.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I wish to ask you, Sir, on a point of Order, for our future guidance in these Debates, whether, when an expression used by an hon. Member is ruled to be an improper expression, and you have called upon him to withdraw it, it is then in the power of that hon. Member to rise in his place and to decline to withdraw the words you have ruled out of Order, and to remain absolutely scot free?

THE CHAIRMAN: I beg to say that rising to Order unnecessarily is in itself disorderly. I will explain again that I misunderstood the sense in which the hon. Member used the words.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am exceedingly sorry, Sir, that my hon.

Friend below me should have taken any notice of the hon. Member for Shipley. I really do not think he is worth it. What I was saying was that the Irish Members had been squared, and I said so in the usual meaning of the word when it is used by important persons in this House to indicate that an arrangement has been come to or a bargain made; and it never entered my head, I am sure, in using that language, to suggest anything in the nature of a mercenary or pecuniary motive. Of course, the intentional offence of what was said by the hon. Member for Shipley was in the language he used—"How much would it take to square you?" I do not object to answer the question, and to say that it would take a great deal more than the hon. Member for Shipley would ever be able to pay. I had nearly come to the end of my observations, and all I have to say is that, of course, if the Government maintain their present policy the result will be a foregone conclusion, and I think we might save ourselves the trouble of continuing these discussions for weeks, and it may be for months, if the Government would at once have the courage of their opinions, and, if they are determined to carry Home Rule through the House of Commons without discussion, they would say so, and let us get on to something else.

Question put.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. Mellor, especially now that the majority of the Government is reduced below its normal number, and after the evidence we have had of the peculiar importance that the Prime Minister attaches to these accidents of Parliamentary majorities, I suppose the Government will have no objection to accede to the Motion I now beg to make—namely, that you do now leave the Chair. They must, I suppose, by this time have convinced themselves that probably the procedure which they have adopted, whatever merit it may have, has not the merit of conducing to the calm and expeditious conduct of Public Business, and perhaps the Chief Secretary now regrets he did not allow the Solicitor General to make the speech he desired to make. But, Sir, I really do not desire to again bring back the House of Commons to that condition of heat to which the behaviour of the Government reduced it a few moments ago. I would only most respectfully suggest to those who have the conduct of business on the Treasury Bench that they ought to draw a most salutary lesson from the proceedings of this evening, and that they should allow us, on future occasions, to discuss matters of first-rate importance for more than three and a-half hours. I hope the Government will make no resistance to the demand I now make. I shall not extend my observations on the point, but shall content myself with moving that you, Sir, do now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: We resist the Motion, Sir.

Question put.

It being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [5th May] reported.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS (ESTIMATES).

CLASS I.

Resolution 1.

"That a sum, not exceeding £31,745, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1894, for Expenditure in respect of Royal Palaces and Marlborough House."

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, there were a number of Palaces and houses not occupied by Her Majesty at Hampton Court and other places, but occupied by various persons ; and he would like to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he did not think it right that as those persons had the places rent free—and, so far as he knew, rates and taxes free—should not keep them in repair ? He would also like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Buckingham Palace grounds could not be thrown open to the public at certain times of the year ? He understood that they were not used at present, except for a garden party now and then, which might occur once in 10 years.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) : The rule is that persons who occupy these houses by leave of Her Majesty shall carry out all internal repairs at their own expense, and only the external repairs are charged on the Estimates. With regard to Buckingham Palace grounds, I cannot give an answer offhand.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution 2.

"That a sum, not exceeding £76,064, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1894, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

*MR. A. C. MORTON asked the First Commissioner of Works whether Kew Gardens could not be opened to the public, who had to pay for their maintenance, at an earlier hour of the day ?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE : I have so recently spoken at length on the subject of the opening of Kew Gardens at an earlier hour that I will not occupy the time of the House by repeating what I said. The opening in the early morning will be attended with considerable expense, and will not be of much advantage to the people of London, as very few persons go there before 12 o'clock. It is also open to scientific men and gardeners by special leave of the Director, who are able to examine the plants in a manner which would be impossible when the public is admitted.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution 3.

"That a sum, not exceeding £33,095, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1894, for the Houses of Parliament Buildings."

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution 4.

"That a sum, not exceeding £41,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1894, for the Extension of the Admiralty Buildings."

*MR. A. C. MORTON asked whether the First Commissioner of Works had any further information to give with regard to these Buildings, both as to the increased cost as compared with the original Estimates and the delay in their erection ?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I said on Friday afternoon that a part of the delay in the erection of the Admiralty Building was due to the fact that the Treasury, during the late Government, had for one year refused to vote any money for it. My statement was denied both by the right hon. Gentleman who was then Secretary to the Treasury and by the late First Commissioner. I have since examined the records in the Office of Works, and find that I am fully justified in what I said. It appears that in January, 1889, the Office of Works found itself in a position to expend £30,000 in the coming year, 1889-90, on the foundation of the building, and asked the Treasury to insert an item in the Estimates on this account. The Treasury, in the first instance, agreed to an Estimate for £25,000; but later, at the last moment, a few days before the Estimates were presented to Parliament, they reduced the item to £500. This practically caused a delay of one year in the work. Incidentally it was the cause of a further delay of 12 months, for when, years later, the Office of Works was in a position to invite tenders for the main building, it was deterred, and properly deterred, from doing so for another year by the prevalence of strikes in the building trade. Thus the action of the Treasury in 1889 practically caused a delay of years in the completion of the building. With reference to the cost, I have nothing to add to what I said on Friday last.

*MR. PLUNKET (Dublin University) said, he had not had an opportunity of referring to the Correspondence; but his strong recollection was that, although there was a reduction in one year, that did not cause any serious delay.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I can only adhere to the statement I have made.

Resolution agreed to.

BURGH POLICE (SCOTLAND) ACT (1892) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 322.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I now ask that the Bill be read a third time.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, that after what had happened that evening it ought to be noticed that the Bill had been allowed to go through without a word of opposition.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES.

MR. MUNDELLA: I beg to move—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the manner in which the Railway Companies have exercised the powers conferred upon them by the Railway Rates and Charges Order Confirmation Acts, 1891 and 1892, and to consider whether it is desirable to adopt any other than the existing means of settling differences arising between the companies and the public with respect to the rates and conditions of charge for the conveyance of goods, and to report what means they recommend.”

*COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) pointed out that there were no Representatives of Manchester, Sheffield, Liverpool, or Glasgow on the Committee.

MR. MUNDELLA hoped the hon. Gentleman would not object. The Motion only asked for a reference to a Committee, and the names could then be finally selected from different sides of the House. The nomination of Members would rest with the House.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH (Bristol, W.) asked, if the Reference to Committee were voted now, would it be possible to take the names after 12 o'clock, or would any opposition stop it?

*MR. SPEAKER said that each name could be submitted separately, and a vote taken on each.

SIR M. HICKS-BEACH said, it was very advisable the Committee should be nominated; and if the Reference were agreed to that night, would the right hon. Gentleman place the names as the first Order on Thursday?

MR. MUNDELLA assented.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) was strongly of opinion that a separate Committee was necessary to consider the case of the Irish railways. Ireland had suffered very much from these railway rates, and no place had suffered more from it than Belfast. For the present he guarded himself from accepting the present Reference.

MR. MUNDELLA expressed the opinion that the hon. Gentleman would make a great mistake if he separated the Irish from the English question, because the Committee would inquire into the rates as they affected both England, Ireland, and Scotland; and Members representing the three countries would be on the Committee.

MR. BARTLEY said, as the matter was so contentious he must object to the Motion being taken at that hour.

Motion deferred.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Tuesday, 9th May 1893.*EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIAL FUNCTIONS IN INDIA.

EXPLANATION.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): My Lords, before the House proceeds with the Notices and Orders of the Day, I wish to make a short explanation. Yesterday, in answer to Lord Stanley of Alderley, I made some observations a portion of which, no doubt owing to my not having been sufficiently distinct, were not quite correctly reported. What I am reported to have said is, I

"in no way admitted that Sir Richard Garth was justified in saying that it was agreed on all hands that it was contrary to right and just principles that civil and judicial powers should be united in one person."

I should be extremely sorry if it should go out to India that that is an expression of my opinion upon that important point, and the more so because I agree entirely with Sir Richard Garth that it is highly undesirable that the judicial and executive powers should be united in one person. But what I did say was that, in reference to a quotation which Lord Stanley of Alderley made from some speech or writing of Sir Richard Garth—

"I could in no way admit that the union of those two powers was maintained in India for the purpose of enhancing the prestige of the officers of the Indian Government."

I observe, also, that I am reported to have stated that the regrettable occurrence itself was a small matter. What I meant to say, and what I believe I said, was that "it was a local matter," and not a small matter at all.

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR) BILL.—(No. 73.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD PLAYFAIR, in moving the Second Reading, said, this was a very important Bill, involving vast interests,

VOL. XII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

both in regard to capital and to the hours of large numbers of servants on railways. The Bill had passed the House of Commons, and it was the outcome of prolonged attention by both Houses of Parliament to the subject of overwork on railways. This overwork did not always arise from employers exacting overtime and overwork; but it frequently arose from the fact that the servants themselves desired to make more wages by working overtime. A Bill on the subject was introduced by Mr. Channing in the other House in 1886. The question of overwork was considered by the House of Lords in 1888, when Lord De La Warr brought before the House the amount of overwork alleged to exist on railways and the oppression of railway servants. On August 8, 1888, their Lordships made an Order for a Return of all cases on railways where men worked for 12 hours, and in which they had not eight hours' consecutive rest. This was a voluminous Return, and it excited considerable public attention. It had been followed up by subsequent Returns in the other House, to which their Lordships' attention need not be directed. Their Lordships would recollect that two or three years ago there was a great railway strike in Scotland. During that strike very flagrant cases were alleged of overwork, and it was admitted to exist under certain circumstances. In 1891 the House of Commons appointed a Select Committee to inquire into the whole case. That Committee was presided over by a statesman of calm and judicial temperament—Sir Michael Hicks-Beach. It sat for two years, and it made its Report in 1892. The terms of the Report were moderate. The Committee said that a general charge of systematic overwork could certainly not be maintained against all railways, and that certain Railway Companies had recently, since their attention had been called to the subject, rectified the overwork on their lines; but they added—

"There are still too many cases in which excessive hours are habitually worked without adequate reason, and that no sufficient effort has been made by the companies generally to deal earnestly and thoroughly with this matter."

The Committee, through mistaking the extent of the Reference the House of Commons had made to them, limited their attention to two classes of servants. The first class were the servants at fixed posts of duty, such as signalmen, shunters, platelayers, and porters; and the second class were the moving staff, such as drivers, firemen, and guards. The Committee soon found that it was impossible in the case of railways to establish a fixed working day of eight hours over all railways and for all classes of railway servants. In factories labour begins and ends with the ringing of a bell at fixed hours. On railways the state of labour could never be absolutely determined in point of time. Accidents, storms, snow, and fog disturbed the working of railways, so that it was impossible to fix an hour at which labour should end. To give an illustration from the evidence before the Committee. In December, 1891, a thick fog lasted for four days over the whole country. The North-Western line got blocked at Crewe Station, and had the railway labour ended at a fixed time, after eight hours' work, 200 trained men would have been required there to cope with the blocking of trains which ensued, and those 200 trained men would not have been required again for the other 361 days in the year. The Unions, in fact, scarcely pressed for a fixed number of hours of labour with any earnestness, though some of them desired that no railway labour should continue above a certain number of hours in the day. The Committee considered this proposal for a maximum, and they found that the individual exceptions would be so numerous as to prevent the exaction of penalties. They did not find it possible to fix the hours even with respect to special classes of labour, such as the men employed in signal-boxes. There were 15,000 signal-boxes throughout the country, and the intensity of the labour in them constantly varied. In London it was hard labour in some signal-boxes for men to remain on duty four hours; in others six hours were as long a spell as a man could properly endure; while in the case of country stations, where only two or three trains pass a day, eight, 10, and even 12 hours could not be considered hard work. The railways themselves had lately tried to meet this difficulty by classifying the boxes into six, eight, 10, and 12 hours boxes. That, of course, could be done by the railways; but legislation could not do it, because exceptions might happen requiring men in eight hour boxes to be relieved in six hours. Any attempt, therefore, at fixing the hours by legislation would be exceedingly difficult. Then, as regarded the running staff, the Committee found it was equally impossible to lay down any rigid labour time. There was, it appeared, great room for improvement in this class of work. According to a Parliamentary Return, there were, for example, certain drivers on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway who in 1891 worked 16½ hours per day, whereas in 1892 the same drivers only worked 12½ hours, so that the railways themselves had to a considerable extent ameliorated the overwork amongst the drivers and guards. The strain on the attention of drivers, moreover, was just as great in variety as it was in regard to signalmen. For the driver of an express six hours was a hard day's work; but for driving a shuttle-train, taking goods into various stations, eight or even 10 hours was not considered heavy labour. Some foreign countries had tried to grapple with this problem by fixing the hours of work. The French Government had received authority to take the police of the railways into their own hands, and they passed rules stating that no driver should work more than 12 hours in the day, and should get 10 hours' uninterrupted rest. What had been the consequence? The law had been wholly evaded, and the railways paid no attention to the rules of the Government in regard to working time on railways. Switzerland had tried the same plan, though with more success. Switzerland said no drivers or guards should work more than 12 hours with 10 hours' rest. The Federal Authorities had been obliged to make a great many exceptions to this law, but still it had not failed as the French law had failed, and some fair limitation of labour existed according to Swiss law. Their Lordships, however, would recognise that, considering the length of Swiss lines and the volume of traffic, Switzerland was scarcely an example which could be followed in this country, where the conditions were so different. He would proceed to explain to the House the nature of this Bill. The nature of the Bill was that it trusted very much to the moral force of publicity. Then in regard to the action of the Bill. A class of railway servants might report to the Board of Trade that they were excessively worked, and the Board of Trade was bound to inquire whether the complaint was substantial. If substantial, then the Board of Trade acted, in the first place, like a Board of Conciliation, and they asked the railway to prepare a schedule of time which would bring the hours into reasonable limits. If the railway did so, and carried its schedule into effect, there was an end of the case; but if the railway refused, then the Board of Trade could summon the railway before the Railway Commission, and that tribunal would examine the schedule and say whether it was fair and just. If the Commission was not satisfied with the schedule, it would ask the railway to prepare another schedule and to act according to it; and if the railway still refused, and continued an unreasonable overworking of its servants, the Railway Commission could make an order that proper working time should be observed, and a heavy penalty of £100 per day might be exacted in default. In the working of the measure the Government believed the proceedings would rarely pass the first stage, because that upon the interference of the Board of Trade, the railways would remedy any overwork which had crept into their systems. Her Majesty's Government believed in the moral force of publicity, because, since the matter came before Parliament, there had been a very great amelioration in overwork on the railways of the Kingdom. Most railways had already improved their regulations so much as regarded hours of labour that there was very little left to be desired. They had, at heavy cost, arranged for increased traffic, had organised reliefs, and had taken especial care to provide comfortable accommodation for the workmen when off duty. Difficulties would not arise on the large and well-organised railways. The difficulty of working the Bill would be on poor and bad-paying lines, but even they would find that the law proposed was not a rigid and inelastic one, and by conference with the Board of Trade they would gain time to improve their system without going before the Court and undergoing penalties. The leading principle of the Bill was that the Board of Trade, as representing the Government, did not interfere in any way with the full responsibility of the railway managers. It was entirely left to the railways to carry out the regulation of the traffic and to carry out discipline amongst their employed. The Bill extended to all railway servants in the Kingdom. It was a large order, because the railway servants numbered from 390,000 to 400,000. Of course, a large industry like the railways of this country might be inconvenienced—though there was as little restraint on them as was possible—by an examination of complaint on the part of their servants, but the numbers of the workmen and their grievances in the past entitled them to protection. Under the operative portions of the Bill as much friendly communication between the Board of Trade and the railways as possible, in the first instance, was secured; and it was only when the Railway Companies continued in default that the interference of the Railway Commission was brought in. He begged to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

R

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Playfair.)

*LORD BALFOUR would certainly offer no objection to the Second Reading of the Bill. The noble Lord in charge of the Bill had in the very able and exhaustive explanation he had given to the House fully stated the reasons which had prompted the Board of Trade and the other House of Parliament to take action in this important matter; but as he was at the Board of Trade during all the time that this question was before it, he wished to make a few remarks upon the Bill. In regard to its main features it would, he believed, meet with general acceptance, but there were one or two points in which it went beyond the Report of the Committee of the other House of Parliament and beyond what was generally recognised as necessary by the public. Up to the present time there were two considerations which mainly guided Parliament in interfering with the freedom of adult labour—the one was the health of those employed, and the other that nothing should be done which was contrary to the public interest or the public safety. The noble Lord had told their Lordships that the Bill did not impose any statutory limitation of time beyond which railway servants should not work. In acting on that principle their Lordships would agree that the promoters of the measures had exercised a wise discretion. He entirely concurred with the noble Lord that the conditions under which railway service was carried on were such that no hard and fast line could be adopted. Railway servants were of more than one class, as the speech of the noble Lord indicated. There were some who were engaged in the working of the traffic, and others who were employed in the factories or workshops, and who had nothing whatever to do with the moving of trains in any capacity. He understood the noble Lord to draw a distinction between the two classes engaged in the moving of trains—the guards and drivers, and the signalmen and porters. This Bill in the very first clause drew such a distinction, because it put the cases of persons engaged in working the traffic in a different category from “any class of railway servants” mentioned in the first two lines of the clause. With regard to the hours of labour of those who were engaged in working the traffic and moving the trains, the public had come very conclusively to the opinion that a case had been made out for legislation. Statistics had been systematically collected for five or six years by the Board of Trade, and since that time a Committee of the House of Commons had been sitting for two Sessions. In their Report it had been conclusively shown that a gradual improvement in the conditions under which railway servants worked had been brought about, partly by the force of public opinion, partly from the action taken by the railway servants themselves, and partly from the more enlightened views of the managers of some of the leading railway lines. In the case of most of the larger lines there was no great cause of complaint, but there were others in a different category, and most people would agree with the Committee that, after all was said and done, a case for legislation had been made out. At the same time, it must not be forgotten that there were great difficulties in regularly managing the traffic of a great railway. As the noble Lord has alluded to fogs, I may confirm his reference by saying that, in his evidence before the Committee, the late Sir G. Findlay stated that, even if he had 200 additional men, who would be useless for the rest of the year, during those particular days he would not have been able to do the work at Crewe Station alone with sufficient rapidity and complete efficiency. Then, in addition to difficulties from the elements, railway managers had sometimes exceptional volumes of traffic unexpectedly thrown upon them. In the case of a large cattle market in Ireland, owing to the circumstance that the owners in the early part of the day held over their cattle in order to get better prices, the whole business was done very late in the evening, and the Railway Company had to employ their servants to a very late hour. He did not wish to weary the House, but only desired to point out that statistics without explanation are not always quite reliable. When considering the statistics in conference with some of the officers of the Board of Trade, their attention was directed to an instance on the Brighton and South Coast Railway, in which an engine driver was said to have been employed for 16 or 18 hours. Meeting the manager of the railway soon after, he learnt that what the man had done was to run an excursion train early in the day from London to Brighton, and in the evening from Brighton to London. He had done no other work, but spent the interval between the two journeys—some 10 hours—on the beach. At first sight the report looked very bad, for that driver was, of course, technically on duty all the time, but their Lordships would agree with him that the man was more likely to have had a happy day than otherwise. It was stated in the Report of the Committee that in some cases interfering with the hours would not be agreeable to the men themselves; that the great Railway Servants' Societies did not include all the men, and that it was universally admitted that railway service was extremely popular. Several railway servants protested against interference by the Legislature with their hours of work. On the other hand, it was right that the public safety should be considered, and that, although the men themselves might not be altogether desirous of having their hours of work limited, care should be taken that those in charge of trains should not be worked such long hours that they could not have their faculties completely about them. He did not know whether any opposition was to be offered to the Bill on the part of the Railway Companies. The noble Lord had stated that no opposition was offered in the Grand Committee by the Railway Directors then present to the inclusion of all their servants, those engaged in factories and works, in the purview of the Bill as well as those engaged in working the traffic. Of course, this was not the stage at which to offer any opposition to that provision, but he would not like to let the Bill go beyond this stage without calling attention to the fact that, so far as regarded those who were employed in factories and workshops and who had nothing to do with the moving of trains, if the Bill were passed in its present shape their Lordships would for the first time be interfering with adult labour without due consideration. The Committee of the other House had sat for two years, and had not taken a particle of evidence with regard to that large class of railway servants; and, in fact, the very first sentences of the Report proved conclusively to his mind that the class alone who were engaged in working the traffic was in the mind of the Committee when they made their Report. The Bill itself contained words showing at the outset that it applied to railway servants connected with working the traffic, and he thought a very simple alteration would limit the Bill to that class and exclude the other large class working in the factories and workshops. He would content himself, however, at this stage of the Bill with calling the attention of the House to the question, and would leave for further consideration the advisability of making the alteration he had suggested. He shared the opinion and belief of the noble Lord in charge of the Bill, that if the Bill became law, as he hoped it might, it would be made operative through the pressure of public opinion, backed up by the Board of Trade, on the Railway Companies. But if it was necessary to have the big stick in the background, it was desirable that that big stick should be made as efficient as possible. The 4th clause provided that—

“If a Railway Company fail to comply with any order made by the Railway and Canal Commission in pursuance of this section, or to enforce the provisions of any schedule submitted to the Railway and Canal Commission in pursuance of any such order, and approved by that Commission, the company shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £100 for every day during which the default continues.”

Therefore, he desired to call the noble Lord's attention to the point whether, if a company was brought before the Railway and Canal Commission, and was fined for failing to comply with its orders, the Commission had the means of recovering the penalty inflicted, or whether there was any jurisdiction on the part of the Commission to enforce the orders they made. He concurred in the belief that the Bill was likely to prove a very useful measure, and he hoped their Lordships would give it a Second Reading.

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS, having been for many years much interested in and mixed up with railway matters, had only to express the hope that their Lordships would assent to the Second Reading, and he believed the opinion of most persons connected with railway management was in favour of the measure. Whilst admitting the distinction drawn by the noble Lord who had just spoken between the two classes of railway servants, he hoped that no alteration would be made in the Bill to necessitate its being sent back to the other House, and endanger its becoming law.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL IMPORTS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in the absence of Lord RIBBLESDALE moved—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report whether legislation for the purpose of requiring the foreign or colonial origin of imported agricultural and horticultural produce—and especially meat, cheese, and fruit—to be marked thereon or otherwise indicated, was necessary, expedient, and feasible; and, if so, what were the provisions which such legislation should comprise; and that the Lords following be named of the Committee:—

E. Winchilsea and Nottingham.	L. Wigan. (E. Crawford and Balcarres.)
E. Onslow.	L. Lawrence.
L. Carrington.	L. Wimborne.
(L. Chamberlain.)	L. Rothschild.
L. Vernon.	L. Monkswell.
L. Ribblesdale.	L. Mount Stephen.

Their Lordships would remember that a promise to move for this Committee was given when Lord Onslow recently moved upon the subject.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS asked whether it would be possible to include in the Instructions to the Committee an inquiry into the adulteration of foreign produce imported into this country? He would also like to know why butter was excluded from this Committee? As regarded adulteration, a grievance had been expressed by small shopkeepers summoned under the Food and Drugs Act for selling adulterated butter, cheese, and other produce. In their defence they referred the Magistrates to the wholesale dealers, who in turn referred to the foreign importer, against whom there was no remedy. In fact, under the Food and Drugs Act this adulterated foreign produce did not come before the Inspectors until it was exposed for public sale. He would be glad to know from the noble Earl whether this question of the adulteration of imported foreign food could be included? If not, he would place on the Paper a question on the subject.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I had no notice of this question, but I can answer it at once. We shall not be able to include the question of food adulteration in the Instructions to the Committee. The Committee is to be appointed to deal with a particular point, and adulteration is altogether a separate question. It is an important one, no doubt; but it would be undesirable to weight the Committee with a wholly different subject from that which it was appointed to investigate. With regard to butter, that matter was dealt with very fully, as the noble Duke will remember, in connection with margarine, and the Government did not think another inquiry into the subject at the present time was necessary.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW understood that the marking of foreign and colonial butter would not be excluded from the consideration of the Committee.

The Earl of Kimberley

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No. I thought the question had reference rather to margarine; but, of course, butter will come in with the other produce. The question was with regard to the adulteration of butter, and I do not think an inquiry into that by this Committee is necessary.

Motion agreed to.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I beg to move that the name of Lord Melville be substituted for that of Lord Lawrence on the Committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 9th May 1893.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON AND SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY BILL (by Order).

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said, he could not allow this Bill to pass without a protest against the treatment Scotland had received at the hands of the President of the Board of Trade and his Colleagues, in having arranged for only one Representative for Scotland on the Railway Rates and Charges Committee. He regretted that none of the nine Members who represented Scotland, on the Treasury Bench, were in their places. Those gentlemen were sent to the House to represent Scotch as well as Imperial interests, and he would appeal to them to see that Scotland was fairly treated in this matter.

*MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, he agreed with the hon. Member that something ought to be done with regard to this Committee.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is irregular to discuss the composition of a Committee which has not yet been struck, on the Third Reading of a Railway Bill. If the hon. Member has any objection to the Committee he should raise it when the question of the nomination of the Members comes on for discussion.

*MR. A. C. MORTON apologised for having been out of Order. He wished to say, however, that he had warned the London and South Western Railway Company that if they did not take steps to give their third-class passengers better accommodation he should have to oppose their Bills on the Third Reading. Great complaints were made of overcrowding through insufficiency in the supply of carriages; and though the Board of Trade was appealed to, they were told that that Department could do nothing in the matter. The Government were able to prevent overcrowding in omnibuses and tramcars; and it was, therefore, strange that they could do nothing to benefit third-class railway passengers in the same direction. The Railway Companies enjoyed a great monopoly; they were able to drive away all sorts of competition, the people being obliged to use the trains provided as best they could. The balance sheets of the Companies showed that they made their profits out of the third-class passengers—that the third-class really had to pay for the superior accommodation provided for the first and second-class passengers—therefore he thought that these travellers ought to receive more consideration. He had to complain, also, of first-class carriages or compartments being reserved —it was suggested in some cases for gambling purposes; also that the lavatory accommodation (especially for third-class passengers) and the warming of carriages in the winter were deficient. He did not propose to proceed to extremities to-day, as the Manager of the Railway, Mr. Scotter, had written him a letter which showed that the Company were prepared to endeavour to overcome the deficiencies complained of, still the time might come when it would be necessary to set an example by throwing out one of these Railway Bills. He did not say that the London and South Western Railway was the worst. There were others on the south side of the Thames which gave more cause for complaint. The railways on the north side paid a great deal of attention to the accommodation of third-class passengers, and he wished the Southern Companies would follow that example. In his letter Mr. Scotter had expressed himself astonished to hear that the accommodation in the third-class carriages was complained of, as the Company had lately considerably added to their stock of these carriages, all of them being of the latest kind. He added that he was at a loss to understand the complaints, but that if particulars were furnished him he would take care that they should be investigated, and that the matter should be put right. For the present he (Mr. Morton) proposed to rely on that statement, and to trust to the Company to do what was fair and right towards the third-class passengers. In any case, he trusted the House would see that justice was done, especially to the industrial classes of the country and the people who were compelled to use third-class railway carriages.

SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton) thought that the London and South Western Company was endeavouring to do its duty towards its third-class passengers, and he had received the assurance of the Company that attention was being paid to the matter.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) BILL (by Order).

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Mr. A. C. Morton

*MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) said, the only portion of the Bill with which he had reason to find fault was Clause 15. Under that clause the London Vice County Council would have the power to expend £10,000 per year upon any matter which they pleased, without specifying beforehand what it was. From China to Peru, they could select subjects for investigation and inquiry, and spend the money of the ratepayers in pursuing those subjects. As an illustration of the truth of this statement, he would quote an answer he had received from the Vice-Chairman of the London County Council. Asked if under the Bill it would not be possible to organise a special expedition to China or India, Mr. Dickinson replied — "I think we might very reasonably inquire into the Municipal Government of some of their larger cities." Well, if that was to be the ground on which the London County Council were to spend the money of the ratepayers in London, it was time Parliament came to an understanding with the London County Council on the subject. He had always been under the impression that the London County Council was an administrative body created by Parliament for the express purpose of fulfilling certain duties prescribed and limited by Parliament, and spending the money of the public in specific methods and on specific objects; but that did not appear to be the idea of the County Council. He thought it right that the House should now express its opinion as to whether Parliament or the County Council were right in theory. Clause 15 would have the effect of repealing a certain section in the Acts of 1890, 1891, and 1892, under which the County Council possessed the power to spend sums of money amounting to £16,000 on certain specific objects—namely, £15,000 on inquiry into the water supply of London, and £1,000 on inquiry respecting markets. The County Council did not wish to be limited in the subjects to which they could devote this, and they said, practically—"The whole world is a subject for investigation to us; the qualification of Members of Parliament, even, is not beyond our ken, or the relations of different parts of the City one to another, or the relations of one part of the Kingdom to another." Originally the County Council asked for power to spend any sum they chose; but the amount had been limited by the Select Committee. Against that Committee he had nothing to say, except that he did not think it convenient that Members of the London County Council should be upon it. He could not agree to those gentlemen being upon a tribunal sitting to try their own cause. The Committee had had before them a Report from the President of the Local Government Board objecting to the powers asked for by the County Council, and another from the Home Secretary. The Secretary of State, reporting on Clause 15, had said he thought the proposal too wide, and suggested that the inquiries should only extend to subjects coming within the scope of the statutory powers and duties of the London County Council. That was a statesmanlike view of the matter, and that was all that he (Mr. Kimber) asked should be done. The power of spending money ad libitum was one which the House hitherto had not delegated to Public Bodies; and if this Bill were carried in its present form other County Councils throughout the Kingdom would endeavour to obtain similar powers. He thought Clause 15 should be referred back, with instructions that they should either insert words in it suggested by the Secretary of State limiting the subsidy to some of the subjects which were at present under the charge of the County Council by virtue of the Statutes already passed, or specifying other subjects which might be included. He wished to guard himself from imputing unworthy motives to any gentlemen on the London County Council; but he submitted that the powers contained in the Bill were such as had never yet been delegated to any Municipal Body in the country. No doubt £10,000 spread over the ratepayers of the County of London was a small matter; but he held that it would be in the highest degree impolitic to set this example to Provincial Municipalities. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "now read the third time," in order to add the words "recommitted to the former Committee."—(Mr. Kimber.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'now read the third time' stand part of the Question."

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) was astonished that the hon. Member for Wandsworth had not told the House what was the opinion of the Committee which had sat upon the Bill with regard to Clause 15. Clause 15 was in the Bill, and the County Council had given evidence as to why they wanted power for investigating into matters that they considered of importance. They explained that at the present time the County Council had not power to spend money on small books dealing with public questions in which they were interested. The Committee had gone into the question as to whether the London County Council should be allowed to spend a certain sum of money as they wished, and also as to whether they should require the County Council to draw up a list of subjects of expenditure for them to inquire into. The Committee thought it better to fix upon £10,000 as the sum which the County Council might spend annually, but which they might not exceed. If the House tried to specify the objects on which this money might be spent, it would probably be undertaking a task in which it was doomed to failure. The Chairman of the Committee was the late Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Stuart-Wortley. Eight Members of the Committee were in favour of what the Committee had recommended to the House, and the only objection which was raised was by the hon. Member for Wandsworth; but even he did not challenge a Division. The hon. Member had a right to challenge a Division, but he contented himself with his own protest. The Committee had very carefully considered the matter, and he hoped the House would confirm its decision.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, he considered that the power would lead to economy, not extravagance. He should be very much surprised if the London County Council spent the whole of the money which it was now proposed to vote. They did not contemplate doing anything of the kind. It was, of course, impossible to tell exactly what subject might require investigation, or the expenses of any particular inquiry would amount to. The power was already possessed by other Municipalities, and he was not aware that it had ever been abused. He hoped that the House would support the practically unanimous decision of the Committee.

MR. KIMBER said, that, as the House would have to deal with this question on a future occasion, he did not now propose to take a Division.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

THE IMPROVEMENT OF IRISH HARBOURS.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, in view of the fact that previous to the passing of the Act 46 & 47 Vic. c. 26, in 1883, which granted a sum of £250,000 out of the Irish Church Fund, for the improvement of harbours in Ireland, the Treasury were in the habit of granting, for many years, sums varying from £3,000 to £5,000 a year, for similar purposes in Ireland, and that since the passing of that Act such grants have been suspended; and whether, considering the great want in many places in Ireland for proper accommodation for poor fishermen, such grants will now be renewed by the Treasury?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The suspension of the grants referred to by the hon. Member began in 1875, but they did not disappear from the Estimates till the year 1885-6. I may explain that, under Section 7 of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, repayments in respect of loans advanced under that Act may be applied by the Board of Works for the purposes of the Act, though the balance at present available is already allocated to works in progress. I am not aware of any intention to renew grants under the older Acts.

MR. FIELD: Is there no fund in existence from which grants can be made for the purposes set forth in the last paragraph of the question?

Sir J. Lubbock

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: There is no fund out of which we can make grants until there is an available balance arising from repayments under the Act of 1883. It will then be possible to apply such balance.

MR. FIELD: And when will it be available?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I cannot say; but I believe it is allocated for some time.

PORTMAHOMACK HARBOUR.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will provide the Scottish Office or the Scottish Fishery Board with sufficient funds to meet the cost of putting the harbour at Portmahomack in such a condition that the fishermen may be able to enter the harbour with their boats at all states of the tide, and thus obviate the decline of this important fishing town?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): In reply to the hon. Member, Portmahomack is a village of about 300 inhabitants, possessing about 25 boats, at the entrance to the Dornoch Firth, in the County of Ross. The County Council have submitted the names of 25 places, where piers, harbours, or boat-slips might be made to advantage. Portmahomack is not in that list. Up to now it has only been possible to entertain 10 out of the 25 sites mentioned. I have received a Petition from the Harbour Committee for better accommodation; but as the County Council have taken no measures for bringing forward the claims of Portmahomack, the Scottish Office does not propose to undertake any work there just now.

MR. CAINE (Bradford, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the entire population of this important fishing town was, according to the last Census, 458?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: Yes; I think it was about that; but it is not in itself a sufficient reason for refusing the grant. It has 25 boats.

*MR. WEIR: Because of the imperfect and dangerous condition of the harbour many of the fishermen have had to use other harbours, which could be entered with safety at all states of the tide.

SWINE FEVER.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is aware that the Report of the recent Departmental Committee on Swine Fever and its recommendations are approved by Members on both sides of this House representing agricultural districts ; and, if so, whether he will at once take steps to bring the recommendations into force ; and whether he will at once propose legislation on the subject ?

MR. FELLOWES (Hunts, Ramsey) : At the same time I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he himself proposes to legislate this Session on swine fever on the lines laid down by the Departmental Committee, or whether he will give facilities for the passing of the Swine Fever Bill now before the House ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden) : In reply to these questions, I may state that I have not yet received the evidence upon which the Report of the Departmental Committee is based ; and it is, therefore, not possible for me to indicate the views of the Government on the subject. I understand, however, that the evidence will be available before the end of next week ; and when this is the case, I will at once give the matter my attentive consideration.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how long the Royal Irish Constabulary Force Fund has been in existence ; for how many years respectively have deductions at the rates of $2\frac{1}{2}$ and $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. been made for the purposes of this fund from the pay of members of the Force ; whether deductions in respect of barrack-rent have also been made towards this fund in the case of unmarried members ; why no deduction towards this fund is made in the case of members who joined the Force since August, 1883 ; how many officers and men at present serving are subscribing towards the fund, and how many pensioners ; how many subscribers died, were dismissed, were discharged, and resigned without having received anything from this fund ; what is the total amount subscribed towards this fund, since its formation, by officers and men ; what is the amount at present on hand, and how has the difference been expended ; and whether it was the unanimous wish of the entire force assembled at the various county headquarters (at their meetings regarding the 6th Schedule of the Government of Ireland Bill) that this fund should be wound up at once, and distributed among the subscribing members ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : The Royal Irish Constabulary Force Fund has existed since the establishment of the Force. Deductions at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. were never made for the fund. The rate of deduction was 10s. per cent. for the first 30 years, and subsequently, as at present, $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The deduction for barrack accommodation, authorised by the Constabulary Act of 1883, is made from the increased pay provided by the Act, and extends also to married men accommodated with their families in barracks. This deduction has always been appropriated in aid of the Constabulary Vote. By the Act of 1883 the benefit branch of the fund was closed against new entrants, and deduction from the pay of all those who thereafter joined the Force was forbidden. The number of officers and men now serving whose pay is subject to the statutable deduction is approximately 8,730, and the number of subscribing pensioners is 3,426. No official record of cessations without benefit has been kept ; but it is right to point out that the object of the fund being twofold—the reward of meritorious members of the Force and the relief of the widows and children of members—no payments of the former kind could, in the nature of the case, be made to men dismissed, discharged, or who resign, or of the latter kind in respect of those who die unmarried in the Force. It would be impossible, I am informed, at this distance of time to furnish an account of the receipts and expenditure of the fund from its institution over 56 years ago. The fund has been audited from the outset of its career by the Exchequer and Audit Department. The invested balance of the fund, amounting to £304,000, is in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, and there is a current cash balance of about £2,500 in the public account of the Inspector General. In reference to the question of the winding up of the fund, I understand that many and diverse opinions and suggestions have been expressed by members of the Force, which are inconsistent with the object of the fund as expressed by Act of Parliament, and quite impracticable. I have already stated, in reply to an inquiry addressed to me on April 17, that the only possible winding up appears to be that provided by the Act of 1883—namely, by the natural process of fulfilling its obligations to existing members as they become due.

THE MATERIAL AND MORAL PROGRESS OF INDIA.

MR. NAOROJI (Finsbury, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the Annual Report of the Material and Moral Progress of India does not give such statistical and other information and views as are contained in Sir David Barbour's Note, and are necessary to enable the House to form a correct judgment of the progress, if any, of India; and whether, under such circumstances, he will accede to the request to give the Return of Sir David Barbour's Note, and of similar information to date?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): For reasons which I gave on the 27th April, the Secretary of State is unable to lay Sir D. Barbour's Note on the Table, and I am not prepared to make any comparison between its contents and those of the Annual Reports. The Decennial Report is now being prepared, and may, not improbably, give my hon. Friend some of the information which he requires. As to the Statistical Return for which my hon. Friend wishes to move, he is aware that the Secretary of State has asked the Government of India whether they can give it, and is awaiting their reply.

THE GARVE AND ULLAPOOL RAILWAY.

MR. WILLIAM WHITELAW (Perth): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if the Scotch Office is in communication with the Treasury with regard to an application for an annual subsidy towards the making and working of a line of railway from Garve to Ullapool?

Mr. J. Morley

SIR G. TREVELYAN: No, Sir; I cannot say that the Departments are in communication on the subject at the present time.

MR. WHITELAW: Does the Scotch Office intend to recommend the Treasury to grant a subsidy?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I prefer not to answer that question without notice.

LIVERPOOL POST OFFICE.

MR. WILLOX (Liverpool, Everton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General why, having regard to his statement on the 9th February that a tender for the foundations of the new Post Office at Liverpool had been accepted, and that the work would be shortly commenced, operations have not yet been commenced on the foundations; and whether he will endeavour to accelerate as much as possible the commencement of building operations, in order that employment may be found for some of the men now idle in Liverpool?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): The foundations of the Liverpool new post office would have been begun some weeks ago but for a misunderstanding with the firm whose tender has been accepted in regard to the terms of the proposed contract with them. Until this has been removed, it is not possible to put the works in hand; but the Office of Works is doing all that it can to arrive at a settlement.

COAL DUTIES AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government is aware that the difficulties put in the way of English and other coal merchants in Constantinople are owing to applications being made to the Turkish Government by a local syndicate to obtain the monopoly of the coal business in that port, and that one of the applications bears the name of Redoan Pasha, Prefect of Constantinople, in whose hands the refusal or acceptance partly rests; and whether Her Majesty's Government will immediately use their influence to prevent this scheme, which would have an oppressive action on English coal merchants at present established at Constantinople, and raise the price of coal materially in that port?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): We do not possess information to this effect, but the statement made by my hon. Friend shall be sent to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople.

THE INDIAN FIELD ARTILLERY.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Government of India have for some considerable period been pressing the authorities at home to re-arm the Field Artillery in India, and have provided money to meet this expenditure; and whether the failure to replace the 120 nine-pounder muzzle-loading guns still in India by modern breechloaders is due to delay on the part of the Ordnance Authorities at home or to the Government of India itself?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): I would refer the hon. Member to my reply made on March 27 to the hon. Member for West Belfast, in which I stated that of 347 field guns demanded by the Indian Government 270 had already been shipped to India, 36 more awaited shipment (of which 24 have now been shipped), and of the remaining 41, 38 were well advanced in the Ordnance Factories. Of these, I can now say that 10 have already been issued, 10 are completed and under inspection, 11 have passed proof and will be ready for final inspection shortly, and seven more will be ready by the end of May.

MR. HANBURY: Is the delay due to the Home Authorities or to the Indian Government?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot say without referring to India. As far as the Home Authorities are concerned, the hon. Member must be aware that during the last three or four years there has been a great demand for heavy guns, both for ships and coaling stations, and that, no doubt, led to some delay in the execution of orders for India.

MR. SPENCER BALFOUR.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can yet give any information as to the progress of the negotiations for the surrender of Jabez Spencer Balfour?

SIR E. GREY: No further information has been received since the last question was asked. The Argentine Government have hitherto declined to surrender Balfour in consequence of there being no Extradition Treaty between them and the United Kingdom.

CARNARVON EDUCATION SCHEME.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the scheme under the Welsh Intermediate Education Act for the County of Carnarvon, that has been approved of by the Committee of Council on Education, has been approved of by Her Majesty; and, if not, what is the cause of the delay?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): The Carnarvon County Scheme is awaiting approval at the next meeting of the Privy Council, which will, I understand, be held on the 17th instant. No meeting of the Council has been held since the 9th April, when the period during which the scheme had to be laid before Parliament expired.

LONDON UNIVERSITY EXAMINATION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether any steps are being taken to provide the necessary accommodation for the scientific examinations in the University of London?

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: The Government has not lost sight of the subject referred to in the question. A portion of the site at Millbank will be reserved for the purpose in connection with the provision of examination rooms for the Civil Service Commissioners; but I am unable to say when the buildings will be commenced.

THE ARMENIAN TRIALS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the funds collected by Madame Thoumaïan in Great Britain were exclusively for the non-political medical hospital open to persons of all creeds at Marsovan, Asia Minor; whether he is aware that Dr. Herrick, the President of Marsovan College now in London, and other well-known missionaries, testify to the high character of Pastor Thoumaïan and Mr. Kujadjian; and if he will state the result, or progress of the trials?

SIR E. GREY: I am aware that the statement in the first paragraph has been made by Madame Thoumaïan and is confirmed by the Superintendent of the Mildmay Conference Hall, who has invested the money collected. I have reason to believe that the opinion of Dr. Herrick is correctly stated, and, as soon as information is received, I shall be ready to state the result or progress of the trial.

SHANGHAI GAOL.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can explain the circumstance of 20 pairs of boots having been supplied to the gaol at Shanghai during the March quarter 1892, at a time when only one prisoner had been detained in the gaol during the quarter, and that one for a period of only three days?

SIR E. GREY: The 20 pairs of boots were ordered to replace a corresponding number which were worn out in 1891. A stock of prisoners' clothing has to be maintained and replenished as the old becomes worn out, and the new supply of any article bears no immediate relation to the number of prisoners charged for in any given quarter.

STATIONERY OFFICE CONTRACTS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in the year ending 31st March, 1892, there were instances of payments to firms of contractors by the Stationery Office in excess of the amount that these firms could legally claim under the terms of their contract; whether he can state who the contractors were and what were the sums so paid for them; and what steps have been, or will be, taken to prevent the recurrence of this practice?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: There has been no time to obtain particulars of the payments referred to; but I am assured by the Comptroller of the Stationery Office that every such advance has been made in accordance with the conditions stated in paragraph 6 of the Fourth Report of the Public Accounts Committee of 1890. The advances have been reported on by the Comptroller and Auditor General in his Report on the Appropriation Accounts for 1891-2, and will come in due course before the Public Accounts Committee; and I think it better, therefore, to defer any statement pending the Committee's Report.

ATTACKS ON MR. BINDEN BLOOD.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a third attempt has been made on the life of Mr. Binden Blood, a resident in County Clare; whether he is aware of the grounds of the persistent persecution of Mr. Blood; and whether the names of the would-be assassins are well-known in the neighbourhood of Mr. Blood's residence?

MR. J. MORLEY: This gentleman was fired at on the 5th inst., but fortunately the shots took no effect. This is the third outrage directed against Mr. Blood. In August, 1889, he was fired at under circumstances similar to those in the present case, and in March, 1890, shots were fired into his dwelling. The same motive is assigned in all three cases, and arises out of the eviction of a man who was formerly in Mr. Blood's employment. The identity of the ruffians who instigated these outrages, or who participated in their commission, has been pretty confidently suspected by the police during the past four years; but so far no evidence has been forthcoming which would lead to their conviction.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Did the late Government hold an inquiry on this matter under the Secret-Inquiry Clauses of the Coercion Act?

MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot answer that question.

MR. CARSON: Does the present Government intend to hold such an inquiry?

MR. J. MORLEY: As no secret inquiry in the County of Clare has ever led to a conviction, I do not see why we should.

PETITIONS IN LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has since received any information as to the signing of anti-Home Rule Petitions in the Derry Lunatic Asylum?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am informed that no such Petition was prepared in the asylum, but that one was presented by outsiders for signatures to the officers of the institution who wished to sign it. No pressure was put upon any officer to sign.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Is anybody allowed to go into an asylum and ask the warders and lunatics to sign Petitions?

[No answer was given.]

BOYCOTTING IN COUNTY CLARE.

MR. HORACE PLUNKETT (Dublin Co., S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a notice has been extensively posted in County Clare, especially between Ennystymon and Ballyvaughan, calling upon the Nationalists of Clare to hold no intercourse with Dan O'Brien of Ballinacarra and Murray, of Loughrea, the notorious grabbers of Ballyheale, lately occupied by The O'Donnellan Blake Forster; and whether any, and if so what, steps have been taken to prevent O'Brien and Murray being boycotted?

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.E.) : Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question, may I ask him if he is aware that the Chief Secretary in the last Government always declined to give the names of persons alleged to be boycotted on the ground that additional publicity was not in their interests? Is he also aware that Mr. Forster is a Protestant gentleman very popular in the locality?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am not able to answer that question. I am informed that it is true a number of printed notices of the nature indicated in the question have been posted in the district mentioned. The police are taking every possible precaution for the safety of O'Brien and Murray, and a protection post has been formed at Ballyheale.

THE "JOHN LAMBERT" CHARITY AT SHEEPSHED.

MR. JOHNSON-FERGUSON (Leicester, Loughborough) : I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire whether his attention has been called to the fact that, under the scheme sanctioned by the Charity Commissioners on 7th August, 1883, for the administration of the Charity of John Lambert, in the Parish of Sheepshed, in the County of Leicester, the Trustees are directed, after paying all proper costs of the administration of the Charity, and setting apart an annual sum of £15 as a repair fund, to divide all the net yearly income of the Charity into three equal parts, two such parts to be applied to the advancement of the education of children who are residents in the Parish of Sheepshed, and the remaining part to be applied for the benefit of necessitous persons resident in the Parish of Sheepshed, either by subscriptions in aid of the funds of any hospital, or by contributions towards the cost of the outfit, upon entering upon a trade or occupation, of any person under the age of 21 years; and that in 1892 the net income of this Charity was £67 1s. 3d.; the amount applied in aid of education, £16 7s.; the balance contributed to dispensaries, hospitals, and infirmaries, £11 11s.; the balance of net income, £39 3s. 3d., being unexpended; whether he is aware that, notwithstanding the provisions of the scheme, deserving and necessitous persons, residing in the Parish of Sheepshed, have been unable to obtain recommendations to the Loughborough Dispensary, while there was unapplied income available for the purpose; and that a duly qualified parishioner has been refused by the Trustees an opportunity of examining the scheme of the Charity and the accounts for 1892, although it is provided in the scheme that every parishioner shall be entitled to do so; and whether the Charity Commissioners will take steps to prevent such irregularities in future?

*THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire) : The statements made in the first question as to the scheme for regulating this Charity are accurate. The trustees assert that there are already more recommendations for the Loughborough Dispensary than there are applicants, and that the scheme and accounts are open to inspection; but in consequence of complaints conveyed by the hon. Member the Commissioners have written to the trustees, pointing out the necessity of carrying out the scheme in the matter of the production of the scheme and proper publication of the accounts.

THE HOME RULE BILL.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Treasury has had prepared, and will lay immediately before Parliament, a Paper showing all the successive amounts that will be charged as a first charge on the Irish Consolidated Fund, under the following clauses of the Bill for the Government of Ireland:—(1) under Clauses 14, 15, 16; (2) under the subsections (a), (b), (c) of Clause 26; (3) under Clauses 27 and 28?

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): May I ask whether it is not the fact that the charges referred to in the question are chiefly of a prospective, and more particularly of a contingent character?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): There is an apparent confusion or misprint in the noble Lord's question—in that part relating to subsections (a), (b), and (c), of Clause 26. What my hon. Friend has intimated is substantially correct—that is to say, that there is no such account at all, as far as I am aware, at the Treasury. The Treasury could give a list of the charges without the amounts if the noble Lord desires it; but the amounts are not yet known.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: The question is not printed correctly; Clause 26 should be Clause 28. Would it be possible for the House to inform itself as to the estimated Revenues of Ireland unless it is put in possession of all, or at any rate the greater part, of this information? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the language of the Bill is most precise as to all the charges, and that the Revenue of Ireland cannot be estimated until the amounts of all the charges which are placed as first charges are known?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The amounts depend on certain proceedings to be taken in the course of the Bill. They are not at present within the knowledge of the Treasury. If it can be done before we come to the Financial Clauses, I shall be glad to have it done.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): Will the right hon. Gentleman at once cause to be put before us a statement of the amounts as far as they have actually been ascertained, and of the amount of debt which would come under the clause where 4 per cent. is to be paid? That is an amount which is known or ascertainable; and it would assist the deliberations of the Committee if we had before us so much of the charges and liabilities on the Irish Exchequer as are actually known, and if we had also, as soon as possible, an estimate of the charges which would come under this Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman had better put that question on the Paper. I can answer it more satisfactorily under those circumstances.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether inquiries have recently been undertaken by the Government as to the true proportion of whisky paying duty and Excise in Ireland, and consumed respectively in Ireland and Great Britain; whether this inquiry has shown that the proportion consumed in Great Britain is much larger than was assumed when the financial arrangements of the Bill for the Government of Ireland were settled; and whether this error will alter materially the amount attributed to Excise in the estimate of an Irish Budget presented to the House; if so, whether he will immediately lay upon the Table of the House a new Return showing the correct amount?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It may be remembered that in 1886 the Government were not able to submit an estimate of the division of Irish Excise receipts between Great Britain and Ireland. But in the present year an attempt had been made to do that, and it had been done upon the basis of the actual figures of 1891-2, and the Budget Estimate for 1892-3. We found on examination, however, that those figures were not quite correctly taken, and a very strict examination in the matter is now going on. But that examination is not yet completed, though it will be shortly; and in due time the figures will be submitted to the House, so that everything will be quite clear and well understood before the House is called upon to come to a decision.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : Has the inquiry proceeded far enough to enable the right hon. Gentleman to state whether the statement in question is correct, and whether the result of the corrections would be to lessen the amount credited to Excise in the Irish Budget?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I believe that the amount really due to Great Britain from Excise has been underestimated.

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford) : May I ask whether the investigation relating to the amounts paid by Ireland in respect of Excise has been extended to the Customs and Stamps and other receipts for the last financial year, and when the result of the investigation will be laid on the Table?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : The case of the Customs is entirely and absolutely distinct. Stamps involve no serious question of a transfer of revenue.

MR. GOSCHEN : The matter is so important that I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I make a further request. Will he undertake to instruct the Treasury to press forward with the corrections of any of the Returns which have been made to us, showing the contributions hitherto made by Ireland and the various percentages? These would vary if it could be shown that the consumption of Irish whisky in England has been larger than has been estimated in past years. That would affect the correctness of the figures hitherto given. Have the Treasury kept their eye on that, so that fresh Returns may be laid upon the Table of the House as soon as possible, showing the real figures in times past?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : We shall get the actual state of the facts as soon as we can, and all consequential corrections will be duly made. The House will be placed in possession of the facts in the best form and at the earliest period before it is called upon to discuss the Financial Clauses.

LORD R. CHURCHILL : I should like to explain to the right hon. Gentleman that I find, on referring to the Bill, the Sub-sections (a), (b), (c), referred to in my question are in Clause 14, and not Clause 26.

SUPPLY.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it will be necessary to take another Vote on Account; and, if so, will it be taken before Whitsuntide?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : It will not be necessary to take any Vote on Account before Whitsuntide.

THE ENGLISH AND SCOTCH REGISTRATION BILLS.

SIR JOHN KINLOCH (Perth, E.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the interest taken by the people of Scotland in the Registration of Voters (Scotland) Amendment Bill, the Government intend to take the discussion on Second Reading before Whitsuntide?

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire) : At the same time, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can give such facilities as will admit of the Scotch Registration Bill being considered and passed into law this Session?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : The Government look upon the Registration Bills for England and Scotland as united, in being a part of the necessary work of the Session—of the work which we intend to use every effort in our power to get through. I do not think I should be wise, in the present state of business, if I attempted to specify the precise time at which we shall take the Second Reading.

MOTION.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That leave be given to bring in a Bill to put an end to the Establishment of the Church of Scotland, and to deal with the Public Endowments thereof on the occurrence of vacancies.”
—(Dr. Cameron.)

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright) : I ask leave to oppose the introduction of this Bill. We have had no explanation of the Bill beyond what appears on the Paper. This is a very important Bill, and concerns all parts of Scotland and every inhabitant of Scotland; and, judging from the opinion in Scotland, as far as I can gather, the people are opposed to such a proposal. I therefore oppose the Motion.

*DR. CAMERON: The case of the Church of Scotland is proposed to be dealt with by a number of Members of this House. Various Members have introduced Bills with which I emphatically disagree; but I and those who think with me have not opposed their introduction. The hon. Member for Glasgow University has introduced one Bill. I entirely disagree with that Bill, and I shall certainly oppose it at any future stage; but I thought it proper that no obstacle should be put in the way of the Bill being placed before Parliament and the country. Then the Member for Peebleshire had introduced a Bill for a referendum. With respect to that referendum, I only say horresco referens; but we thought it desirable that he should have an opportunity of placing his views before the House. The Government has another scheme in the shape of a Suspensory Bill. But it has been considered by a number of Scotch Members that it would be very desirable that a concrete proposition embodying our views on the subject of Disestablishment and Disendowment and our fashion of dealing with the question should be placed before the country. These views have now been embodied in a Bill. That Bill we ask the House to read a first time with a view to the provisions it contains being made known to this House and to the people of Scotland. I do not venture to pronounce an opinion as to whether they may be considered satisfactory or not; but I say we are entitled to the same courtesy as we have accorded to those from whom we differ. I, therefore, ask the House not to depart from its almost invariable practice in connection with the introduction of private Members' Bills, and to allow this Bill to be read a first time.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: Is it in Order to take a Division at this time?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 246; Noes 180.—(Division List, No. 73.)

Bill ordered to be brought in by Dr. Cameron, Mr. Haldane, Mr. Hunter, Mr. Beith, and Mr. Stephen Williamson.

Sir Mark Stewart

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 353.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 8th May.]

[SECOND NIGHT].

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

THE CHAIRMAN: The first Amendment upon the Paper, standing in the name of the hon. Member for Guildford, has for its object the insertion of words making the Irish Legislature "subject to the powers hereinafter reserved to the Imperial Parliament and all existing powers." This Amendment is not in Order in regard to Clause 1; but another Amendment of the hon. Member having reference to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament upon Clause 2, which deals with the powers of the Irish Legislature, will be in Order.

MR. BRODRICK (Surrey, Guildford): Upon the point of Order, I wish to ask whether, if Clause 1, which contains at present no restriction upon the Irish Legislature, is passed without any such restriction being inserted, it will be competent for any hon. Member to move the insertion of other restrictions, in addition to the Amendments to which you have alluded?

THE CHAIRMAN: I can, of course, only speak with regard to Amendments which I have seen; but I am of opinion that it will be competent for the hon. Gentleman to move other Amendments.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester): Arising out of the point of Order, Mr. Mellor, with respect to your ruling, to which, of course, I entirely submit, I wish to know whether you will exclude any new clauses which may be proposed dealing with this subject?

THE CHAIRMAN: My ruling will not exclude a new clause. The next Amendment, in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for Hammersmith, to insert the words "whenever similar legislation has been passed for England, Scotland, and Wales," I must rule out of Order as being vague and uncertain. I therefore call upon the hon. Member for East St. Pancras to move his Amendment, which is next on the Paper.

[Mr. WEBSTER was not present.]

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment, that of the right hon. Member for Grimsby, that—

"No Member shall be returned to the House of Commons for any Irish constituency save as hereinafter provided"—

I must rule out of Order, as being applicable to Clause 9. The next Amendment, standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Islington, is in Order.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) moved to insert after the word "Ireland," in Clause 1, the words "subordinate Parliament," so that the clause might read—

"On and after the appointed time there shall be established in Ireland subordinate to Parliament a Legislature," &c.

The question raised by the Amendment was one about which they had heard something on the previous day. The Prime Minister especially referred to the words he proposed to insert in the clause, and said they were used by the late Mr. Parnell. They were very distinct words, though not more clear and emphatic than the words the right hon. Gentleman had himself used when describing the position the Irish Legislature would occupy towards the Imperial Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman had stated, not only in the House but in all parts of the country, that under no circumstances would this Imperial Parliament lose any of its predominant powers, and that an Irish Parliament, if created, would be a subordinate Parliament. He noticed that when the Prime Minister stated on the previous day that the Irish Legislature would be a subordinate Parliament, there were no enthusiastic cheers from the Irish Members;—he did not hear even the slightest indication of approval from those hon. Gentlemen; but his Amendment would really test the sincerity of the Government in the matter. The Government had stated completely and most fully that they held the doctrine that the Imperial Parliament was to be supreme, and that the Irish Legislature was to be a subordinate Parliament. The Government either agreed to that statement or they did not agree to it.

If they agreed to it, there could be no possible reason why the words he proposed should not be added to the clause; but if there was any fencing—if there was any compact between the two sides to avoid the use of words which would make clear and distinct the position of the Irish Legislature,—then, of course, the Amendment would be rejected. Knowing the views of the hon. Member for Waterford on this question, he thought it extremely likely that the hon. Member would object to the insertion of the words. But his object was to hold the Government to their words—to induce them to put their words into action. During the long discussion which took place on the point the previous day, the right hon. Gentleman stated distinctly that there was no question whatever that the Bill and every part of it showed clearly that the supremacy of Parliament was to be maintained. He was so struck by the emphatic statement of the right hon. Gentleman and by his frankness that he took down his words and included them in this Amendment, thinking that the right hon. Gentleman would at once accept them. If the right hon. Gentleman accepted the words, then they might fairly say that they had made some progress towards understanding the views of the right hon. Gentleman on this question. But he asserted that if they were simply to pass the measure on the basis of the statements of the right hon. Gentleman, they would be in endless trouble in the future. What the right hon. Gentleman meant was not always very clear; but, whether his meaning was clear or not, the Bill, if it became an Act of Parliament, would stand on its own words, and he was sure that the right hon. Gentleman would agree that there should be no doubt on this great question. No Nationalist Member had ever told his constituents that the Parliament proposed to be set up on College Green would be a subordinate Parliament. He had taken the trouble of reading a great many of the speeches made by those hon. Members; and he would candidly say that in no speech was there any indication that that Parliament was to be a subordinate Parliament, but that it was to be practically an independent Legislature, and that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was not to be used at all. He therefore begged to move the insertion of the proposed words in the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, after the word "Ireland," to insert the words "subordinate to Parliament."
—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Edinburgh, Midlothian): The hon. Gentleman stood on the extremest verge of Parliamentary courtesy when, in describing his Amendment, he said it was to test the sincerity of the Government. [Cheers.] A large number of gentlemen opposite evidently agree with him. The declaration of the Government has been full and clear. They have said they wish the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament to remain perfectly absolute and unimpaired. The hon. Gentleman does not believe that declaration, and wishes to put into the Bill certain words which he says will test whether that declaration is true or false. The hon. Gentleman has thus gone to the extremest limits of Parliamentary courtesy, and has, in my opinion, overstepped them.

MR. BARTLEY: I rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I raised no point of Order.

MR. BARTLEY: I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in saying that I have overstepped the bounds of Parliamentary Rules when you, Mr. Mellor, have not called me to Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: As I understood, the Prime Minister said the hon. Gentleman had gone to the extreme verge of Parliamentary courtesy. [Cries of "And overstepped them!"] I do not think any question of Order arises.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman did not interfere to call me to Order when I said that he had by the clearest implication stated that he disbelieved the declarations of the Government. It was only when I said the hon. Member had gone to the extremest limits of Parliamentary courtesy, and, in my opinion, overstepped them, that the hon. Gentleman interfered. I do not think that is a very immoderate objection to make to the conduct of an hon. Member who suggests that the declaration of a Minister of the Crown, made from his place in Parliament, on behalf of his Colleagues and himself, is worthless, and requires to be tested by the application of certain rules. I say again that that is going to the extremest limits of Parliamentary courtesy, and, in my opinion, oversteps them. The hon. Gentleman must see that, by telling us his Amendment is intended to determine whether our words were used in truth or used in untruth, is not exactly the way to commend the Amendment to the acceptance of the Government. I do not like, however, to elevate the question of the personal honour of my Colleagues or myself, which is evidently involved, and to urge it as a reason for not accepting the Amendment, for I am quite prepared to deal with the Amendment on other grounds. The hon. Gentleman professes that the object he has in view is to maintain the supremacy of Parliament. He cannot have that object more distinctly in view than the Government have. Our desire is to leave the supremacy of Parliament exactly as we find it. We believe it to be in the Bill, and we believe it to be secure. The hon. Member will remember that yesterday I spoke of the word "subordinate" as used by Mr. Parnell. I am not prepared to deny the assertion that the Parliament in Dublin will be a subordinate Parliament; and undoubtedly it will be subject, like every other Parliament in the Empire, to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I understand that some proposal will be made to express that supremacy by a clause rather than by the Preamble. I do not think there can be any objection in principle to such a mode of proceeding, if the proposal be made. It is a matter entirely for the consideration of the House whether the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament should be declared by the Preamble or by a clause. My sole interest is that we shall not, by bungling proceedings, weaken the supremacy when we seek to strengthen it. If we are to speak of supremacy by clause or by preamble, the proper way is to speak of it without attempting to define it. This word "subordinate" Parliament, however accurate a description it may be in a speech, is a mode of language entirely new to our legislation; and I am disinclined, whether by way of testing my own sincerity or not, to agree to the introduction of this new-fangled language, which is not recommended as carrying with it any practical consequence whatever. If the Bill has these words introduced into it, the Bill will be the same as it is now. The declaration that the Irish Legislature is subordinate to Parliament will have nothing whatever of legal force. But why is this term to be introduced? This is not the first instrument by which subordinate Parliaments, if you like, or by which Parliaments, subject to the authority of the Imperial Legislature, has been made. We have a multitude of Colonies all over the world by which such Parliaments have been constituted. Some of these Colonies are great and some are small; their circumstances are as varied as their situation and climate; but, whether they are large or small, the Imperial Parliament, in giving them privileges larger than those which are proposed to be given under this Bill, has never recorded that the Parliaments so created were "subordinate" Parliaments. The intention of this Amendment is evident. It is intended to cast a slight upon the Irish Parliament, and for the first time this proposal comes from a Party which is supposed, and sometimes profess itself, to be indisposed to innovations. If adopted it will be an innovation of an entirely disparaging character; it will be, in fact, a bar sinister upon the Irish Legislature. The question of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is not at issue. The question is whether the word "subordinate" is to be introduced for the first time to disparage the Irish Legislature—to signify that the Imperial Parliament had a distrust of it, which it does not entertain towards the other Legislatures of the Empire, to place it on a distinctly lower level than the other Legislatures, so that it might know that it came into the world with a mark of disfavour. That is not the spirit in which we ought to approach a Bill of this kind. If we were to look forward, as we do look forward, to the loyalty of the Irish Parliament, we must clearly show some reasonable degree of trust in it compared with the measure of trust which we have shown in the case of all other Parliaments throughout the Empire, for Colonies like Newfoundland and Western Australia, however small and insignificant, have received these Legislative Bodies without anything in the nature of a stigma upon them. I will not say a word now on the question whether the House is satisfied with the declaration of supremacy which the Government have made. I wish to leave that entirely open without prejudice. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham said last night he did not believe both sides were agreed in desiring to maintain the supremacy of Parliament in its large and unlimited form. Let the right hon. Gentleman speak for those with whom he acts. I speak for those with whom I act, and I affirm it to be their unquestionable, clear, deliberate, uniform, and unanimous intention that the supremacy of the Crown and of the Imperial Parliament should in no respect, manner, or degree be affected by the Bill, and that their whole object is that the best and most rational mode of giving effect to that view should be adopted.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): The First Lord of the Treasury has been a little hard in describing the character of the Amendment. I do not think it was brought forward with any such motive as the First Lord of the Treasury has understood. It was a Motion perfectly bonâ fide on his part, to arrive somehow or other at a practical and not a paper declaration of supremacy, and I should be inclined to complain of the treatment which the right hon. Gentleman has measured out to my hon. Friend, if it were not that we are so extremely rejoiced and surprised that the Prime Minister has set the example to his Party of discussing in the most interesting manner the details of his own clause. It is not a question of the sincerity or credit of the Government. We want to know certain practical details as to how the supremacy will work in actual practice, and in what way it differs, if it differs at all, from other supremacies over other Parliaments. The language of the Prime Minister in the discussions of the Bill does not assist us in arriving at any conclusion on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman, either on the First Reading or on the Second Reading, used the words "separate and independent Parliament." [Mr. GLADSTONE expressed dissent.] It was so reported in The Times. The right hon. Gentleman last night talked of the Irish Parliament as subordinate. If the right hon. Gentleman applied the epithet "separate and independent" on the one occasion, and the epithet "subordinate" on the other, ordinary minds—I do not know whether it is owing to defective intelligence or to the superior discrimination of the Prime Minister—cannot reconcile them. The Amendment raises exactly the converse of the discussion last night, but it enables me to put before the House what is the real and practical argument on the question which the Government have not touched. The right hon. Gentleman has just said that by the Bill the Government leave the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament over Ireland exactly as they found it. But that is a large description that wants a great deal of explanation. What do we part with by constituting a Parliament in Ireland as regards the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament? We part with two great supports of Imperial supremacy—the control over the Executive in Irish matters and the whole power of controlling Supply as it may be raised or disposed of in the Irish Parliament. Neither of these powers is ever applied to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament over the Colonies, which are really self-governing. If it is to be a colonial supremacy we must give the whole of the Executive and the whole of Supply and more to the Irish Parliament. If it is to be a supremacy as you find it, you must introduce into the Bill practical provisions which will enable you to control the acts of the Irish Executive in their administration of Ireland, and also the manner in which the Irish Parliament raise and dispose of the Supply which comes from the taxes of the country. The question is, Will the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament over Ireland so closely resemble the supremacy over the Colonial Parliaments that you can hardly draw a distinction between them, or will it be, as the right hon. Gentleman said, the Imperial supremacy as we now find it? I hold that on that point Parliament has a right to be informed. I would point out that the supremacy cannot be quite on the colonial model. What colony has to pay anything in the nature of tribute to England? And what machinery do you possess or would you set up to enforce a contribution towards Imperial expenditure from the Colonies? But by this Bill you take tribute from Ireland. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: That is not the question.] I am showing the utter want of analogy between the supremacy of Parliament over Colonial Legislatures, and the supremacy, as the Government profess to establish it, over Ireland under the Bill. I attach particular weight to the fact of our imposing a tax upon Ireland, and drawing what was called in 1886 a tribute from her; and I say if there is no practical supremacy in the Executive and in Supply, that would be attended with the utmost difficulty, and would in practice become almost impossible. I can dwell, also, on the effects in relation to that question of the provisions of the clause as to the veto, or, as I prefer to describe it, the refusal of the assent of the Crown to a measure on the advice of the Government. The proper phrase is, La Reine s'avisera. What I am saying is that the Royal Assent would not be the same as in the case of the colonies. I do not understand that the Government contemplate that the Royal Assent to measures passed by the Irish Parliament will be such a complete formality as it undoubtedly has been in the case of the colonies for a great number of years past. Undoubtedly there have been times when interference has taken place in colonial questions, but very rarely; and I think that in every case where the Government was sure that the Colonial Ministers possessed the confidence of the colony their wishes were carried out. The right hon. Gentleman said we are not to prejudge the case, but what I wish to submit to him is that we have not yet thoroughly grappled with the question of supremacy. We have not prejudged anything. We have tried to get a definite, concrete idea as to how this supremacy is to be worked. I do not press the Government to go closely into this matter now. There will be many opportunities of referring to this question. If my hon. Friend should go to a Division I shall vote with him. I am certain the course of the Government will be easier and their proceedings more harmonious if the right hon. Gentleman would give us a little information on this question, and so put us in a position to judge whether we must ourselves introduce a proposal to carry out practically this supremacy or whether the Government themselves will carry it out under the Bill.

*MR. H. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) said, he had put a similar Amendment on the Paper, but with rather a different intention to that of the hon. Member opposite. His principal object was to try to reconcile, if he could, the very conflicting expressions of opinion on the subject which had come from various parts of the House. There was no more favourite phrase amongst the supporters of the Government on the platforms of the country than that they were ready to vote for a "subordinate Parliament for Ireland"; and it must be a little astonishing to these gentlemen to hear their Leader rise and tell them that such an expression was a slight and an insult to the Irish people. From the constant use of such expressions the electors had, in many constituencies, come to the conclusion that the Home Rule that was intended was nothing more than a magnified County Council. He thought they were entitled to hear the views of the supporters of the Government on this point, and to know their reasons for voting against the insertion in this Bill of the phrase which they had found so popular in the country. There was another party they should like to hear which supported Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. Redmond), in an article in October last, speaking of the supremacy of Parliament, declared that—

"There must be a formal compact entered into, that while the Irish Parliament lasted it must be permitted sole and unfettered authority, free from interference by the Imperial Parliament, and subject only to the Constitutional veto of the Crown."

Was that a subordinate Parliament? He asked the hon. and learned Gentleman if that compact had been entered into? If so, they knew nothing about it, and the House generally was not a party to it.

MR. J. REDMOND (Waterford): I am reluctant to interrupt the hon. Gentleman; but he has quoted from an article I wrote in October last. Luckily, I have the volume in my hand containing the article, and I am able to supplement the very brief quotation that he made. I asked the question, what was the meaning of the supremacy of Parliament, and I quoted a definition of it by the Chancellor of the Duchy, in which he said that this Parliament is supreme, and that it is not a question as to how we can divest ourselves of this power, because we cannot do so. He added that there was only one limitation to the omnipotence of Parliament, and that was that we cannot bind our successors. I went on to say that I accepted this as a true description of the position from a Constitutional point of view. The rights of the Imperial Parliament after the constitution of the Irish Legislature would remain intact.

*MR. H. HOBHOUSE said, he did not think there was anything in what the hon. Member had said that took away at all from the point he was making. They wanted to grapple with things rather than words in dealing with this Bill. They were not going to be satisfied simply by a reference to Colonial precedents, because the case of the Colonies was very different to that of Ireland. He did not question the sincerity of the Government, but he maintained that they had no right to refuse to grapple with the difficulty that the English portion of their supporters were only ready to give something very different from what the Irish portion of their supporters knew that they were going to receive and from what they insisted on having. One of the objections to this Amendment was that there was no practical value in inserting this word "subordinate." He contended, however, that if it was inserted in the beginning of the Bill it would show at once to the world at large, and to Ireland in particular, that what they were going to have was not a Parliament in our sense of the word, or in the Colonial sense of the word, but something very different even from a Colonial Parliament. The First Lord of the Treasury said it was a slight to Ireland even to use this word. But if that were so, was it not a much greater slight to Ireland and to the Legislature they were creating in Ireland to impose upon it any number of restrictions and exceptions which no Colonial Parliament would ever submit to? The Legislature which the Prime Minister proposed to create was something entirely different from the Legislature which existed in our great Colonies, so that they might well give it a different name. And it was in no way insulting or slighting to the Irish people to show them from the beginning of this Bill that the Parliament they meant to give them was something very different from the Parliaments which governed our great self-governing Colonies. He could not see any legitimate objection to the insertion of the word except one, and that objection did not appeal to any Member of the Unionist Party. That objection was, that if this word was inserted it would be impossible for Irishmen to represent that they were getting all their most extreme fellow-countrymen had demanded, whilst at the self-same time English speakers on English platforms could inform the electors that the Legislature they were going to grant was nothing more than a magnified County Council. It was with the object of clearing up all doubt on this matter and of making the Bill convey what was, he believed, the intention of its authors to the people of Great Britain and Ireland that he strongly pressed upon the House to insert the proposed word.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) desired to clear up a point which had been left in some doubt, and that was as to the precise information they got from the Home Secretary on the Second Reading of this Bill. It was very necessary to clear it up, because there had been considerable difference of statement from various Members of the Government in the course of the Debate last night and that afternoon. The Home Secretary on the Second Reading Debate, speaking of a clause asserting the supremacy of Parliament, said—

He wanted to know whether the Government would repeat that pledge, and whether they might rely upon it that if they brought up a clause at the end of the Bill the Government would accept it? He observed no movement on the part of the Government. He knew the argument was used by the Home Secretary that this demand for a declaration of supremacy did not come well from them (the Opposition). The argument might be retorted that it was of the greatest importance, from the Government point of view, that there should be such a declaration. They (the Government) believed that a sort of treaty was to be made between England and Ireland by the passing of this Bill; they thought that both sides would loyally carry out the policy entered into, and that that would be the guarantee for the success of Home Rule. They did not intend to proceed on the basis of express enactment, but upon the basis of a careful declaration of what the terms were to be which were to be carried out by the good faith of both sides. That was the view of the Home Secretary when addressing his constituents. The right hon. Gentleman then relied for the success of Home Rule not upon express enactment, but on the good faith of the parties to the bargain. He (Viscount Cranborne) did not question the good faith of the Irish Members, but let it be clear what was to be the bargain between the two Parties. The question of supremacy was an important part of the matter. Let them, therefore, make it clear what their conception of the Parliament in Ireland was and what its relations were to be towards the Parliament in England. There were distinctively three views as to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. There was the dormant view of the hon. Member for Waterford. This supremacy would be all right if it was dormant. Then there was the view of the Prime Minister that the supremacy of Parliament was inalienable, and that it was not necessary to insert any provision to provide for it on the face of the Bill. And when they began to consider what the value of this inalienable supremacy was for them the Prime Minister quoted the Colonies, and he actually quoted Newfoundland, which had lately been distinguished by flouting the Imperial supremacy. The Prime Minister's kind of supremacy was, of course, of no value whatever. There was a third conception of it—the conception of what he might call the moderate Gladstonian Party. They believed that the supremacy ought to be a real supremacy. He thought even the Chief Secretary conceived, when he was at Newcastle, that the supremacy was not to be merely enshrined in a Preamble, but was to be definitely safeguarded. The Chief Secretary at that time spoke of a full reservation of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, and he certainly would not have been satisfied with the inalienable supremacy. When the right hon. Gentleman stood before his constituents he proposed definitely to reserve the supremacy in the Bill. Then there was the right hon. Member for Wolver-hampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who had always been a very moderate Home Ruler. That right hon. Gentleman proposed to pass Home Rule subject to conditions for securing the unity of the Empire and the supreme authority of Parliament. He would not have been satisfied with the inalienable supremacy. He should like to know what the view of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton was now, because he was very emphatic a year or two ago as to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, which was not to be an inalienable supremacy, but was to be a definite supremacy. The right hon. Gentleman made a speech at Rossendale, when he used these words—

“The Irish Parliament might do foolish things; they probably will. They must work out their own salvation. If they did wrong things the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament became an effective force.”

He wanted to know whether the right hon. Gentleman still adhered to that form of supremacy, because if he did he could not be satisfied with inalienable supremacy. It was not treating the House of Commons fairly to treat it as the Prime Minister did, and to try and persuade two Parties who absolutely differed as to their conception of what the supremacy ought to be to vote for the Bill on these vague generalities of the inalienable supremacy of Parliament, and if for no other reason than the Prime Minister's speech, he should be prepared to vote for this Amendment.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.): It seems to me that the speech of the Mover of the Amendment sufficiently indicates the inutility of this particular Amendment as a means of solving the questions which those who bring it forward desire to solve. Because there can be no doubt from the speeches which have been delivered that what is wanted at this stage is to settle in debate, at any rate, if not by a clause, the precise nature and character of the subordination of the Irish Legislature and the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, while the proposed Amendment does no more than suggest the fact of subordination. The question which it is desired to know is, what is the degree and character of the subordination, the degree and character of the supremacy, and that will not be forwarded one stage after the Amendment has been either adopted or rejected. The Amendment is utterly useless, therefore, for the purposes for which it is advanced, and it is also utterly useless for the purpose of establishing the general proposition of the subordination of the Irish Legislature, because I think all reasonable men must be absolutely satisfied that that Legislature, the creation of this Imperial Parliament (which is to remain clothed with all its former powers of Legislation) must be subject to its creator, must be susceptible of being remodelled, abolished even by the Parliament which has made it. That being so, we do not get any further by a general declaration of subordination, which is at the same time useless and insulting, for the reasons stated by the Prime Minister in those words which proved his statesmanship, in which he showed that it is not by giving slights and insults to a people that you can conciliate their confidence and achieve those good relations which contain the only element that is valuable, and all that is valuable in the connection; and in which he declared that he would not put language into this Act absolutely useless for any good purpose, but which should mark the Legislature about to be created with a brand of inferiority over the smallest of the Colonies having Legislatures created by this Parliament. I have no right to speak for anyone but myself; but I say there is an unanimity of statement both public and private amongst the gentlemen who sit on this Bench upon the point to which this Amendment is addressed of the subordinate character of the Irish Legislature. They confess, acknowledge, and realise, and have ever since 1886 confessed, acknowledged, and realised, that characteristic of the Legislature proposed to be given to their country; and as reference has been made more than once to the precise language in which that declaration was made by the Leader of the Irish Party, and the Irish people at the time, I think it is not useless to refresh the memory of the House as to the declaration which Mr. Parnell did in fact make in 1886 in the discussion upon the Second Reading of the Home Rule Bill, a Bill which contained no Preamble with reference to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. It was not thought necessary ; it was not necessary. What he declared was this—

"We have always known since the introduction of this Bill the difference between a co-ordinate and a subordinate Parliament, and we have recognised that the Legislature which the Prime Minister proposes to constitute is a subordinate Parliament ; that it is not the same as Grattan's Parliament, which was co-equal with the Imperial Parliament, arising out of the same Constitution given to the Irish people by the Crown, just in the same way though not by the same means as Parliamentary Institutions were given to Great Britain by the Sovereign. We understand this perfectly well. Undoubtedly I should have preferred, as I stated in speeches which have been quoted against me as showing that I could not accept this proposed settlement as final—I should have preferred the restitution of Grattan's Parliament ; it would have been more in accordance with the sentiments of the Irish people, whose sentiments in such matters it is most important to regard. But with reference to the argument that has been used against us, that I am precluded from accepting this solution as a final solution, because I have claimed the restitution of Grattan's Parliament, I would beg to say that I consider there are practical advantages connected with the proposed Statutory Body, limited and subordinate to this Imperial Parliament as it undoubtedly will be, which will render it much more useful and advantageous to the Irish people than was Grattan's Parliament, and that the Statutory Body which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to constitute is much more likely to be a final settlement than Grattan's Parliament."

Many years have elapsed since that statement was made. There have been seven years of discussion with reference to the Home Rule Bill of 1886, with reference to its vital principles ; and after those seven years we come back here to reiterate the declaration made in June, 1886, upon that subject. As to the character of the supremacy, I do not intend to enter just now in detail into that question, which, as I have already pointed out, would not be settled one way or the other by the insertion of the word "subordinate." As to the fact of subordination there is no doubt. I believe there is not a man in the ranks of those who support the Government, from whatever part of the United Kingdom he comes, whatever his special relations to this question may be, who does not freely and fully acknowledge the proposition that in truth and in fact the Legislature which is to be created is a subordinate Legislature. But about the supremacy, since reference has been made to it, let me read a few words more from the speech of the same Leader delivered upon the same occasion with reference to his then understanding of supremacy. Mr. Parnell said—

"I understand the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament to be this—that they can interfere in the event of the powers which are conferred by this Bill being abused under certain circumstances. But the Nationalists in accepting this Bill go, as I think, under an honourable understanding not to abuse those powers, and we pledge ourselves in that respect for the Irish people, as far as we can pledge ourselves, not to abuse those powers, and to devote our energies and our influence which we may have with the Irish people to prevent those powers from being abused. But if those powers should be abused, the Imperial Parliament will have at its command the force which it reserves to itself, and it will be ready to intervene, but only in the case of grave necessity arising. I believe that this is by far the best mode in which we can hope to settle this question. You will have the real power of force in your hands, and you ought to have it ; and if abuses are committed and injustice be perpetrated you will always be able to use that force to put a stop to them. You will have the power and the supremacy of Parliament untouched and unimpaired just as though this Bill had never been brought forward. We fully recognise this to be the effect of the Bill."

After seven years of discussion we come back here to-day to reiterate that statement also. With reference to the necessity of this Amendment, I say it is absolutely unnecessary. I say it is clear to demonstration that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament will remain just as strong, just as clear, just as capable of being used without this proposition as with it, and that it is dangerous to insert in any clauses in this Bill which have relation to a particular subject or to particular incidents of the question—it is dangerous to there insert these declarations unless you propose to insert them in almost every clause of the Bill one after another. You know not what result may follow from omission anywhere else, if you once begin to insert them with reference to particular clauses, and therefore it is that I have always been of opinion that if you act at all it is either by Preamble which affects the whole Bill or by some general declaratory, not by enacting, clause, that you should deal with the question of supremacy as dominating the whole, instead of trying to touch it with reference to any one clause. But I agree with the view that clauses or preambles are utterly unnecessary and perhaps weakening. I rather object to them, from that point of view, and from that point of view alone. I believe that the substance of the case is that the supremacy obviously remains unimpaired, and that was the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) when he suggested the possible danger that, at any rate, the moral supremacy of Parliament might be minimised or interfered with by the Bill of 1886 which excluded the Irish Members. When he proposed that the Irish Members should be retained, as they ought to be retained, he said this—

“But, Sir, that is a matter of first and cardinal importance. It is a matter to which I have always attached the greatest possible weight, because if the Irish Members are retained at Westminster, the Imperial Parliament remains the Imperial Parliament, and its supremacy would then be an established fact. The Legislative Authority in Dublin—you may call it a Parliament—will be a subordinate and not a co-equal Authority.”

The right hon. Gentleman did not want a clause, or preamble, or declaration. He rested upon sounder and more solid ground. There it was. The facts were so. These results flowed inevitably from the circumstances which would exist when the Imperial Parliament remained with the Irish Members here. I believe he was wise and statesmanlike then. I am only sorry he does not remain so to-day.

*MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): It has really been agreeable to hear an Irish voice intervening in this Debate, and to hear one of the Irish Leaders speaking with the full authority of those who sit around him. The hon. Member said there had been a uniformity of statement since 1886 with regard to the view of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament; but in this Debate, at all events, there has been a uniformity of silence amongst the Irish Benches, and neither last night, when we were discussing the sovereignty, nor to-day, until the hon. Member rose when we were discussing the subordination of the Irish Parliament, have hon. Members below the Gangway thought it necessary to inform the House of Commons of their views upon this matter, and I think I may say their views are of deep interest to us with regard to this question, not of less interest even than that of the Government itself. Although the hon. Member who spoke last discussed the question, we were not clear whether he was in favour of the dormant supremacy, the Prime Minister's supremacy, or of the supremacy of the Moderate Gladstonians. On the whole, I should gather his view is the inalienable right of Parliament to be enforced as suggested by Mr. Parnell, by the Forces of the Crown if it should be necessary. The hon. Member read out a passage from a speech of Mr. Parnell, which showed that this Parliament was always to be able to enforce its views owing to the possession of the Naval and Military Forces of the Crown. Now, that kind of supremacy is not the supremacy, I believe, which would satisfy those who sit upon this side of the House and the Unionist Party in general. Well, then, the hon. Member says this matter has been discussed for seven years. A particular statement was made in the year 1886; it is made again now in 1893, and the hon. Member spoke as if the discussion from 1886 had led up naturally to the present position. But there have been many interesting intervals, and a flood of light has been let in, and how hon. Members—either below the Gangway or hon. Members opposite—can attach any importance to the declarations of 1886 passes my understanding, considering that they have been repudiated by the Leader of the Irish Party—the trusted Leader of the Irish Party. He informed them, with frank cynicism, that the Bill was a Parliamentary bid, and he informed, practically, the British people that no reliance could be placed upon the declarations which were made at that time. And then the hon. Member below the Gangway thinks that these discussions have been continuous. Has he studied the Irish Press during the interval? [Mr. BLAKE: Yes.] Very well, I think he will find that what was said in 1887, 1888, and 1889 was very different from the sentiments he quoted. Whatever hon. Members may say in this House, I think the Irish Press also should be studied upon this question; and I would recommend that not only should hon. Members listen to the utterances of hon. Members in this House, but they should study the local Irish Press to see what views generally Irishmen are invited to take with regard to the supremacy of this Parliament and the subordination of an Irish Parliament. The Prime Minister said he objected to the introduction of the word "subordinate" on two grounds. He thought it was a new-fangled word, and a word that would be insulting to the Irish people.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: And would carry no legislative force whatever.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will deal with the third argument as well as the other two. The first argument is that it is a new fangled-word, and that comes from the author of the most new-fangled Bill that has ever been submitted to Parliament. We shall have to invent a great many new Parliamentary terms before we have done with the discussions on this Bill. The author of such vast Constitutional—not only developments, but changes and revolutions, suggest that we are foolish in introducing a new-fangled word such as "subordinate" into this Bill. Then the right hon. Gentleman thought it would be insulting to the Irish people. Well, but the word "subordinate" has been used as the right hon. Gentleman has heard by the late Leader of the Irish Party himself. It has been used, as he has been reminded, by candidate after candidate at the last Election. Now, I never saw the rebuke come from headquarters "Avoid that term for fear it should hurt the sensitive feelings of the Irish people." Why is the word now to be scratched out from our Parliamentary proceedings when it has played so great and so successful a part during the late Election? But the right hon. Gentleman has given a reason. It would discriminate this Irish Parliament from Colonial Parliaments. Here is a bar sinister to be put across the Irish Parliament. We have given Colonial Parliaments; we have not introduced these words in the Colonial Parliaments; and I see, for that very reason, a most important argument in favour of the introduction of "subordinate" in this matter, because it is a fair notice to Ireland that the Irish Parliament will not stand upon the same footing as the Colonial Parliaments. It is of great importance that this should be thoroughly understood; because afterwards there is always the danger of a charge of breach of faith. Now, if I may refer to last night's vote, I would ask what will be the impression of last night's vote upon Ireland? The Irish Members and the Ministerial Party voted against the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. [Cries of "Oh!"] I am glad to know from the interruption that they only voted against the declaration of that supremacy—no doubt a totally different thing. The Government have declared the sentiments with which they are animated in their vote; but there is nothing to show what sentiments animated the Irish Party. They are not bound by the declarations of the Prime Minister. If the word "subordinate" be an insult, then all the restrictions which are placed on the Irish Parliament, and which are not placed on the Colonial Parliaments, are equally insults to the Irish people. Why not look the matter in the face, and be candid in the Bill itself? If the Parliament is to be subordinate, why not say so? The hon. Member who has last spoken maintains that if the Amendment were accepted, the principle would have to be re-asserted in every clause. The assertion of the principle is only necessary in those clauses which deal with the constitution of the Parliament; and it would be a great advantage for the future understanding of the bargain. We are told that there can be no enacting force in this matter. Whether the words of the Amendment will have an enacting force or not, I urge their insertion on the ground that both the British people and the Irish people ought to know from the beginning that the subordination of the Irish Parliament is not only theoretical but practical. Honesty requires the insertion of the words. Hon. Gentlemen opposite did not take the same view they do now in their election speeches. I say we ought to have this principle in the forefront of the Bill, as every clause—the construction of every clause—may depend on it.

MR. R. B. HALDANE (Haddington) said, that the supporters of the Government had some cause to complain of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because he had made, in form, a forcible criticism, without saying what he wanted. First of all, when they declared themselves in favour of Home Rule they were asked what they meant. They said they meant a subordinate Parliament with an Executive responsible to that Parliament, reserving to the Imperial Parliament legislation on certain subjects. When a Bill was produced, objection was taken on the ground that it did not preserve Imperial supremacy; and when they asked what was meant by supremacy, they received various answers. They had one in the very moderate and useful speech of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill); and early in the Debate there had been a most important statement from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour). The right hon. Gentleman said that he believed, on eminent legal authority, that this Bill completely preserved the paper supremacy—that was, the theoretical supremacy. If that were so, it relieved the Committee from a great deal of controversy. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington now asked whether the practical supremacy was maintained? The Committee were under great obligation to him for explaining what he meant. The two elements of practical supremacy to which the noble Lord attached most importance were the control of the Executive and the control of Supply. It was impossible to retain complete control of Supply if a subordinate Parliament were established. Every Local Board which had a discretionary power of rating was beyond central control. It was the very essence of Home Rule in every shape to leave the raising of ways and means to the delegated body. As to the Executive, under the Bill there was complete legal supremacy, because the Act of Union was not repealed; there was power to legislate on certain reserved subjects; in relation to certain matters—as, for instance, the Post Office—direct Executive control was retained; the power of veto implied a certain control over the Executive; and all Constitutional questions were to be tried by a supreme tribunal of appeal created by the Imperial Parliament. The extent to which a subordinate body was to be actually controlled by the Imperial Parliament was a question rather of practice than of theory. It was impossible to define it in a Bill. The Crown Colonies had been controlled in varying degrees at varying periods of their existence. But if the action of a subordinate body were justified by experience, then Imperial interference lapsed. And so it seemed to him that the demand that clauses should be put in the Bill declaring the extent of the practical supremacy to be exercised by the Imperial Parliament was not a reasonable demand. As the Irish Parliament failed or succeeded in its mission, so would the control of the Imperial Parliament be greater or less. If the Irish Parliament were successful, there would be no need to interfere, except on the subjects reserved to the Imperial Parliament; and if the Irish Parliament failed, then the theoretical supremacy would become a real supremacy to be acted upon. If the Irish Legislature succeeded the Imperial supremacy would be exercised less and less; and if it failed that supremacy could easily be enforced under the powers contained in the Bill. It was, therefore, entirely dependent upon the degree and extent of the success of the Irish Legislature that the exercise of the Imperial supremacy would depend, and, consequently, it would be an abuse of the forms of Parliament if hon. Members were at that stage to vote for the insertion of the words proposed to be adopted by the hon. Member, which had no practical value at all, and which would not carry them a step further in regard to the supremacy of the Constitution.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, that it was always refreshing to him to hear a British lawyer speaking upon Irish affairs. The hon. and learned Member for Haddington, who had just sat down, had dealt with this subject from an academic point of view. The hon. and learned Gentleman contemplated the possibility of the success of the Irish Legislature, in which case he informed the Committee he was of opinion that the question of the supremacy need never be called into action. But, then, the hon. and learned Member went on, with perfect equanimity, to contemplate also the possibility of the failure of that Legislature. To the hon. and learned Member that meant nothing; to the North of Ireland it meant ruin. Therefore, the hon. and learned Member could not expect him and those who thought with him to contemplate that failure which the hon. and learned Member looked upon as possible, and which he and his friends regarded as absolutely certain from a mere academic point of view. The hon. and learned Member was fully persuaded that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was absolute and complete under this Bill. But the

hon. and learned Member did not tell the Committee how that supremacy was to be put in force in Ireland if it was required to be exercised. Supposing, as the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think possible, and as he believed to be certain, that the Parliaments of Westminster and of Ireland should come to loggerheads, he should like to know what machinery had been provided that would enable the Imperial Parliament to enforce its supremacy. The supremacy of the Imperial Parliament could only be enforced through the Irish Executive, which would be under the entire control of the Irish Parliament. Such a supremacy would not be worth preserving. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Blake), who had had a somewhat long, a varied, and, he believed, a not altogether successful experience of Canadian politics, had given the Committee his view of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. But had the hon. Member read the speeches of the Irish Nationalist Members during the last seven years? The hon. Member had referred to the speeches of Mr. Parnell on the subject; but was the hon. Member aware that not so very long ago the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir William Harcourt) had made the declaration that Mr. Parnell's Home Rule was a Fenian Home Rule. He imagined that a Fenian Home Rule would not contemplate the maintenance of the supremacy either of the Imperial Parliament or of the Crown. He accepted the statement of the hon. Member for Longford as an honest one, but he doubted whether it was of equal value upon this subject to those which had been made by the Leaders of the Irish Nationalist Party. Great strides had been made in the course of this Debate, and it was now known for the first time what sort of supremacy it was that the Government contemplated by this Bill. It was clear that the Government contemplated placing the Irish Legislature in a position analogous to that of a Colonial Parliament. He did not think that that proposal had been brought before the constituencies at the last Election with sufficient clearness. The Colonies were virtually and practically independent, and if they placed Ireland in a position analogous to that of Canada, for instance, they would be placing her far on the road to a possible separation. What was meant by this supremacy of the Imperial Parliament? If it meant simply a bare statement in the Preamble, or even in a clause of the Bill, that such a supremacy existed, he should vote against it, because he should look upon such a statement as not worth the paper it was printed upon, and as merely intended to throw dust in the eyes of the British people. Why had this statement in the Preamble been so cheerfully accepted by all sections of the Irish Nationalist Party? It was because, in their opinion, it meant nothing. It meant nothing as far as giving real power to the Imperial Parliament to prevent the Irish Parliament from committing various deeds of eccentric legislation was concerned, but it did mean something as far as it would enable the Irish Executive to crush down the Irish minority by means of the Imperial troops. If the Imperial Parliament was to treat Ireland like a Colony let the Imperial Army be withdrawn. The Irish minority were willing to be treated on the footing of a Colony, but they protested against a supremacy that would enable the gentlemen who would form the Irish Government to appeal to the Imperial Parliament for the assistance of the Army and Navy to compel the Irish minority to obey their behests. That was a form of supremacy that was absolutely abhorrent to the Irish minority. Of what use would such a supremacy be to this country? When would that supremacy be exercised? If it were no use the sooner it was got rid of the better. If it were of some use, to what use was it going to be put? One of the uses to which it might be put was to enforce the payment of the contributions which Ireland was to make to this country. If Ireland refused to hand over the Revenue derived from the Customs, as undoubtedly it would do, the supremacy might be resorted to in order to enforce that payment. The Imperial Parliament would then have to enforce the payment through the Irish Executive, and so require the latter to enforce payment of a tribute to the hated Saxon. That was a sort of supremacy that he could not contemplate without a shudder. It was only by means of the Imperial soldiers that the payment could be exacted. The Imperial Parliament must capture the Irish Exchequer, and must take forcible possession of the person of the Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer in order to enforce its supremacy, or else not a single shilling would be able to be extorted from the patriotic Irish people. Unless this could be accomplished, the so-called supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was a sham. In the view of the Irish minority, supremacy would be a good thing if it meant anything; but to the sort of supremacy he had referred they would offer the most uncompromising opposition. He could not help wondering why the hon. Member had moved this Amendment, because the term "subordinate" would be most inapplicable to an Irish Parliament. Had the word been "insubordinate" it would have been much more appropriate. Then it would convey the real meaning that the Home Rule Bill had in the eyes of the Irish people. It would mean something. They would vote for the Amendment, because it would be a foundation stone upon which they could build further alterations in the Act. It would be the first step towards making British supremacy a reality instead of a sham. As he had already said, he was opposed to the Bill, amended or not amended; but, at the same time, they should endeavour to make the present Home Rule Bill better than the previous one. Their stand was that if there was to be Home Rule in Ireland it ought to be the least noxious kind of Home Rule that the House could devise. To render it to some extent innocuous, they had taken as a starting point the attempt to insert words to prevent Home Rule from being the utter ruin of Ireland and from working the destruction of this Empire. They ought to give the Imperial Parliament a right that could not be questioned to supervise all the Acts and all the deeds of the proposed Irish Executive. It was because he believed the Amendment recognised the importance of starting on the line of rendering the Irish Legislature subordinate that he should certainly support it.

*MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said, he could not agree with the hon. Member for Haddingtonshire (Mr. Haldane), except in the statement that when we first gave Governments to our Colonies we maintained a quasi authority over them; but as they had grown older they had gradually become absolutely independent of the Mother Country. He ventured to say that if this Bill, or anything like it, was given to the Irish people gradually, the same condition of things would happen as that which prevailed in the Colonies. The hon. Member for Longford had referred to the fact that when Mr. Parnell was alive he had been quite agreeable to the Irish Parliament being subordinate; but in Committee Room No. 15 Mr. Parnell went behind that statement, and said that he had declared himself agreeable to the Irish Parliament being subordinate merely as a piece of Parliamentary tactics. Before they went on with such an important measure as this, they ought to carefully draw a line of demarcation between the power of the Imperial Parliament and that of the subordinate Irish Legislature. The line of cleavage might be the cause of great difficulty and danger in the future. When the United States first obtained their independence one of their first acts in framing their Constitution was to carefully and definitely lay down the exact powers of the State Legislatures, and where that of the Federal Government was to commence, and yet difficulties had arisen from time to time; and unless in the present instance a line of demarcation were laid down the door would be open to great dangers, and perhaps to civil war such as that which had convulsed the United States. They could have two Executive powers and two mock Parliaments; but he denied that they could have two Executive powers and two co-ordinate Parliaments. No doubt there had been divergencies of opinion between Grattan's Parliament and the Parliament of Great Britain, and there was no doubt that Grattan's Parliament was kept subordinate by gross corruption. There were a number of Members in the Irish Parliament who were directly in the pay of the British Parliament—a state of things which nowadays they could hardly conceive possible. In the event of a difficulty now occurring with the House of Lords Members of the House of Commons either had to be sent back to the constituencies, or a number of new Peers had to be created; but if this Bill became law, and a difficulty arose with Ireland, these steps could not be taken. What would have to be done? Why, as he read it, the sole judges in the event of a dispute arising were certain Exchequer Judges, who he held were an absolutely impossible and absolutely inadequate tribunal to refer such a dispute to. Were Irishmen to have the right of nominating their own Ministers, and also to have a controlling voice in the nomination of ours? Were Irish Members, who were not to have a right either to speak or vote on British questions in this House, still to have the right to sit and vote in British Ministries and British Cabinets? If that were so, as the Representative of a British constituency, he should strongly resent this interference of the Irish Members. Under the Bill the Prime Minister was placing the independence of England and Scotland under the power of a herd of Irishmen, and he ventured to say, speaking as a Scotchman, although representing an English constituency, that that was a thing which would powerfully affect the feelings of the Scottish people. If this or some similar measure was intended to become a living Act of Parliament, why should not the Prime Minister, in the first place, appoint a Royal Commission, or some Body of that sort, to consider and report upon the grave Constitutional questions involved? During the General Election—at any rate in many cases, if not universally—the supporters of the Government described the Parliament which it was proposed to establish in Ireland as a subordinate Parliament. Those Members did not know, any more than Members of the Opposition knew, what form the Home Rule Bill would take. He supposed there were half-a-dozen Cabinet Councils held to consider all these proposals, and he supposed, also, that there were conferences with hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway; but, in dealing with such a grave Constitutional matter as this, he thought they should have followed the example of the Washington Government, and have appointed a Commission. There never could be supremacy of the Imperial Parliament if 80, or, as it now appeared, 103, Irish Members were allowed to come over and sit in that House. He believed the result of that policy would be a deadlock. If the Irish Parliament were not a subordinate one it would bring about a deadlock, and practically become a ruling Parliament over Great Britain. Rather than assent to the proposed Siamese-twin arrangement, by which the two Parliaments would be joined together by an unnatural ligament, would suffer each other's misfortune, and die by each other's dissolution, he would prefer to say to the Irish Members, "Go in peace." This Bill, or anything like it, would be fraught with great danger to the Constitution; and he believed it was necessary for those on the Benches around him, and for certain steadfast and patriotic hon. Gentlemen on the Benches opposite, to do everything in their power to insert words securing the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, which had been handed down to us for 800 years.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I do not rise to prolong the Debate, which I think may now with very great advantage be brought to a conclusion. If we have not succeeded in eliciting from the Government their reasons for dissenting from this Amendment, we have, at all events, elicited very clearly the fact that, if they have any arguments at all, they are absolutely unable to give them to us. The only shadow of a ground, so far as I have learned from the single Member of the Government who has condescended to reply or deal with the subject at all—for there has been no reply at all to hon. Members who have spoken from these Benches and from the Benches below the Gangway opposite—the only shadow of an argument that I could detect in the speech of the Prime Minister is that he thinks that if the words were introduced they might hurt the tender susceptibilities of the Irish people. I suppose we must now finally give up all hope of extracting, at this stage of the Bill at all events, any more substantial argument from the Government. It must, therefore, go forth to the British people that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, about which so many assurances have been given during the late Election, cannot be embodied in the framework of the Bill, not because it is in itself an objectionable thing, but because the mere statement of supremacy will, as I say, hurt the feelings of gentlemen from Ireland. It is sufficient to thus briefly summarise the speech—the single speech—which has been given to us from that Bench, and perhaps we might now express our opinion on the Amendment in the Division Lobbies.

MR. BARTLEY [Cries of "Divide!"] said, that, as the Mover of the Amendment, he desired to be allowed to say one or two words as to the way in which the Prime Minister referred to him. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he had overstepped the limits of Parliamentary courtesy. He would be very sorry to do that to anyone, and, above all, to one whom they all admired and respected for his great powers; but he thought it a little unreasonable that it should be stated, in connection with such a matter as this Bill, that he had put his Amendment forward because he did not believe in the declaration of the Government. That was not a matter, as it seemed to him, of believing in the declaration of the Government. This was a great Constitutional measure. It was not a sort of confidence trick, in which they were to trust the Government. If he might say so without disrespect, he did not trust the Government at all, and Members on the Opposition side of the House had been saying that for a long time; but this was not a personal matter in any sense, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman need have been so indignant and have poured out the vials of his wrath on so humble a Member of the House. The Amendment was a substantial one, brought forward with a sense of responsibility, with a view to stating distinctly on the 1st clause of the Bill that the Irish Parliament should be subordinate.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: As the hon. Gentleman has frankly said that he did not intend to make any statement in the nature of a personal charge, I beg entirely to withdraw the expression I made use of.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 257; Noes 292.—(Division List, No. 74.)

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to move, in page 1, line 12, to leave out the word "Legislature," and insert the word "Parliament."

*MR. DARLING (Deptford) desired to ask if it was in Order to move to substitute the word "Parliament" for "Legislature," seeing that the clause would then read—

"On and after the appointed day there shall be in Ireland a Parliament consisting of Her Majesty the Queen and of two Houses, the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly."

But the Queen was not a portion of Parliament at all. She was not a Member of Parliament. She summoned the Parliament, and there made laws by and with the advice of the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think it is necessary to go into the matter. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is out of Order.

MR. W. REDMOND said, he was obliged to the Chairman for his ruling. He should have thought that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Darling) would have known enough about the law to be aware of the fact that Parliament was always taken to include the Queen, Lords, and Commons. This was a matter which might seem small to hon. Members at first sight; but he could assure the Government and the Committee that it was a matter in which considerable interest was taken by the Irish people. He himself had received a very great number of communications from various portions of Ireland, advocating the substitution of the word "Parliament" for "Legislature." The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had pointed out very clearly and properly to-day that there was no intention of casting anything in the shape of a slight on the people of Ireland in connection with this Bill. He (Mr. Redmond) did not say that the Irish people would consider the word "Legislature" intended as a slight upon them; but he did say that they would regard the measure with much greater favour if the word "Parliament" were in the Bill, seeing that that word was familiar to them in Irish history. He might be told that in none of the Acts establishing Colonial Parliaments did the word "Parliament" occur. That was true—though, indeed, he believed there was an exception in the case of the Dominion Parliament. The Amendment would not alter the Bill or its powers. It would simply satisfy the widespread sentiment of the Irish people; and, in dealing with a matter of this kind, it would be well to take sentiment into consideration. He did not believe there was anyone representing a Nationalist constituency who would rise in his place and say that "Legislature" would be preferable to the old word "Parliament." It was for the restoration of a Parliament that the Irish people had longed so passionately, and worked so hard. A great many people in Ireland would accept the Bill much more readily if the word "Parliament" were used in the Bill. He appealed to the Prime Minister whether it would not be possible to accept the Amendment, even though the matter was only one of sentiment?

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, to leave out the word "Legislature," and insert the word "Parliament."—(Mr. W. Redmond.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Legislature' stand part of the Clause."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member has stated his case with great clearness and brevity, and it is one of considerable interest. The hon. Gentleman has a precedent for his proposal to which I do not propose that we should conform. The Canada Act says—

"There shall be one Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, the Upper House, styled the Senate, and the House of Commons."

In the face of those words it would be difficult for me to say, what I otherwise should have been inclined to say, that a "Parliament" is complete, and does not include the Queen. I own that it is an infelicitous expression to use "Parliament," as was done in the Canada Act, as the grammatical equivalent to "Legislature," because the form of our Acts is this—that they are assented to and enacted by the Queen upon the advice of three Estates of the Realm represented in the two Houses of Parliament. It is certainly not according to common usage to speak of the Queen as a portion of Parliament. That is my opinion, but that is not a matter in which we are now interested. The whole question we have to consider is whether we shall call those Houses of Legislature a Parliament, as in Canada. I am of opinion that it would be better not to take that course, but to adhere to the words in the Bill. I think that even if the House should be disposed to treat the question as extraneous to Parliament we might provide for that in another way than by calling the two Houses in Ireland by the name of Parliament. The Canadian case is an exceptional one. I ask myself why it is that the Imperial Parliament has constituted a Parliament for Canada and for nowhere else? Was it intended thereby to say that the Parliament in Canada was to be placed on a higher footing than any other Colonial Parliament? I do not think so. I do not think it was intended to constitute an essential distinction between the Parliament in Canada and the Parliament, say, in New South Wales. There was, however, a practical purpose in view. The Act was intended all through to carry out a double purpose—namely, the establishment of a Parliament for Canada as a whole, and likewise the determination of the form of the Legislative Houses in the Provinces. The common usage is not to use the phrase "Parliament," but to use the phrase "Legislature" or "House of Legislature." In the Canadian Act distinct phraseology was adopted in describing the different Legislative Bodies, in order to prevent confusion. I do not, therefore, think we can use the case of Canada as a precedent, as no analogy exists between the state of things which prevails in Canada and the state of things we propose to set up in Ireland. It would be better, therefore, in my opinion, to use the phraseology of the Bill. I do not think we have affixed any mark of inferiority whatever to the Irish Legislature by the title we have given it. I do not think it would be wise to constitute by an Act of ours any ground for asserting that we object to give an essentially different character to the Parliament in Ireland from the character borne by other Parliaments, because for the purpose for which it is to be constituted it is to be exactly the same, inasmuch as it is to deal with local as distinct from Imperial affairs. That is the purpose for which Colonial Legislatures were constituted; and, that being so, it appears to me that it would be better to avoid ambiguity in matters of this kind, and not to constitute substantially a new precedent, but to adhere to established practice.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that I am disposed very much to disagree with the conclusion at which the right hon. Gentleman has arrived; but I have listened to the reasons he has given for that conclusion with the utmost astonishment. I do not propose to go into the dispute as to the accuracy of the words proposed by the hon. Member for Clare (Mr. W. Redmond). For my own part, I should have said that it was quite as fitting to describe Her Majesty as a Member of Parliament as it would be to describe Her as a Member of the Legislature. Even in the case of the Canadian Parliament, I should not have been disposed to admit that the Amendment which has now been brought before us should have been rejected on linguistic or grammatical grounds. Let us compare the argument of the Prime Minister on this question with the argument delivered by the Prime Minister at considerable length on the question which the Committee has just determined. The question of the supremacy of Parliament is, at all events, a substantial question, and the right hon. Gentleman did not, as far as I can make out, profess very different views of the supremacy from those entertained on this side of the House. Yet he refused absolutely to introduce the words we proposed, because he said it would hurt the feelings of the Irish race.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That was not my reason.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As far as I could understand, that was the chief reason given by the right hon. Gentleman. The words used by him were that it would be a bar sinister, that it would be a slight, and that it would be of a disparaging nature. I confess I should have thought that I was not misinterpreting, but was rather minimising, the meaning of those expressions when I said that the right hon. Gentleman's objection to the use of the word "subordinate" was that it would hurt the feelings of gentlemen below the Gangway. Now, when we come to the present Amendment, what becomes of the feelings of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway? I recollect the speech made by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) on the Second Reading. It was, undoubtedly, the ablest speech made in his quarter of the House in defence of this Bill. The hon. Member rested his defence of the Bill on what he called the inalienable and historic right of the Irish people to a Parliament. He said they possessed a Parliament in the last century; that that Parliament, by not illegal but immoral arts, had been suppressed for nine years; but that that suppression did not break the true and legitimate tradition which he claimed on behalf of the Parliament abolished in 1800. Let me tell the Prime Minister that words mean a great deal, and that if his object is, as he has often told us it is, to give satisfaction to the aspirations of the Irish race, there are, undoubtedly, no greater reasons for rejecting this Amendment than there were for the rejection of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling). If the right hon. Gentleman is influenced by sentimental considerations—and I do not use the term offensively—I should have thought there was no more important Amendment on the Notice Paper than this. While, therefore, I am unable to understand the reason why the right hon. Gentleman objects to the Amendment, I can easily state the reasons why I object to it. My reasons are that I do not wish the ancient tradition which the hon. Member for Waterford spoke of to be restored. I do not desire that either Grattan's Parliament or the Parliament which preceded it should be restored; and I mean to propose, or support as far as I can, Amendments to this Bill limiting the sphere of the activity of the new Legislative Body which it is proposed to set up. Though I entirely appreciate the object of the hon. Member for Clare, and if, like him, I desired to revive the ancient tradition of Grattan's Parliament, I should move a similar Amendment, I cannot, under the circumstances, support his proposal. But, taking the other view, if I were to vote with the hon. Member for Clare, it appears to me that though I should not technically preclude myself from voting for other Amendments, I should morally prohibit myself from doing so, because by calling this new Assembly a Parliament I should by implication indicate that I wished to give it all the attributes, all the dignity, and all the importance which we are accustomed to associate with the name of Parliament. I think we shall, undoubtedly, be carrying out a sound policy if we decline to accept the Amendment. Therefore, if the Amendment comes to a Division, I should certainly be found voting against it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I do not rise to take part in the discussion of this Amendment, but to refer to a statement made by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Darling) which I do not think ought to go uncontradicted. The statement was that the Queen is not a Member of Parliament. I am not going to make a speech, but I shall read some remarks from the best known authority on the subject. [The right hon. Gentleman then read a passage from Blackstone, to the effect that the constituent parts of Parliament are the Sovereign and the three Estates of the Realm—the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons—and that the Sovereign and these three Estates together formed the great corporation or body politic of the Kingdom.] The right hon. Gentleman went on to say: This is a very elementary statement of the subject; but I think the hon. and learned Member for Deptford ought not to make statements like that for which he made himself responsible without having the attention of the House called to the real state of the facts.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) thought the Committee was very much indebted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for having, with the authority which everybody admitted he possessed on this subject, removed a misconception. The main objection to the Amendment before the Committee was that it would assign to the Legislature to be created in Ireland a position of importance which Members on the Opposition side of the House desired under no circumstances to confer upon it. If such a Legislature was to be created, it ought to be as a distinctly subordinate body, and it should not have an appellation conferred upon it which would leave any doubt existing upon the point. He desired that the Statute should indicate clearly that the Imperial Parliament reserved to itself the right, at any moment it thought fit, to resume any legislative power which was to be delegated to the Irish Legislature. That being so, he certainly could not support the Amendment.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, one of the most extraordinary things about the Debate was that the interest of Members of the Government was only raised on questions which related to the merest verbal distinctions. When a question of high policy was raised the Front Bench was absolutely silent; but since the present question had been brought forward two Cabinet Ministers had already taken part in the Debate, and he still hoped the Solicitor General would give the Committee the benefit of his views. The Amendment was valuable as illustrating the action of the Party from Ireland to which the hon. Member for Clare belonged. That Party had arrogated to themselves for a year or two the privilege of defending the National aspirations of the Irish people. Their attitude during the present Debate had been most extraordinary, as that was the first feeble effort they had made to introduce into the Bill a single word which would gratify Irish Nationalist aspirations. The Prime Minister was now going to trample upon them; and he hoped that they would, in reply, justify in a more effective manner the line they had taken up in Ireland. He had always looked upon the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) as a man of his word, and as a man who intended to carry into action in the House of Commons the grandiloquent phrases by which he had attempted to justify his claim to be the real Leader of the Irish people. But the heavenly twins turned out to be, after all, not real, but simply pasteboard knights. It was evident, however, that the Bill could not effect a final settlement of the question; because, after the statements of the Prime Minister, the hon. Members for Clare and Waterford would be obliged, if they intended to preserve their position in Irish politics, to say that the Government had failed in an essential although a sentimental view of Irish politics, and to maintain their opposition to the Bill. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. M'Carthy) had said nothing about the Amendment, although one would have thought he would have expressed an opinion on one side or the other. Although the Amendment was important, it would have no practical effect whatever. But politics in Ireland were never practical—they were entirely sentimental. As the Government declined to accept the proposal, he (Mr. Macartney) doubted whether the hon. Member for Clare or his friends would dare to go into the Lobby with the Prime Minister again.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) said, the remark which suggested itself to his mind on hearing the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down was—"In vain is the net spread in sight of any bird." The hon. Member seemed to imagine that those who acted with the hon. Member for East Clare were Tories in disguise. If the Debate went on very long the hon. Member would be undeceived more and more every day on that point. The hon. Gentleman suggested that the Amendment was most important; but he also suggested that it was unimportant. Such a speech suggested the question whether, after all, the minority of Ulster was worth preserving. If they could not produce Gentlemen more representative of the intelligence of Ulster than the hon. Gentlemen and his Colleagues, he thought they had better cease talking about the monopoly of intelligence and education in Ireland. He (Mr. Clancy) had great satisfaction in thinking that the Amendment was opposed by the Leader of the Opposition. The fear he had had was that Members from Ireland would be embarrassed by the right hon. Gentleman's support. The right hon. Gentleman stated that his principal reason for opposing the Amendment was that the use of the word "Parliament" would give to the Legislative Body to be set up in Ireland attributes similar to those which the Parliament at Westminster possessed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; what I said was that if I assented to the introduction of the word "Parliament," I should be taken as approving the application to Ireland of a word which implied all the attributes possessed by that Parliament.

MR. CLANCY said, that the use of the word "Parliament" would not add, in the least, to the force or power of the Irish Legislature. The effect of adopting the Amendment would simply be to gratify the National sentiment of Ireland, with respect to which the Prime Minister had said nothing in the course of his reply. He (Mr. Clancy) certainly wished the right hon. Gentleman had done so. Inasmuch as the Amendment was intended merely to gratify the National sentiment, it was a matter for regret that the right hon. Gentleman had not seen his way to accept it.

*MR. DARLING objected to the use of the word "Parliament," because he thought that word would be a very improper one to apply to the Irish Legislative Body; and his notion of the meaning of "Parliament" was derived from a book which dealt with the meaning of the word at a time when Parliaments were expressly got together to be a check upon the Angevin ancestors of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But it was absurd in this case to say that the Legislature in Ireland would be a Parliament consisting of Her Majesty the Queen, who, he thought, would not go to Ireland at all if this Bill passed—at least he hoped not—and two Houses, the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly. What they desired was that whatever was set up in Ireland it should not be a thing which by any possibility could be considered on a level with what existed at Westminster, and was properly called a Parliament. The Irish Representatives were already Members of Parliament, and that ought to satisfy the ambition of the most ambitious. To be a Member of Parliament in one place ought to suffice them; and if they were Members of Parliament at Westminster they could not, by any possibility, be technically Members of Parliament anywhere else. The word "Parliament" was used throughout the Bill, and was taken to mean the Parliament at Westminster. If the Amendment were adopted there would be two Parliaments in the Bill, which would lead to great confusion; and he could not see anything that would better serve the purposes of those who would desire to see the Assembly in Ireland encroaching on the Parliament at Westminster than to have both Bodies called, in the same Act of Parliament, a "Parliament." There would also be great difficulty in knowing which Body was referred to when Parliament was mentioned. ["No!"] Hon. Members said "No;" but he knew when assurances were given in the House how easily they were withdrawn in Room 15.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): You suggest the Irish Judges would be fools.

*MR. DARLING said, he did not know who of the Irish Members might be appointed a Judge, but he had no suggestion to make of any Irish Judge, except that he would be naturally disposed to earn for himself the description of what was called a good Judge—namely, that he would wish by every means in his power to enlarge his jurisdiction. He was sure that if the Irish Assembly were called a Parliament it would do what this Parliament had done—encroach on the rights and privileges of everyone in the realm, until it had all those rights and privileges itself. That was said to be the glorious history of this Parliament, and if the Irish Parliament desired a glorious history it must do what this Parliament had done. He did not desire to put upon the Irish Legislative Body any greater insult than the Prime Minister had put upon them. He did not wish to call them anything worse than the Irish Legislature; but he did not desire to call them anything so high or noble as a Parliament. Therefore, he would accept the designation given to the Irish Legislature by the Prime Minister and vote against the Amendment.

MR. J. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) said, it seemed to him that the Amendment which was now before the Committee was an example of the evil of uncertainty to which attention was called yesterday in Debate. If they knew exactly what scheme the Government meant to stick to when they got to Clause 9, they would be able to say a great deal better than at present what name it ought to be called by. The proper appellation of the Assembly, or whatever it might be, might be quite different when the Assembly was constituted by no Irish Representatives being here at all, or 103 being here always and for all purposes. It was perfectly obvious, in the latter case, that an Assembly in Ireland would be a much less dignified affair than the other arrangement. But it seemed to him they were bound to go by steps in this matter, and were not allowed to look six inches in front of them. Instead of knowing what were the vital principles of the Bill, what they had to do was to take the Bill as they found it and work consistently with that. Though he had an Amendment on the Paper similar to that of the hon. Member for East Clare (Mr. W. Redmond), he need hardly say he did not wish to see in Ireland either a Parliament or a Legislature established; and he must say, with all deference to the Leader of the Opposition, that he did not think his supporting the Amendment would, in any way, hamper him in taking any line he thought right, upon subsequent Amendments, to reduce the power of the Irish Legislature. For once, he was willing to take the advice given them last night by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid), and criticise this Bill from what was consistent with the provisions of the Bill as they stood. It seemed to him, according to the Bill as it stood now, what was proposed to be constituted in Ireland was properly called a Parliament and not merely a Legislative Assembly; and he should like to know—which, to some extent, would be shown by the result of a Division on the Bill—were Irishmen prepared to give up that name—Irish Nationalists, who in the past had made so much of that name—were they prepared to give up this sentiment which they had set so much store by? Distance lent a good deal of enchantment to Grattan's Parliament, and Grattan's Parliament was the ideal of many Nationalists' inspirations, and a Parliament on College Green was that for which Irishmen had held out. The precedent that had been given, hitherto, on this matter had been the precedent of Canada, and in regard to Canada the provisions of the North American Act were—

"There must be one Parliament consisting of the Queen, the Upper House or Senate, and a House of Commons, and a Legislature for the different Provinces."

There was a distinction drawn between a Parliament for Canada as a whole and a Legislative Assembly that took the place of various Bodies. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister drew a very ingenious but perfectly unsound course of argument as to the reason for that; he said it was to prevent confusion in the Act between Parliament in regard to the Colonies and this Parliament here; but certainly that was not the view taken in Canada. There the question had been discussed a great deal, and there, after the discussions, they had come to the conclusion, based on very good historical grounds, that "Parliament" was the proper name for such an Assembly as they had there. Here in this country they had not to discuss or consider what a Parliament was. Happily, they were here as a Parliament with no rival before them, but the result of the historical—the numerous historical—discussions was that Constitutional historians drew a distinction between Assemblies summoned ad ardua negotia regni and Assemblies summoned to pass by-laws concerned with details. The real meaning of “Parliament” was, that it was a Council, summoned as the old Councils were, for the difficult business of the realm; and if this Irish Parliament should ever be summoned, it would be summoned for as difficult business as most Parliaments had ever been summoned for. Therefore, it seemed to him, according to the scheme of the Bill, it really ought to be called a Parliament. But there was another precedent. Not only the right hon. Gentleman, but the hon. Member who proposed the Amendment, seemed to be unaware how much more authority they had on their side. In nearly all the Colonies the Legislative Assembly was called a Parliament.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) asked if the hon. Member could mention any Parliament, except that of Canada, called so in the Statute?

MR. PARKER SMITH said, he would give the hon. Member a reference to which he was just coming to, one that seemed to him to have a bearing on the present course of events—namely, that of Victoria. The Act which gave the Constitution to Victoria, the 18 & 19 Vic., c. 55, provided there should be “one Legislative Council and one Legislative Assembly.” But the next thing that happened was this: The first Act of the Session immediately ensuing upon Victoria obtaining that power—the first thing was “The Legislature of Victoria shall be and is hereby enacted a Parliament.” It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say he did not choose this to be called a Parliament, but he (Mr. Parker Smith) would be very much surprised if one of the first things the Irish Legislature did was not to bring in a Bill by which it would receive the full title of the Irish Parliament. And to quote Mr. Todd, the title of Parliament had been assumed by all the other Colonies where local self-government had been introduced. It was assumed by the Cape Colony; and if it did not occur in the Statutes, it was expressly adopted by the Imperial Government in Despatches issued to the Colony, and a good many marginal notes; and a curious place where he had found the use of “Parliament,” as applied to Ireland itself, was in the appendix of the authorised version of the speeches of the Prime Minister on the Irish Question, and there he found it called “a free Parliament.” Those were authorities upon which it seemed to him that the use of the word “Parliament” was appropriate. If, as he rather gathered from the interruption of the hon. Member, he was opposed to the use of the word “Parliament,” he would like to ask him whether he was prepared to assent to this being a permanent part of the arrangement; whether hon. Gentlemen would undertake, if they got to Dublin, they would not there do what was done by the Colony of Victoria, and at once assume the larger name?

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. Gentleman was not entitled to draw any inference from what he said. What he asked was whether there was any Assembly, except Canada, where the word “Parliament” had been used?

MR. PARKER SMITH was not surprised at being told he was not to draw an inference. As he could not draw the assurance from the hon. Member, if any Member of the Government had been present he should have liked to have asked whether, taking the lines they did take in regard to this matter, they were prepared to insert amongst the restrictions on the power of this Body—on the power of the Irish Assembly—a restriction that it should not assume the name of Parliament? But he must say it seemed to him that that restriction was one which, if they put it on, it would be impossible to enforce. How could they prevent any body of gentlemen from calling themselves exactly what they pleased? Whatever restriction they might introduce, the Irish Assembly would certainly call themselves a Parliament whatever might happen, and he thought substantially they would be a Parliament. He must say he thought, from the point of view of the Government, it was exceedingly unwise not to make a concession; it seemed to him to be spoiling the ship for a ha’porth of tar. In declining this measure—in refusing to call a spade a spade—the Government were guilty of political cowardice; they were content to do the thing, but did not like to use the name; they gave hon. Gentlemen opposite the substance of what they were desiring; but, at the same time, in order to be able to speak of it in two voices—to be able to re-assure their English supporters on this matter—they hid from view the name that more than another expressed the truth of the reality. The only reason for this attempt not to use the important name of Parliament seemed to him to show they were attempting to conceal from the country the real effect of their measure. He should support the Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) believed that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was a Unionist, and, therefore, he was somewhat surprised to hear him advocating that the Legislature in Ireland should be called “a Parliament,” but at the end of his speech he discovered why he had done so; it was for the pleasure of telling the Government they were guilty of political cowardice. He somewhat agreed with the conclusions of the hon. Gentleman; he did not see why the term “Parliament” should not be given to that Legislature. After all, what was that Legislature? A Legislature in this case was to be a Legislature and a Legislative Assembly, and that, in the ordinary acceptance of the word, was a Parliament. Speaking as an Englishman, he stood to the idea, “What’s in a name?” If it was a question of England, it would be a matter of indifference to him whether this ceased to be called a Parliament tomorrow; but in Ireland they were of a sentimental nature, and looked a great deal to the question of a name. There was no doubt that during this long controversy that had taken place in regard to giving Home Rule to Ireland, they had always spoken about giving a Parliament to Ireland. The Irish people had got it strongly into their heads that what they meant by Home Rule was an Irish Parliament, and he could not see why they should not have it. There were two reasons which would induce him to vote with his hon. Friend opposite. One was that he was perfectly convinced that the vast mass of the Irish people would be greatly gratified were this Home Rule scheme called a Parliament, and the other was that the Leader of the Opposition had declared himself against it. The Leader of the Opposition, though ready to vote for any Amendment, would vote against this, because it would prevent him advocating certain Amendments of his own. The acceptance of the Amendment would result in a saving of time, and he trusted it would be agreed to.

MR. W. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) was pleased that on this occasion he should be able to support the Prime Minister. He sympathised with the hon. Member for East Clare (Mr. W. Redmond) in his desire to have the word “Parliament” introduced, because that hon. Member, and some others who had been acting with him, had most zealously, industriously, and bravely been fighting for the achievement of what they called a National Parliament. Many of the funds remitted from America had been sent on the faith that they were for the purpose of achieving a National Parliament, and they knew that they regarded a National Parliament as giving the plant of an armed revolution. He therefore sympathised with the hon. Member for East Clare when, instead of getting a National Parliament, he got only a Legislative Assembly, which would figure and appear something like the London County Council. He sympathised with the Prime Minister also, and was very pleased to find in this matter he could agree with the right hon. Gentleman. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Northampton when he said “What’s in a name”? There was a great deal in a name. He recollected that when the conversion of the old Law Courts into the High Court was proposed, the late Sir Alexander Cockburn wrote a tract upon it, in which he animadverted upon the proposed change, as it affected the Court of Queen’s Bench, and said—

“There is everything in a name. There is all the prestige of the Court of Queen’s Bench.” He was right, and in the end it resulted in the name of the Queen’s Bench being preserved. He (Mr. Ambrose) said there was everything in a name. The name of Parliament at once represented a nation. It was an indication, and it spoke to the fact that the people who assembled and who were represented were in themselves a nation. Therefore, he quite sympathised with the views of the hon. Member for East Clare. That hon. Member desired that Ireland was to be a nation, and if Ireland was to be a nation Ireland should have a Parliament. That was the true principle. But he (Mr. Ambrose) did not desire that Ireland should be a nation—that was to say, not a separate nation. He desired that Ireland should be maintained as an integral part of the United Kingdom; that Ireland should not have the plant of an armed revolution. It was really a most important matter, because if they had an Irish Legislative Assembly or this so-called Irish Parliament really governing Ireland, even within the narrow limits indicated by the provisions in the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th clauses of the Bill, they might readily have questions arising between the National Assembly or the Local Parliament and the Imperial Parliament. Suppose the questions did arise, a quarrel ensued, and that force were resorted to. It seemed to him the Bill contemplated—and that was the only security he could see for the supremacy of the United Kingdom—an ultimate resort to force. If that were so, and if they gave the Irish Legislature the name of “Parliament,” if there were to be a rebellion they could collect their forces, they would acquire belligerent rights all over the world. They would be recognised as the Representatives of a nation, and no nation could refuse to the Parliament of Ireland the recognition of belligerent rights; whereas with the name of a mere Legislative Assembly, it would stand upon the footing of our County Councils, and would neither command the confidence of the people of Ireland to the same extent nor the sympathies of their friends in America and among the other nations of Europe. Exactly on the same ground as he desired to have the word “subordinate” introduced into the Bill as required by the last Amendment, he should resist the present Amendment. It was a matter of prestige of reputation and of influence, and he should vote against this Amendment.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll) had listened with some amazement to the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Ambrose), who, whilst he wished to extend the influence of this Irish Parliament to which he was so much opposed, proposed to vote for the insertion of the word “Parliament.”

MR. AMBROSE: I propose to oppose it, and that was the whole tenour of my observations.

MR. MACFARLANE had misunderstood the hon. Gentleman. One argument the hon. Member had used he did not think much of. He had told them that the late Sir Alexander Cockburn had written a pamphlet to prove it would be to the serious detriment of the administration of justice in this country if the old-fashioned Law Courts were called the High Court of Justice. He would ask the hon. Gentleman, who was a member of the legal profession himself, if that result had followed?

MR. AMBROSE: I expressly mentioned that, in deference to Sir Alexander Cockburn, the name of Queen’s Bench—the old name—was retained.

MR. MACFARLANE said, that was so, but the Courts were all embraced under the one title of High Court, and he understood the hon. and learned Member to produce this as a precedent against any change of name here. But a change of name did occur here in calling this a Legislature instead of a Parliament, because the old Irish Legislature was a Parliament. For his part, he did not see any very material difference. He did not see any material question, and he did not think hon. Members from Ireland pressed the point. [MR. W. REDMOND: We do.] At any rate, he did not think it was a matter which would interfere with the supremacy of this Parliament, which was the only point they had to consider. It would have neither influence on the supremacy of this Parliament, or on the subordinate Parliament, and, for his part, he was indifferent which word was used.

MR. FISHER (Fulham) was afraid that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken did not understand anybody. He had misunderstood his hon. and learned Friend, and he had entirely misapprehended the opinions of his own friends the Irish Representatives, who sat below the Gangway. For his part, he entirely sympathised with the views of the latter hon. Members. He could not understand the position of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. They seemed to him to be straining at a gnat, whilst they swallowed a camel. They swallowed the whole subordinate camel, whilst they strained at this subordinate gnat. If they professed to trust the Irish people with all these powers, they should also satisfy their proper sentimental objection to having their Parliament called a Legislature, whilst the Imperial Parliament was called a Parliament. He was rather prepared to support the Amendment, but the speech of the Prime Minister had entirely changed his vote. They were asked what, after all, was there in a name? He recollected the case of the Borough of Slough. The inhabitants thought the Borough of Slough was becoming unpopular as a place of residence, and so they proposed to change the name to Upton Royal. Somebody went to the meeting and asked, "What's in a name?" but the people saw a great deal in a name in that case. Without desiring to insult hon. Members below the Gangway, he should desire to adhere to the name Legislature after the speech of the Prime Minister, because he had told them there was a great deal in this name. He told them that if they called this a Legislature they were going to set up a Parliament. Irishmen would imagine they were to have much larger and extended powers than were given to any Colonial Legislature. Until he heard that speech he thought that as they were going to pass this Bill they might just as well allow the Assembly to be set up in Ireland to be called a Parliament. He held the opposite view altogether as to the merits of this proposal. He should move in Committee to limit the powers given under Clauses 3 and 4; and if he did not wish to limit them, he should vote for this Amendment, and call this Irish Legislature a Parliament. He held that hon. Gentlemen opposite, who wished to give this Parliament the enormous powers contained in this Bill, ought in consistency to call it by the name of Parliament, which was the proper name for any Body that was to exercise the powers contained in this Bill. But as he wished to limit those powers he should vote for giving that Body such a name as to signify that he wished it to be a kind of glorified County Council, a Body which dealt with gas and water, so as to carry out the pledges made in the Rossendale Election by the Liberal candidate for that constituency—backed up by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler)—who persuaded the electors that the Parliament to be given to Ireland would be a subordinate Parliament with very limited powers, chiefly restricted to dealing with gas and water. He congratulated hon. Members below the Gangway on the position they had taken up that night. They had voted against every single Amendment which had gone in the direction of dubbing their Parliament a subordinate Parliament, and now they had joined to that negative their positive attitude of claiming for the Assembly that was going to be set up in Dublin the name of Parliament, thereby for all time giving evidence that it was their intention to claim for this Body which they were setting up the possession of powers co-ordinate and not subordinate to the present Parliament. He was surprised at the ridiculous position which hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite had taken up in that matter, and he really would support the argument of the Member for East Clare (Mr. W. Redmond)—though not by his vote—and ask them to be a little consistent in this matter, and whilst willing to give the Irish people de facto powers, also to humour their natural and proper sentiment, and give them the name they desired for themselves.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland) said, they were in a position in this Parliament they never were in before. An hon. Member had just spoken. He had spoken against an Amendment, and he said he was against it because the Prime Minister was against it, and the great majority of Members on that (the Liberal) side were against it. That being so, the two sides being perfectly agreed, might he ask the hon. Member why he wasted the time of the House? If he had intended to vote for the Amendment he could have understood it; but if the hon. Member's only object was to spend a little time, then he must come to the conclusion that, whatever other men might be, the hon. Member was not a serious politician. The hon. Member was not a Conservative politician, because the proud boast of the Conservatives in this country had been, amongst others, that by their speeches, their votes, and their conduct they had dignified that Imperial House; and the hon. Member's way of adding to the dignity of debate and efficiency of Parliament, when he was against a proposal which most of them were against, was to spend time in irrelevant trivialities. He (Mr. Storey) was one of those who would gladly vote for calling this House a Parliament, or anything else. It did matter to him what they called the thing. What he wanted to know was, What was the thing? The thing was this: It was a Body elected by the people which should control the local affairs of Ireland without interference from the Imperial Parliament; and that being the thing, he did not trouble his head about what they called it. If his hon. Friend who moved the Amendment would prefer the term "Parliament," he also had no objection to say he preferred it. He found this was the position of affairs in the House—that the great majority of the Liberal Party were prepared to vote the thing with a certain name. The great majority of the Tory Party, upon the advice of their Leader, for other reasons were still prepared to adopt the name, and therefore they had three-fourths of the Members of the House who were prepared to adopt the name. And then he came to his friends from Ireland. What was their position? He had known them a great many years. He stood by their side in days when it was not the fashion of hon. Members opposite (the Opposition) to speak so respectfully of them as they were compelled to do now.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Nor on these (the Liberal) Benches.

MR. STOREY said, suppose they admitted that? His point was this: These hon. Members had compelled from both sides of the House attention to their views; and those hon. Members who had thus gone through the valley of humiliation and trouble year after year, until they had come into a triumphant position in that House and could command attention, he always knew to be men of sound sense who looked at the main point, and did not trouble themselves about trivialities. If he interpreted their view on this little matter it was this: that the House might call the thing by what name they liked. [MR. W. REDMOND: "No, no."] His hon. Friend was not as accurate as he usually was. He wanted to distinguish between the hon. Member who had taken up a position behind the Tory Party and the hon. Members below the Gangway.

MR. W. REDMOND: I am not the slave of the Liberal Party.

MR. STOREY said, no, he must do the hon. Member the justice to say he never was the slave of any Party; but it was possible for a man, without being that and without knowing it, to be the cat's-paw of a Party. He would ask hon. Members from Ireland, below the Gangway, were they content to accept the Assembly under whatever name it was called? If they were, he was prepared to join with them, and to vote for the measure as it stood. The Liberal Party and the Tory Party were both agreed, but for different reasons, that "Legislature" was the proper word; and the Irish Members, speaking for their country, said they were content to take the measure with the word "Legislature" in it. [An hon. MEMBER: They have not spoken.] His hon. Friend behind him said they had not spoken yet, and he had no doubt the hon. Member would be very glad if everyone of them would get up and speak. But in that House they spoke in two ways: articulately sometimes and inarticulately, and by their votes, and other of his hon. Friends, though inarticulately, had intimated that they were content to accept this word "Legislature." That being so, what were they wasting the time of the House for? He was prepared, as an English Radical, to vote for this particular word "Legislature" and to vote against the word "Parliament," because he well knew that under whatever name they might chose to describe it when the Irish got the Bill and got the Assembly, it would be the Parliament of the Irish people.

MR. V. GIBBS (Herts, St. Alban's) commented on the fact that the hon. Member who had last spoken had complained of another hon. Member wasting the time of the House and had then proceeded to take precisely the same course which he criticised another for taking. The hon. Member (Mr. Storey) had also made reference to the hon. Member, perhaps he might say his hon. Friend, the hon. Member for East Clare (Mr. W. Redmond). Till the hon. Member asked him to withdraw the term "hon. Friend" he should not do so. He was entirely and absolutely opposed to the hon. Member for East Clare, who had done him the honour of interrupting him several times when he disapproved of his observations, but he did not see why the hon. Member should be represented by hon. Members opposite as being in any way connected with them (the Opposition) because he sat on those Benches. The House seemed to him entirely disarranged because of hon. Gentlemen sitting on one side and voting on the other. He did not see, therefore, why they should object to any isolated case that occurred.

Mr. Philip Stanhope rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. V. GIBBS said, he opposed the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Clare (Mr. W. Redmond), for he could not help feeling that the substitution of the word "Parliament" for "Legislature" was only another step towards establishing still more firmly in the eyes of the Irish people the independence of the Irish Legislature, of the Imperial Parliament, which they on that side of the House would never agree to.

MR. JOHN E. REDMOND (Waterford, City) said, he was one of those who thought that the Debate on this Amendment should not be prolonged very much.

Mr. Storey

But he was not disposed to agree that the matter was as trivial a one as it had been described to be by some hon. Members who had taken part in the discussion. He had listened, as it was his duty and his pleasure to listen, with the greatest attention to the speech made by the Prime Minister, and he had also listened to the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman earlier in the evening—a speech which was still ringing in his ears. Considering the sympathy for Ireland and Irish aspirations with which the first speech was imbued, he confessed to the disappointment which he felt at the second one. This Amendment, if carried, could not affect in any way the status or privileges of either the Imperial or the Irish Parliament. The Imperial Parliament would remain in possession of the same full and unimpaired supremacy. The Irish Assembly—call it what they would for the moment—would not have its powers increased or extended in the smallest degree. But there could be no question at all that in the word "Parliament" there was more to sensitive feelings of the Irish people—more comprehended—than in the word "Legislature." An hon. Member had said that this Amendment was intended to prolong and perpetuate the tradition of Grattan's Parliament. If by that it was conveyed that they intended to transform the new Assembly into an Assembly governed by analogy in principle with Grattan's Parliament, the hon. Member was utterly wrong; but if he meant that this was to be an expression of the desire of the Irish people in their future Government to perpetuate the tradition they had cherished for so long of the old Irish Parliament, then the hon. Member was right. By showing respect to that tradition they could not in the remotest degree weaken the power of England, and it was a respect which he claimed from every hon. Member who supported the Bill. He had listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) with great interest. He remembered with the keenest gratitude that, as he had said that evening, he was on the side of Ireland when Ireland had few friends on either side of the House. The hon. Member expressed his preference for the word "Parliament" over "Legislature," or as against it; and if that were his preference, he claimed the hon. Member's vote on this occasion. His argument was fallacious. He said that there were certain preferences for names on different sides of the House, and then he said that the Irish Members had a certain preference for the Bill as it stood, and in favour of the name already given. Well, he (Mr. Redmond) was not going to pretend that he spoke in the name of the great body of the Nationalist Representatives of Ireland. He made no claim to that, but he did not hesitate to express his opinion that no Nationalist Member would rise in that House and say that the mass of the Irish people preferred the word "Legislature" to the word "Parliament." This was in one sense a small matter; but they were in Committee discussing the Bill, and he thought it was a matter that ought to command the sympathy and respectful attention of the gentlemen who were Home Rulers in the House. They were only at the commencement of the Committee stage. It had been noticed by the House that the Irish Nationalists had placed very few Amendments indeed on the Notice Paper; and he thought it might be taken for granted by those who had brought the Bill forward that no section of Irish Nationalists would play into the hands of the deadly enemies of the measure either by prolonging discussion or by profitless discussion on trivial points. There were some Irish Nationalists in the House who, speaking for a great body of electors and non-electors in their country, did not believe this was such a trivial matter as it was represented to be. He put the claim on the ground of patriotism, believing that a large section of Irish Nationalists would take it as a gratification and as a most welcome concession if the Prime Minister were to act in the spirit of the speech which he made early in the evening. He had listened to that speech with the greatest pride and gratitude. What they asked for could not, as he had said, lead to any curtailment of the rights of the Imperial Parliament or any extension of the rights of the Irish Parliament. To agree to the Amendment would be a small concession to a sentiment—a sentiment that no man living knew better than the Prime Minister.

It was a wholesome and a healthy sentiment which ought to be cultivated, which would continue to live, and which would inevitably be apparent—upon which would depend the success or failure of the government of Ireland by the Body they sought to create. He most respectfully asked the Government and the Prime Minister to adopt a more conciliatory attitude. He was securing no value to his own country by adhering to his present position; by yielding he would be making a concession which would be most valuable, and which would be received with gratitude, and which, granted as it would be at the commencement of the Committee proceedings, would augur well for the future progress of the Bill.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I can assure my hon. and learned Friend that the Government sympathise with the sentiment to which he has given expression. We agree that there ought to be the least possible curtailment of concession in matters obstructing or impeding the flow of wholesome and healthy National sentiment. I have never doubted that the foundation of the case for Home Rule is that we should provide a Constitutional Organisation through which that wholesome and healthy National sentiment could find expression. But, in considering this Amendment, we have to look at all the circumstances that surround it, and those circumstances are well-known, not only to my hon. Friend and the Mover of the Amendment, but to all hon. Members, wherever they might sit, who desire the success of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman has admitted that this change of name from "Legislature" to "Parliament" would not concede one single atom of power to an Irish Government, or alter the powers and prerogatives to this Parliament. It is clear, therefore, that this difference of opinion arises on no point of substance in the argument now being carried on. There is no point of substance or power lost to an Irish Legislature or Executive by calling it "Legislature" instead of "Parliament." The Government have to survey the whole range of circumstances that affect the reception of the Bill. In order to satisfy a sentiment which I thoroughly respect, and which I should desire to satisfy even in matters of nomenclature alone, but not to gain anything substantial either in prerogative or privilege, the Government are asked to awaken jealousies and to arouse susceptibilities which would undoubtedly make the progress of our policy more difficult. [Opposition cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite, as they show by their demonstrations of opinion, do not understand the realities of the Irish Question. I will undertake to say that, with the exception of a few hon. Gentlemen whom I saw sitting on the Front Bench opposite—hon. Gentlemen there know nothing whatever about the matter, and I can say that I have never seen at Question time—[Cries of "Oh!"—]—or upon Motions for Adjournment, or in any other part of the Proceedings of the House, any indication that those hon. Gentlemen have a real knowledge of what the right hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) calls the real facts of Irish life as contradistinguished from Parliamentary life. But I will return to the argument. The point is: whether, for the satisfaction of a sentiment which those on the Government side of the House respect, you are going, without any substantial gain in any point, to arouse jealousies and susceptibilities which, however unreasonable and foundationless they may be, would still interfere with the progress of the policy which would really concede to Ireland all those claims which her Representatives now demand. I would point out to hon. Gentlemen like the hon. and learned Member who has just spoken that the word "Parliament" in Irish history, except from the point of view of Nationality—and I cordially recognise its importance from that point of view—the word "Parliament" does not convey the idea of a Legislative Body with anything like the powers which the Legislature constituted under this Bill will possess. Who in this House does not know that throughout the whole of the 18th century, until 1782, the Irish Parliament worked under the fetters of the famous Poyning's Act? That law enacted that no Bill should be brought before the Irish Parliament until it had received the sanction—first, of the Irish Privy Council, and then of the Privy Council in London. The Legislature that is now proposed to be established will be under no such fetters. Then there was Grattan's Parliament; but will anybody contend that Grattan's Parliament gave the Irish people such control over their own laws and destinies as this Bill gave to them?

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): What about the franchise of that day?

MR. J. MORLEY: The franchise of that day! What has the franchise to do with it? The noble Lord, unlike hon. Gentlemen behind him, really knows a great deal about Irish history, and I was quite astonished that the noble Lord should have fastened upon the point of the franchise as a point of difference between Grattan's Parliament and the Legislature now proposed to be constituted. Has he forgotten that under Grattan's Parliament Ministers were nominated and appointed, not by that Body, but by the British Ministers, and that they spoke and acted under the control and direction of the British Ministers, and that the Executive was to all intents and purposes a British Executive?

LORD R. CHURCHILL: No.

MR. J. MORLEY: Well, I will refer the noble Lord to a book with which, no doubt, he is well acquainted—Dr. Ball's book upon The Irish Legislative Assemblies, and he will find there that under Grattan's Parliament the Executive was not what the Bill proposed to constitute—namely, an Executive responsible to the Irish Legislative Body—but an Executive appointed by and entirely responsible to British Ministers.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: The condition referred to was that Irish Ministers, though appointed by the sanction of British Ministers, took the side of the Irish Parliament.

MR. J. MORLEY: I entirely doubted that, and I will submit this proposition on the authority of the former Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Dr. Ball), that the Irish Ministers spoke and acted under the control of the British Ministers and went out of Office, not when they got a hostile vote from the Irish Chamber, but when the British Ministers disapproved. I will not, however, prolong the controversy; but I will challenge the noble Lord to meet me now or any period on that point. I submit to my hon. Friend that, in pressing this Amendment, he is pressing for language which would represent a sentiment that would convey erroneous ideas as to the true policy of this Bill, and in agreeing with him we should be possibly sacrificing the substance for something that was not far from being the shadow.

SIR E. CLARKE (Plymouth): The hon. and learned Member for Waterford has put forward the first claim that, so far as I know, has been made on behalf of the Representatives of Ireland with respect to this Bill. He has claimed that the word "Legislature" should be struck out, and the word "Parliament" put in; and the Committee has heard from the Chief Secretary, following the Prime Minister, why it is that the Government are not prepared on this point to yield to the sentiments of the Irish Members. The Chief Secretary has said that the reason why the alteration is not accepted is that it would arouse jealousies and susceptibilities—

MR. J. MORLEY: The reasons for not accepting it were explained fully by the Prime Minister, and my speech was intended to supplement that speech.

SIR E. CLARKE: I, of course, accept the statement of the Chief Secretary that his reasons must be taken in connection with, and supplementary to, the reasons given by the Prime Minister. As to the reasons given as his own by the Chief Secretary why the Nationalist Members should not go to a Division upon this point, it is desirable that those reasons should be examined. The right hon. Gentleman said that to alter the words would be to arouse jealousies and susceptibilities. Whose jealousies and susceptibilities? In 1886, as in 1893, the cardinal proposition and the whole centre and scope of the Bill was to establish in Ireland a Parliament with an Executive responsible to that Parliament. Why is it that the Ministry has banished the word "Parliament" from every part of the Bill, and that they everywhere speak of Acts of Parliament as distinguished from Irish Acts? Why is there this careful abandonment of the idea of a Parliament? Is it historical, or is it because of Parliamentary convenience and of the necessities of the case? I do not think that the historical reason is a good one. I agree that up to 1782 the Parliament of Ireland, as it is called, was limited and controlled in such a fashion that it did not represent what we now take to be a Parliament, and I remember that in 1886 I exposed myself to the anger of hon. Members below the Gangway, because I said that up to 1782 Ireland practically had no Parliament at all. I do not call that a Parliament which requires to have every part of its work initiated by a power outside itself, and which could carry no measure into law without the concurrence of the officials of another country. But when Grattan's Parliament was established, surely the right hon. Gentleman has not forgotten the claims which Grattan made for his Parliament, and that memorable speech in which Grattan congratulated the Parliament of Ireland upon the triumph they had won. There were five points which Grattan enumerated in that great speech as the claims which he made and obtained on behalf of the Irish nation as privileges belonging to their Parliament—and not one of those privileges is given by the present Bill. I cannot enumerate them all just now; but you remember, I am sure, that one was to get rid of the perpetual Mutiny Bill, and another was to get rid of the appeal to the Privy Council in England. What I want to point out is this. I think the Government are right in calling the Body they propose to set up a Legislature, and not a Parliament, and I hope that we shall support them in that, because this body you are about to establish has not one of the five privileges which Grattan asserted for the Irish Parliament. It is limited and controlled in every direction; and we hope to be able to limit and control it still further. We agree with the Government, and will vote for them on this occasion, precisely because, if we were once to accept the word "Parliament," we should be accepting that which we believe it would be our duty never to establish in Ireland.—a Body having in itself the constituent parts, the faculties, and the power of a Legislative Assembly such as is generally understood. We should put it out of the power of Parliament to limit to any important extent the powers of this Body. But I come back to this point about the jealousies and susceptibilities, and I cannot understand what the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has put before us. On that point I press one question—Whose jealousies and susceptibilities is it that, by calling this a Legislature instead of a Parliament, you will appease? There must be some object who is susceptible. The Irish Members I can quite understand are, or ought to be, susceptible in this matter. They want a Parliament, and they will doubt the goodwill of the Government when they decline to give to the Body they wish to establish the traditional designation. But the Chief Secretary for Ireland says that the Opposition do not understand what these jealousies and susceptibilities are, because—and this is a curious phrase—we do not understand "the realities of the Irish situation." Does that mean the Irish situation in Ireland, or the Irish situation in this House? It is possible that some of us do not properly understand the Irish situation in Ireland; but there are on this Front Opposition Bench hon. Gentlemen who, by their own responsibility in Ireland and by their own administration of affairs in Ireland, probably know almost as much about the Irish situation in Ireland as the Chief Secretary himself. I do not think that it is the Irish situation in Ireland that we do not know, but the Irish situation in the House. We are hoping, patiently hoping, to be able, at some time or other, to pierce the gloom in this matter, and to be able to see through the relations which are supposed now to exist between the Irish Party and the Government. The right hon. Gentleman gave a hint to his Irish friends, and suggested that they should not divide. It is possible that they will take that hint and obey that suggestion, and will not embarrass the Government at this point in the discussion. It will be very interesting to see how many of them will have the courage in this House to stand by the declarations they have made outside, and to claim for the Irish people that they shall have a Parliament. We have given fair warning why it is we mean to vote against the Amendment. It is for this reason—that if we can prevent them from calling this a Parliament we shall conceive ourselves able, and shall try to limit in every direction the scope and the action of the Body in Ireland, so as to make it, in our view, even supposing the Bill should pass, as little harmful to the interests of this country as may possibly be. Probably the Irish Members will not approve of these reasons. It will probably induce them at the last moment to give way, and not to exhibit their weakness in the matter. At any rate, there is no ambiguity in our action; and we shall listen with curiosity to hear, on the later stages of the discussion, the explanations as to jealousies and susceptibilities which make at this moment the Government so anxious.

Mr. William Redmond rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: As to the nature of Grattan's Parliament, and the substantial difference between that Parliament and the Legislature which the Bill proposes to constitute, may I read an extract from The Irish Legislative Assemblies of Dr. John Ball—

"Grattan at once rose to congratulate the House of Commons and the people of Ireland upon their recovered freedom, and to announce in the name of the nation the terms which were demanded in order to satisfy its requirements. These terms were:—(1) Repeal of the perpetual Mutiny Bill and dependence of the Irish Army on the Irish Parliament; (2) the abolition of the legislative power of the Council; (3) the abrogation of the claim of England to make laws for Ireland; (4) the exclusion of the English House of Peers and of the English King's Bench from any judicial authority in Ireland; (5) the restoration of the Irish Peers to their final judicature—the independence of the Irish Parliament in its sole and exclusive Legislature."

In a foot-note Dr. Ball added—

"The speech regards the claim of the British Parliament to legislate for Ireland as withdrawn 'by operation of treaty, not of mere grace and condescension,' and the withdrawal as being, therefore, irrevocable. 'England and Ireland,' Grattan says, 'treat as ex æquo.' Substantially Grattan's terms were afterwards conceded."

MR. J. MORLEY : The noble Lord has read out something which has absolutely no bearing whatever on the point of controversy. I was arguing that Grattan's Parliament did not receive the powers which this Bill will confer in a most vital respect—namely, the Executive. I referred the noble Lord to a certain volume, and I will read the passage he ought to have read to himself. This was the passage the noble Lord ought to have read to himself—

"When the legislation of this period is considered it is to be kept in mind that it did not extend to the administrative or executive departments of government in Ireland. The Irish Ministers were, and continued to be, appointed and liable to removal by the British Ministers, and spoke and acted subject to their control and direction. An adverse vote, even a Vote of Censure, of the Irish House of Commons did not necessarily remove the former from Office, while an adverse vote of the British House of Commons, if it led to the resignation of the British Ministers, was in most instances followed by the resignation of the Irish."

Mr. William Redmond rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put"; but the Chairman again withheld his assent, and declined to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I am not going to keep the Committee from a Division, and I have no intention of taking part in the interesting discussion which has been going on, and which I think may be designated as "tossing the ball across the Table." But I rise to say that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary throws a very interesting light upon the policy of Her Majesty's Government with reference to the proceedings under this Bill. The Chief Secretary has told us that the Government sympathise with the national sentiment which is expressed in this Amendment, and thereupon they are going to vote against it. At an earlier period of the evening my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister appeared to sympathise with, and expressed his concurrence in, the views of those who desire that this Parliament in Ireland shall be a subordinate Legislature, and thereupon the Government voted against the insertion of words in the Bill to carry out that view. And so it goes on. It appears to me to be the policy of the Government that whenever they have in their inmost mind a clear conviction of a policy they vote against its expression in the Bill itself. I have only to say as to the Amendment before the Committee that I entirely concur in what has been said by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth and the hon. Member for the Partick Division. The latter has truly said that under the Bill the Legislature in Dublin will be a Parliament with practically all the powers of a Parliament, and is desirous that a spade should be called a spade, that what is a Parliament in fact should be called a Parliament in name. But I must remind the hon. Member that we have not passed the Bill at present. The hon. Member for Dumfries has complained that the Opposition are not, apparently, inclined to join him and his hon. Friends in amending the Bill. That is an entire mistake. We are prepared to amend the Bill, and if we can only succeed in amending it according to our desires I am quite sure that after that proceeding has been completed no one in the House will pretend to call the body which will be created in Dublin a Parliament. I think that, under these circumstances, it would be premature to anticipate the discussion by accepting the present Amendment. I am hopeful of making converts in the course of the lengthy discussions that are about to take place; and, in the meantime, I should much prefer that this Parliament should be called a Legislature until we have settled whether it shall be a Parliament, a Legislature, or a Council.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 466 ; Noes 40.—(Division List, No. 75.)

MR. T. W. RUSSELL begged to move the next Amendment, to omit the words "and of two Houses, the Legislative Council," the effect of which would be to withdraw from the Bill the provision for setting up a Second Chamber. They had to regard this in the light of the fact, in the first place, that the Bill was proposed by a Government a large number of whom did not believe in a Second Chamber at all. That was certain, as far as the Home Secretary and the Chief Secretary for Ireland were concerned. He was forced to the conclusion, therefore, that the Government had inserted the Second Chamber in the Bill, not because they approved of it, but from the standpoint of its being a safeguard for the minority of the Irish people. A Second Chamber might be defended on the plea of revision, or on the ground that it insured delay in all doubtful legislation. Now, whatever claim a Second Chamber might have in theory, nobody imagined that the proposed Chamber could claim to be co-ordinate with the Representatives of the people directly elected to express the people's views. The Second Chamber proposed by the Bill did not seem to be proposed either for the purpose of revision or delaying doubtful legislation. It was sought to be created expressly to protect the Irish minority; and the question arose whether the protection afforded by the Chamber was a real or a sham protection, and on that question he proposed to join issue with the Government to-night. This brought him to the actual proposal of the Bill. The same idea was in the Bill of 1886, but expressed in different words. It was then proposed to establish separate Orders sitting and voting in the one Chamber. That idea was not original, as it had a place in the Constitution of the Irish Episcopal Church. But that idea apparently had been given up, and in this Bill they were to have two Chambers, one with 103 elected Members, and the other with 48 Members, elected on the restricted franchise of over £20 valuation. Now, he had looked very carefully into the Schedule under which the 48 Members of the Legislative Council were to be elected, and he was of opinion that the Unionist Party would not secure more than 20 votes. They would probably secure three in Antrim, two in the Borough of Belfast, one in County Carlow, one in County Cavan, one in the City of Cork, one in County Donegal, three in County Down, two in County Dublin, one in Fermanagh, one in Londonderry, one in County Monaghan, one in County Tyrone, and one in County Wicklow. They were met by the argument that they ought not to look upon the Irish Legislature as consisting of two Parties — Unionists and Nationalists. They were constantly being told that the Irish Parliament would be split up into fragments, and that the Unionists would govern the whole thing. They were told that the hon. Member for North-East Cork would probably lead a Socialistic wing of the Irish Party. He supposed that the hon. Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) might be taken as representing the clerical wing of the Party. Probably the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) would lead the Conservatives, and someone else would look after the interests of the Party of Plunder. Everyone knew that this was the kind of argument put forward almost every day on public platforms; but it was an argument which ignored the governing fact that Ireland was not a country of cities or towns. There were only 16 Members out of the 103 Representatives of Ireland who sat for urban constituencies. The remainder were elected solely by small tenant farmers. He believed, therefore, that the only Parties that would come to the front in an Irish Parliament would be one composed of agrarian Members. There would, under these circumstances, be no room for the differences that the Gladstonian Party frequently asserted would take place. He asked the Committee to look at the electorate and who would compose it.

Mr. T. W. Russell

MR. J. MORLEY : I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but I rise to a point of Order. I wish to know, Mr. Mellor, whether it is right upon this Amendment to discuss the composition of the Chamber and the electorate? Is not that a question that will come up on a later clause?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : On the point of Order, Mr. Mellor, may I venture to point out to you before you give your ruling that the words of the clause are "the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly," distinctly implying that the Legislative Council contemplated is the one afterwards provided?

Therefore it is impossible to discuss the propriety of the Amendment without keeping in view what the Legislative Council as provided in the Bill can be.

THE CHAIRMAN : I think it is impossible to discuss the expediency of a Legislative Council without considering what its composition is to be. At the same time, it is very undesirable to anticipate the discussion of another clause in the Bill. All I can say now is that I think it is quite in Order to refer to the composition of the Legislative Council.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he was arguing the question from the safeguard standpoint; and unless he could show that the Legislative Council proposed in the Bill was not likely to be a proper safeguard, he did not see that there was any necessity for moving an Amendment at all upon the point. He was extremely sorry that the right hon. Gentleman should have intervened in a matter of that kind, as he (Mr. Russell) did not usually make long speeches and was very seldom ruled out of Order. He must ask the Committee, with reference to the question of the Second Chamber being a safeguard, to consider the character of the electorate. The qualification was to be a £20 valuation. He asked the Committee to take the counties of Clare, Kerry, Cork, and Limerick, and to observe that, as a simple matter of fact, the men who would be the constituency of the Legislative Council would be the very men who, by their cowardice in regard to juries, were now reducing those counties to absolute anarchy. It was absolute folly for the Government to expect the Committee to believe that a Council elected under such a qualification was at all likely to prove a safeguard to the Irish minority. By making a careful analysis of the Legislative Council, it would be seen that the Unionist Party would be in a minority in it as well as in the Lower Chamber. He was not against the principle of Second Chambers. One strong argument in their favour was given by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Bryce) in his book on The American Constitution. The right hon. Gentleman had there pointed out that every State of the American Union had adopted such Chambers; and that, at all events, would go to show that they were considered essential institutions even in that democratic country. A Second Chamber was proposed by the Government, however, not on principle at all, for the men who had proposed it did not believe in Second Chambers. He was driven to the conclusion that it was inserted as a safeguard for the minority; and, as one of the Representatives of the minority, he told the Government that he did not consider it a safeguard at all. He regarded it as the very opposite, and he asserted that the Government were deceiving the English people when they held it out as a safeguard. Safeguards were not necessarily illusory. The supremacy, for instance, was one of the safeguards in the Bill, and if the Unionists had had their way they would have made it an effective safeguard. They had not had their way, and the result was that it remained entirely illusory and non-effective. He was driven to inquire whether the Second Chamber was as illusory a safeguard as the supremacy. If he saw the slightest hope of amending the provisions with regard to it, if he saw any independence on the Ministerial side of the House, if he saw the slightest desire to make the safeguards effective, he should have a little more confidence in the proposal. As he saw no chance of this, he, as one of the Representatives of the Irish minority, told the Government that he did not look upon the Legislative Council as a safeguard. They considered that, instead of its being a safeguard, it would simply deceive the British people. Numbers of Englishmen would point to the Second Chamber as safeguarding the Irish minority when it really did nothing of the kind. Had any Member of the Irish minority ever asked for this illusory safeguard? He ventured to assert that no speech could be pointed to in which any such demand or request was made. They had always said that if hon. Gentlemen who were, under the Bill, to become their rulers were to be trusted, then the safeguards were an insult to them; while, if they were not to be trusted, then they might depend upon it that a mere paper safeguard would not control them. Hon. Members among the supporters of the Government were against Second Chambers on principle, and yet they were going to vote for this clause. They were fighting against the House of Lords here, and saying it must be "ended," because it could not be "mended"; and, nevertheless, they proposed to set up a pinchbeck House of Lords in Ireland.

MR. FLYNN: An elective House.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: A House elected by those jurors in Clare and Limerick who were visited by the mob before the Assizes, and intimidated from doing their duty. Nothing was more certain than that if the House of Lords was to be ended here a Second Chamber could not endure in Ireland. Therefore, hon. Members ought to have the responsibility of their convictions and vote against this proposition of the Bill. He was not arguing against Second Chambers on principle; but he was contending that this proposed Second Chamber would not prove a safeguard at all, and that the Bill would be better without it than with it.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, to leave out the words "and of two Houses, the Legislative Council and."—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'two Houses' stand part of the Question."

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, it was difficult to understand what the hon. Member who last spoke required. At one moment he said he did not want this safeguard at all, and at another he said he did. According to him, they had been occupied discussing a paper safeguard for the last two nights. Now, if he really required a safeguard, would he be good enough to enlighten the Committee, and tell them precisely in what way he wished to arrange a Second Chamber which should be a guarantee for the minority? If his hon. Friend were consistent he would put forward Amendments not to destroy the Bill, but to benefit the Bill. But his hon. Friend was simply following the orders given him by the Leader of the Opposition. He had moved an Amendment simply with the object of destroying the

Mr. T. W. Russell

Bill or of obstructing its discussion. He had himself intended to propose an Amendment precisely similar. To superficial observers it might appear that there was inconsistency in putting down an Amendment and voting against it. But in this particular case it was only an alteration in the incidents of procedure with respect to the Bill. He was himself in favour of one Chamber. But that was not a principle; it was rather, he might say, an opinion—a perfectly unbiassed opinion. Neither one Chamber nor two Chambers were necessarily democratic. There were democratic countries in which there were two Chambers, and democratic countries in which there was one Chamber. In every State of the United States there were two Chambers. Would hon. Gentlemen deny that those States were under a democratic system of government? In Norway, which was a democratic country, they had practically one Chamber which divided itself into two. The Chamber was elected by the same franchise, and when it came together it elected 30 Members which formed the Upper Chamber, and when there was a difference of opinion between the two they met together. The plan of the Bill set up a Chamber which could be said to be neither two nor one, or it might be said to be both two and one. Therefore it seemed to him upon consideration that a person in favour of two Chambers or of one might equally vote in favour of either. A Legislative Assembly and a Legislative Council had to be elected. They would sit in separate rooms, and if they disagreed—and with his knowledge of his hon. Friends opposite he thought it possible that they would disagree—they at once ceased to be two Chambers, and the ultimate decision would be the result of equal voting in one Chamber. If that were proposed for England he would be against it, as he would regard it as a very cumbrous mode of legislation. But the majority of the Irish Members were in favour of it; if they thought that they were so impulsive that it would be better that a Bill should be read six times instead of three—namely, three times in one Chamber and three times in the other—well, then, let them have two Chambers. It was a matter which concerned the Irish Members; it was not a matter of principle. But the real question which concerned Radicals was, how was this Second Chamber to be elected? He certainly did hold the principle, not only as a pious opinion, but as a pious principle, that every legislator, if he had the right to legislate for his fellow-citizens, should be elected by the vote of his fellow-citizens. That was what Radicals had been struggling for during the last two years. They were in favour of one man one vote. If they agreed to the Legislative Council as proposed in the Bill they would give one man one vote and another man two votes. As a Radical, it would be impossible for him to vote in favour of the proposal that only persons with a £20 qualification should vote for a Member of the Legislative Council. The hon. Member said he moved his Amendment because he was afraid he should not be able to amend the Legislative Council. He trusted himself that he should be able to amend this particular clause. Some of them had hopes that this Bill would lead to Home Rule all round. They did not want this question of the absolute right of the individual to vote—one man one vote—to be prejudiced by giving to Ireland a Legislature in which the principle was laid down that one of its branches was to be elected by a high property qualification. They did not believe in any such safeguards. They did not wish to deprive the rich man of his vote, but they objected to giving a man a double vote. He had stated his views, and he believed he had given perfectly sound reasons why he intended to vote against the Amendment. He intended to vote as a matter of strategy. If he thought the House and the majority of the Irish Members were in favour of one House instead of the proposed arrangement, he should certainly have pushed forward his own Amendment. What the Amendment sought to establish could not be said to be an essentially democratic principle; but it was a democratic principle that, whether there were one or two Chambers, all the persons sitting in them should be elected by an equal popular vote.

*MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid.) said, that if he might quote the words of the last speaker he would say that, as a superficial observer of modern Radical strategy, he had watched with interest the spectacle of the hon. Member for Northampton letting down buckets full of principle and drawing up buckets full of pious opinions from the inexhaustible wells of truth. With regard to the Amendment, he would appeal to his Unionist friends on both sides of the House to vote for it, and thus to stamp with their condemnation one of the grossest and most treacherous shams ever brought forward. Never before did a Government so determine to deceive the British people, or to humbug the electorate with false safeguards. Never was Parliament offered a more treacherous, deceptive measure. It was most unworthy treatment of the Irish Loyalists. In the Bill of 1886 an Upper Chamber was proposed in which the Irish Representative Peers were to sit. It was also proposed to require a property qualification for elected Members and a £25 franchise for electors. Why had the Peers and the property qualification been omitted in this Bill and the franchise reduced from £25 to £20? What was the reason of this rapid fall in so short a period of six years. If these things were to be regarded as safeguards, what had occurred during the past six years to make the Government less careful of the interests of the Irish Loyalists? The Committee had already been informed what the £20 franchise in Ireland meant. In 1871 the rating for common jurors was fixed at £20, but so disgraceful was their conduct—

MR. T. M. HEALY: I rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask you whether the hon. Member is in Order in referring to the common jurors in Ireland?

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot say that the hon. and learned Member is out of Order.

*MR. DUNBAR BARTON said, he was only referring to it as an exemplification of what the franchise meant. It ought to be known that by the institution of this Second Chamber the Irish Loyalists would not be protected. The rating for common jurors in Ireland was fixed at £20, and so disgraceful was their discharge of their duties that Parliament found it necessary to raise the qualification for common jurors to £30, and, subsequently, to £40. The very Government now in Office, when they were previously in power, found it necessary to substitute special for common juries in the case of criminal trials. If they could not trust the common jurors to give just verdicts in criminal cases, how could they trust them to elect this Second Chamber? The persons who possessed the £20 qualification were the small farmers in Ireland, who were the most under the control of the Irish priesthood, and the consequence would be that the Upper House would be a priest-ridden body, and the House would be a priests' House. He would sooner trust to the Irish democracy than to the priests. Such a House would be exclusive without being select, and it would not be a House of Lords, but a House of Snobs, as it had already been described in Ireland. It would have all the vices of an Upper House, and none of its usefulness. It was an insult to all the Upper Chambers in the world to compare them with such a House, because instead of being dignified, admirable, and useful, it would be creeping, mean, and contemptible. There was no comparison between the American Senate and this miserable House which it was proposed to set up. There were no limits of age or of citizenship provided in the Bill as qualification for seats in this Upper House, as there were in the case of the American Senate; there was nothing to prevent an alien becoming a Member, and he believed and dreaded that, like the Lower House and Irish society generally, it might be overrun and overwhelmed by American adventurers and returned Fenians, who, having paid their money, would exact this in return.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I ask the hon. and learned Member to look at Clause 5.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON said, he declined to look at Clause 5, or any other clause. He invited the hon. and learned Gentleman to rise at an early opportunity and take part in the Debate.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Mr. Mellor, I am not such a fool.

Mr. Dunbar Barton

MR. DUNBAR BARTON said, he could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that no countryman of his would put him down for a fool. The hon. and learned Gentleman was the very man they wanted to hear speak on the Bill. He was not a fool—he knew what he meant; was careful about what he said, and therefore they were all anxious to hear his views—not on whether aliens could be Members of the Upper House or not, for that was but a small matter—but on the entire Bill. It had been laid down by a great writer, Hamilton, that the one thing which was desirable for a satisfactory Constitution was that there should be a dissimilarity of genius between the two Houses. In this country we had the hereditary principle in the House of Lords, and the elective principle in the House of Commons. In America, also, the mode of election of the two Houses was entirely different. But what was so deficient in the Upper House proposed in this Bill was that there was no dissimilarity of genius between it and the other House. What was the difference between the modes of election of the two Houses? The Lower House was to be elected on the household franchise, and the Upper House was to be elected, forsooth! on a £20 franchise. Who would regard the opinion of the £20 householder as of greater value than the opinion of the voter for the lower House? They were simply setting up a second elected Chamber, which was hardly different from the Lower Chamber, and whose only function would be to corroborate and to give a false strength to the unjust legislation of the Lower House. It would, therefore, give no protection to anybody in Ireland, and would be of no value to Great Britain. Where did this Council come from? Where did the right hon. Gentleman get this particular safeguard from? He had got safeguards from all parts of the world. He had taken the safeguard as to the supremacy from Canada, the financial safeguards from the Argentine Republic, and some of the safeguards for the loyal minority in Ireland were borrowed from the amendment of the American Constitution, which was applied to negroes. He believed that the safeguard of the Second Chamber had been borrowed from some part of the Australian Colonies, and he had heard that in Australia they had already christened their Council the Kangaroo Council. It was called the Kangaroo Council, partly because of the country of its origin, and partly because it was supposed to have come over in the same steamboat as the boxing kangaroo. But there was this remarkable distinction between the Council and the kangaroo—that that sagacious animal was of some use to his owner, this Second Chamber was more ridiculous than the animal and of no use to anybody. The Irish Loyalists would have none of these fantastic safeguards from all parts of the world. They wanted British safeguards, and if they could not get them they would depend on themselves for protection. It had been said that they had no trust in the people. They trusted the people more than the Government trusted them, and they would rather trust the Irish people, as represented in the Lower Chamber, than this miserable, false Upper House. The Government were trying to humbug the British people. The hon. Member for South Tyrone had said that the Loyalists would obtain seats in the Upper House. He thought the hon. Gentlemen was an optimist. He would only undertake to say that they would gain 10 out of the 20 seats mentioned by the hon. Member. Ulster would gain nothing by the raising of the franchise, because in Ulster the lower they went the more loyal they were. [Laughter.] He meant lower in the social scale. The Radicals who proposed to set up this House of Snobs in Ireland now laughed at an allusion to people in a lower social scale. He challenged anyone to deny that in Ulster they could get more Representatives in the Upper House than in the Lower, because the population in the six counties which returned 19 Members out of 24 was concentrated. They could hardly return more on a higher franchise. Certainly, he did not believe that the men returned on a higher franchise would be one whit more loyal or more Conservative than the men returned on the lower franchise. Therefore, in Ulster they would not be better off on a higher than on a lower franchise.

They were, as he had said, concentrated in Ulster. The Loyalists in other parts of Ireland were scattered. They had no right to be reproached because they were scattered. Why were Loyalists in the other Provinces scattered? Because they had been for centuries England's scattered garrison. They had guarded British interests. What was England's strength then was their weakness now. They were now to be handed over to enemies whom they had made in England's cause. He did not know how the Radicals were going to vote on this Amendment. If they voted for this travesty of a Second Chamber, he did not know how they could reconcile such a vote to their consciences, except that it was intended to degrade the principle of a Second Chamber. Indeed, if the Radicals wanted to degrade the principle of the Second Chamber, they would vote for this miserable House. They could not justify their vote on any other ground whatever. The Second Chamber would be no safeguard for the Loyalists. On the contrary, it would be a sham safeguard, and a sham safeguard was a danger in disguise.

*MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) moved to report Progress. The Prime Minister gave him a distinct pledge that progress would be made with the North Sea Fisheries Bill, which was the next Order on the Paper, and the ten minutes remaining before midnight was insufficient for another speech on the Amendment before the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Heneage.)

MR. J. MORLEY: I hope that the Motion will not be pressed. There is still time to continue this discussion on the Amendment, though I admit the importance of the Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I trust the Government will accede to the Motion. They will practically lose no time by so doing, and they will be bringing on a Bill which is of far more importance to the country than the Home Rule Bill.

MR. J. MORLEY : There is no reason why that Bill should not be taken after 12 o'clock.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans) : I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that it will not be allowed to be taken after 12 o'clock.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : The Government surely cannot expect that the discussion on this Amendment should close this evening. Though an extremely important Amendment has been proposed, not a word has been said with reference to it by the Government. If the Government still resists the Motion to report Progress, I would urge my right hon. Friend to go to a Division.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.) : I cannot understand the position of the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. HENEAGE : I explained it.

MR. ILLINGWORTH : The right hon. Gentleman said he could not finish his speech within the time. But why should he not commence it? I hope, especially after the threat of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, that we shall proceed to a Division on this Motion.

*MR. HENEAGE : I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not force me to go to a Division. I will only repeat that I had a distinct promise from the Prime Minister that, on the first opportunity, the North Sea Fisheries Bill would be pushed forward.

MR. J. MORLEY : Under the circumstances, and considering the pledge of the Prime Minister with reference to the North Sea Fisheries Bill, as well as on the understanding that the House will make progress with that Bill, I consent to the Motion to report Progress.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress ; to sit again To-morrow.

NORTH SEA FISHERIES BILL.—(No. 259.)
COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) said, that Clause 2 imposed a penalty on any person on board a British vessel for supplying, exchanging, or otherwise selling spirits to any fishing vessel. But France declined to come into the Convention under the Bill ; and he, therefore, asked what security British traders in the North Seas would have that French vessels would not supply liquor indiscriminately there? He had had during the last few weeks conversations with men whose business it was to go to the North Seas trading in the winter, and they had expressed their strong objection to this Bill.

MR. HENEAGE : No, they have not. The Bill was brought in at the request of the fishermen. As representing the fishermen, I would point out that this Bill is the same as the one introduced by the last Government, and any objection made to it now is sheer and utter obstruction.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN said, that the right hon. Gentleman might represent some fishermen. He himself did not claim to represent any fishermen whatever, and he had only been referring to his conversation with men who were bitterly opposed to the Bill. He thought it was somewhat unjust that the right hon. Gentleman should have made an attack upon him when he rose to speak on behalf of these men. He considered it was a gross injustice, not only to those men, but also to the people of this country, that French traders should be allowed to supply infamous liquor, while British traders were to be prohibited under a penalty. He therefore begged to move the omission of Clause 2.

Moved, "That Clause 2 be omitted."
—(The Marquess of Carmarthen.)

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) : The whole effect of this Bill—

Mr. Brunner rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

It being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee."—(Mr. Mundella); but objection being taken;

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Benn be a Member of the Select Committee on the London Improvements Bill.”—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) took exception to the name of Mr. Benn, who was a member of the London County Council, and therefore ought not to be made a judge in his own cause.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, the right hon. Gentleman took exception to four names, but the Committee had been appointed in the ordinary manner by agreement between both sides of the House. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would fall in with the ordinary practice and agree to the nomination of the Committee.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, he would give his reasons for objecting to the names. It was the practice of Members who served on Select Committees to sign a declaration to the effect that neither individually nor through their constituents had they any interest personally in the Bill that came before them. He imagined that, as a matter of principle, it was thoroughly unsound that a member of a Body which was the promoter of a Bill should be a judge in the cause in which he was concerned. He need hardly say that, as regarded the hon. Member to whose name he took exception, he did not object to him personally as a fit Member to serve on the Committee, but he thought it would be derogating from the judicial impartiality which had always been associated with Committees in the House if those who were interested as promoters were to be judges in their own cause. A person who was called upon to impartially assist in sifting evidence should be like Cæsar's wife—abovesuspicion. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury would seriously consider this matter. It was not a matter, he presumed, which would have been brought personally before the Prime Minister, but he thought the Government should realise that it would be a serious thing if any step were taken which would take away from the spirit of judicial impartiality and fairness which, happily, was always associated with Committees of the House. He was told that there were so-called precedents in the fact that members of the now defunct Metropolitan Board of Works had served on Select Committees which had to consider proposals initiated by that Body; but this contention did not apply to a Body like the London County Council, which had been in the past, and was certain in the future, to be the promoter of legislation of a somewhat highly contentious character. In regard to Select Committees, it had always been thought desirable to eliminate from them all partisan elements. So far as Private Bill Committees were concerned, he should have the concurrence of Members on both sides of the House when he said that hitherto they had commanded the confidence of the public and of both sides of the House—

*MR. SPEAKER: If the right hon. Gentleman objects to the name, the question of the nomination of the Committee must stand over.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I do object.

Objection being taken, Further Proceeding stood adjourned until Tomorrow.

THE RESIGNATION OF MR. DAVITT.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, that in the Votes he found the following Notice:—

“Mr. Ross,—Mr. Davitt (Adjudication of Bankruptcy),—Copy of the record of any adjudication of bankruptcy against Mr. Michael Davitt, the hon. Member for the North-East Division of the County of Cork. (Thursday, May 11.)”

As there had been no intimation of bankruptcy against Mr. Davitt, and as the hon. Member for North-East Cork had ceased to be a Member of the House, having accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, he wished to know whether this Notice could remain on the Paper in this form?

*MR. SPEAKER: That will be for the hon. Member, in whose name the Notice stands, to judge between now and the time when the Motion will be brought forward.

MR. SEXTON : In the meantime, Sir, could you not direct the hon. Member to take the Notice off the Paper, seeing that Mr. Davitt is no longer a Member of the House.

*MR. SPEAKER : Of course, if the Motion is opposed on the ground indicated by the hon. Gentleman, the House can take the matter into its own hands.

COMMITTEES (ASCENSION DAY.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Committees do not sit Tomorrow, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock."—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) hoped that the House would not assent to this Motion. It had been customary in every Parliament for the House to divide against it, and he thought that in a House largely composed of Nonconformists it was high time that a line should be drawn with regard to Motions of this kind. He could understand a Roman Catholic or a High Church Parliament making Motions of this kind, but he could not understand such a Motion being accepted by a House largely composed of Nonconformists. He opposed the Motion, and would divide the House against it.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) hoped that the House would assent to the Motion. Ascension Day was one of the vital points in our common Christianity. Christmas Day, Good Friday, Easter Sunday, and Ascension Day represented the four cardinal points in our common Christianity. He should very much regret the day when the Commons House of Parliament of this Christian country would refuse to assent to this proposition.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said, that this question had nothing to do with Nonconformity. He understood that the Prime Minister proposed this Motion as an old Form, but that the right hon. Gentleman left the House to decide as an open question whether it should be adopted or not. The real objection, to his mind, to the Motion was that when all these Committees would be sitting a large number of witnesses would in many cases be in attendance. Besides that, as they knew, counsel were retained and were receiving refreshers every day. If by adopting this proposal they reduced the time during which the Committees could sit, they would be inflicting a considerable fine upon those who were interested in Private Bills. He did not know that the matter needed much discussion. He certainly should vote against the Motion, and it seemed to him that the best thing they could do would be to go to a Division at once.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Mid Lothian) : This Motion is proposed in accordance with established custom.

MR. LABOUCHERE : I think the House once decided against it.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : Not to my knowledge. It has always, I think, been customary to leave the House to decide the question as it seems fitting. The Government do not put pressure on their supporters, the question being left to the free judgment of the House. It must be remembered that there is a Rule empowering Committees to sit after the meeting of the House, which is a sufficient reply to the hon. Member, who complains that loss is inflicted upon persons interested in Private Bills who have retained counsel when the length of time during which Committees can sit is curtailed.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had given somewhat cold support to the Motion he had made, though it was well-known that that could not be from want of hearty sympathy with it. He (Sir J. Fergusson) was a Scottish Presbyterian, but he had always been in the habit of respecting the religious observances of the countries in which he had lived. He therefore heartily sympathised with the observance of tomorrow in England by the large majority of the people. Ascension Day was a day held sacred not only by the majority of the people of England, but also by their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, and he therefore thought that even those Members who did not desire to go to Church and who did not attach sacred associations to the day would not wish to prevent that recognition which was always given to it by the House of Commons. He was sure it would wound the feelings of a great many, and be regarded as a tendency of the House to break away from the traditions of the past if the Motion were not accepted. Was it out of place to remind the House that the recognition of Ascension Day was one of the most ancient observances of Catholic Christendom? The Presbyterians put away hundreds of years ago the keeping of these holidays. Many of them were regretting it now, and there were numbers of Presbyterian ministers and laymen who were now observing Christmas Day and Good Friday and Easter Sunday, feeling that they had taken a step too far in the past, and that it was desirable to retrace it. Having lived most of his life in England, and being glad to conform to the English Church, he spoke with a certain amount of freedom on this matter, and he was sure that other Scotch Members would desire the recognition of those days held sacred by the majority of the people of the United Kingdom, and would agree that they should not be spoken of lightly or be dismissed with a sneer or half-hearted support.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) wished to support the Motion, but to guard himself against the impression that he did so on the polytheistic principles of his right hon. Friend who had just spoken. He was not surprised to hear it laid down by the hon. Member for Northampton that the Government had an open mind on this question. It appeared to him that on this question, as on all others, they had an open mind. There was nothing that they were not prepared to leave to the judgment of the House. He regretted that the Prime Minister had not taken a stronger line. The right hon. Gentleman was going to vote for the Motion of course, but he ought to have exercised his authority on his followers in a more stringent manner.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he always consistently opposed the Motion, as he objected to being liberal with other people's time and money. He considered it hard upon people who had Railway Bills before Committees that these Motions should be passed. Members of Committees who desired to attend religious services to-morrow could do so without compelling all Committees to suspend their sittings. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had said that Committees could obtain permission to sit during the Sitting of the House, but he (Mr. Heneage) failed to see how Members could be in two places at once.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman would apply to all Wednesday Sittings, seeing that the House and the Committees commenced sitting at the same hour.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) said, it was intensely inconvenient for Committees to be sitting at the same time as the House. The inconvenience of Motions of this kind were not so great years ago, for the reason that the House was in the habit of sitting at 4 instead of 3 o'clock as at present. Members now took far more interest in the saving the time of Committees than they did formerly, and he hoped the House would relieve itself of the antiquated custom set forth in the Prime Minister's Motion.

Question put.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.
(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 9th May.]
[THIRD NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, to leave out the words "two Houses, the Legislative Council and."—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

Question again proposed, "That the words 'two Houses' stand part of the Clause."

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) thanked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley) for having consented to report Progress shortly before 12 o'clock on the previous evening, and promised to show his appreciation of the right hon. Gentleman's kindness by making his remarks as brief as possible. He intended to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), which had received the support of the hon. and learned Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Barton) on behalf of the loyal population of the North of Ireland. He wished to know who asked for a Second Chamber? No Irish Member in any part of the House had requested the Government to adhere to their proposal respecting a Second Chamber. The question had been treated by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) in a sort of battledore and shuttlecock fashion. What was the reason of the hon. Member's sudden change of front? Was it due to the fact that the Motion had been moved by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell)? When a politician who was aspiring to Cabinet rank dealt with a question as the hon. Member had dealt with it, his remarks might be treated almost with contempt, and it might almost be said that "truth" was not always reliable in politics, but sometimes savoured of the heathen Chinee. Had the change in the hon. Member's views been occasioned by any promise on the part of the Government to support the Amendment of which the hon. Member had given notice on the 9th clause? He (Mr. Heneage) had serious misgivings that that was the quid pro quo which the hon. Member had received for having renounced his opinions on the question. The Second Chamber was not to be in any sense a Senate or a House of Peers, and that it would not in any degree represent the minority in Ireland was clear from the speeches delivered by the hon. Members for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) and Mid Armagh (Mr. Barton). No signs had been forthcoming that it would meet the views of the Nationalist Members. Of course, the Chief Secretary might be acquainted with their views however, as it was well-known that the Bill was the result of a sort of secret compact between those Members and the Government in which England had been left out of the calculation altogether. The Second Chamber would not be any protection to Ulster; it would not strengthen the supremacy of Parliament, and it was not required to carry out the Gladstonian policy of giving Ireland a separate Parliament to manage its own affairs. These facts were very important in reference to the majority obtained by the Prime Minister in 1892, when 25 seats were gained by the Gladstonians in this country, the total majority being only 5,000. How was that majority obtained for the Home Rule cause? It was due to the fact that electors who had either stood on one side or had voted against the Home Rule Bill of 1886 had in 1892 voted for the Gladstonian candidates. He had been told over and over again—"I voted for you in '86, but I am going to give the right hon. Member for Midlothian another chance of seeing if he can deal with this Irish Question." They gave their votes in the belief that English opinion in regard to Home Rule would have some force in the Cabinet, especially as they were told, in a famous letter written by the Chancellor of the Exchequer from his own fireside, that whilst the Irish were entitled to their views with regard to Home Rule, the British people were also entitled to their views. They gave their votes in the belief that the Home Rule Legislature would be a sort of local government on a very large scale, with certain legislative powers added, and not that it would be an independent Parliament. He stood in a somewhat exceptional position in reference to ascertaining the views of the electors, as he supposed there were few Members of the House who knew their constituents better than he knew his. He was, therefore, pretty well acquainted with the views of those who voted for him in 1886, voted against him in 1892, and again voted for him at the subsequent bye-election.

MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough): Mr. Mellor, I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order on this particular Amendment in giving us his electioneering experiences?

THE CHAIRMAN: Every Member is bound to speak to the Amendment as closely as he can, but I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is out of Order.

MR. HENEAGE said, he thought more time had been wasted by the interruption, as was often the case when new Members, who had yet to learn the Rules of Order, interfered with those who knew them than would have been occupied if he had been allowed to say what he was endeavouring to say. He was only remarking that the reason which induced many people to vote against Home Rule in 1881, for the Liberal Party in 1892, and again against Home Rule in 1893, was that between the General Election and the bye-election they had seen the Bill. Why had the

Mr. Heneage

Bill been altered from the shape in which it was in 1886?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Question.

MR. HENEAGE said, he was speaking to the question. There were not two Chambers in the Bill of 1886.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes, there were.

MR. HENEAGE said, that in 1886 there were two orders or classes of Members, but they were to sit together and form practically one House. As the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. T. M. Healy) had challenged him, however, he thought he could not do better than quote what the Prime Minister said. In moving the Second Reading of the Home Rule Bill in 1886 the Prime Minister said—

“We propose to introduce into the Legislative Body what we have called two orders. These orders would sit and deliberate together. There would be a power on the demand of either order of separate voting.”

He could not put the case more strongly than the right hon. Gentleman himself had put it. Having read that extract, he had to ask the Government why they had departed from the lines of their original proposal and created two separate Chambers, which nobody wanted, which could not possibly work satisfactorily, and which would satisfy no one?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The Government have arrived at the conclusion that an Elective Assembly would be the proper form for a Second Chamber; but this is a matter upon which the Committee will, after consideration, exercise its free judgment when it comes to deal with the composition of that Assembly. The course adopted by the supporters of the Amendment is not convenient. They say that they are friendly to the principle of a Second Chamber; yet the Amendment proposes to do away with the Second Chamber, which the Government recommend, and which is, in the opinion of the Government, the only way of dealing with this question. In voting that there should be a Legislative Council hon. Members are not committing themselves to any particular form of composition for that Council. We are now dealing strictly and solely with the principle of a Second Chamber. I do not speak of the principle of an elective Second Chamber. There are precedents for other forms, and I have no wish to exclude them. The Government have taken that which they believe to be the best, and they have, as in all matters of detail connected with the Bill, felt a great disposition to be guided by experience. We have upon this subject very large experience before us. It may be said without fear of contradiction that the Colonial Constitutions have been chosen either according to their own electoral representation or in conformity with what they rightly believed to be the dispositions of the inhabitants of the Colonies. In no instance, I believe, have the colonists expressed any desire for departure from their present Constitutions. If any Colony were to express such a desire Parliament would be disposed to listen with respect, and even with favour, to their well-ascertained opinions. Here we have, therefore, a large experience from numbers of people of our own race, many of whom have been our fellow-citizens in this country, and who still remain citizens of the Empire at large. I do not think there is a single exception to the principle of a Second Chamber in the case of any Colonial Legislature properly so called. I am not referring to the Provincial Legislatures of Canada. It has been proved beyond doubt that the Second Chamber operates as a very serious check upon the immediate action of the representative Chamber, and the principal proposition of the Government is that a wide experience of the free Constitutions of the Colonies has given sanction to the principle of a Second Chamber, and that this principle is peculiarly recommended in the particular case of Ireland. I believe that I am speaking in conformity with the general sentiment of the Representatives of Ireland—although I have, of course, no right to represent them—in saying that they have the strongest desire to conciliate those of their fellow-countrymen who are in any degree accessible to friendly discussion. Of course, it would be ridiculous to speak of those particular individuals who are beyond conciliation. But I fully believe that the Nationalists entertain every desire for conciliation wherever they have the slenderest hope of effecting it, and I believe, moreover, that they are right in that hope and desire. In my view, this is the best and indeed a necessary policy, however unfavourable the circumstances may be for bringing the minority into line with the majority. I do not think it is an irrational hope to entertain, that, after this Bill has become law, a great change may take place in Ireland. I cannot myself hope to see that change, but I believe that the younger Members on these Benches may hope to see the present divided Parties acting in general concurrence.

MR. JOHNSTON : The change will be civil war.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I do not doubt that the hon. Member makes a true representation of the sentiments he at present entertains. I, however, have ventured to express my own opinion upon the matter. Now it has been said that the proposal of the Government is a delusive proposal. Hon. Gentlemen may consider the proposed Second Chamber as being defective in composition or lacking in strength ; but, if so, their consistent course would be—particularly if they think a Second Chamber to be expedient in itself and that it is further recommended by the peculiar circumstances of Ireland—their best course would now be to sanction the principle, and then to proceed to alter the details, or to propose to alter them, in whatever way they may think proper, when the Committee comes to the provisions in the Bill which deal with those details. If they fail to alter the details in the Bill, they may then proceed, if necessary, to denounce the Second Chamber for Ireland at whatever subsequent stage of the Bill they think proper. It would be a premature and unwise step on the part of these hon. Gentlemen to condemn the principle if they think that principle is wise and just. The energetic and liberty-loving colonial populations cannot have so universally accepted the Second Chamber unless, upon general grounds, it has been found wise and expedient. The first effect of a Second Chamber is to present an undoubted and unquestionable security against hasty legislation. It interposes a certain period of time ; it interposes reflection ; and in interposing reflection, apart from the possible heat of popular discussion, it interposes an opportunity for allowing full consideration of the modes by which an approximation may be effected between the opposing Parties by some reasonable accommodation of their differences. Who can doubt or deny that this is a necessary effect of the Second Chamber ? That would be so even if—which I do not for a moment admit—we were entirely wrong in the composition of the Chamber. The mere fact of its causing an interposition of time before a final decision is made is a very great recommendation. In some respects the Irish Legislature which we are proposing to establish will approach its work under difficulties over and above those which are to be found in the dissensions in Ireland. The greatest loss, or one of the greatest losses, which Ireland has sustained in consequence of the extinction of her domestic Legislature has, in my opinion, been that there has been cut off from Ireland the ordinary, natural, healthful means of the formation of real public opinion. It is not easy to restore this. Notwithstanding the very defective constitution of the Dublin Parliament, there was this action in the public mind tending to influence the sober, legitimate legislation of the Parliament which sat between 1782 and 1795. I admit that the machinery which had been set in action against all the interests of Ireland, no less than against morality and good policy, made the Parliament which sat from 1796 to 1800 very different, though even in that limited Body the claim to national life was not extinct, notwithstanding that every influence was brought to bear upon it from without to make it surrender. What I am arguing for is that, given a Home Rule Bill, it is extremely desirable that its provisions should be so adjusted as to promote, facilitate, develop, and mature the action of public opinion—and, in the main, Irish opinion—upon the proceedings of the Legislative Body in Ireland. From that point of view, every candid man must admit that the interposition of the Second Chamber, with prerogatives reasonably limited, must from the mere fact of repeated discussion—and discussion, moreover, from a somewhat different standpoint—tend to develop that diversity of action in the minds of various classes of persons which is so essential to the health of a free community. And this is especially necessary in the peculiar circumstances of Ireland. Further, I do not doubt that the Irish Nationalists would be among the first to say that they desired the people in this country to continue to take a constant interest in Irish affairs, and to closely watch the actions of the Irish Legislature so as to secure the healthful play of public opinion upon that Body. The question as to how far the Second Chamber can be made to represent the interests of the minority is one rather for consideration when we come to the particulars of the constitution of the Second Chamber than for discussion at the present moment. I have no wish to prejudge any portion of that question, but for the present I may say that I am strongly impressed with the belief that the character of deliberation, the character of gravity, the character of dignity, and the character of stability, which has been found in all our Colonies to attend the system of the double Chamber, will attend the establishment of the Constitution which we now propose for Ireland. And these influences will be especially helpful in Ireland, which has naturally become disused by the arrangements under which she has existed for the last 90 years to the free and vigorous action of public opinion upon the proceedings of the Legislature.

MR. PLUNKET (Dublin University): When I rose just now at the same time as the Prime Minister it was not with any intention of interposing myself between the right hon. Gentleman and the House, but because there seemed to be an extraordinary disposition in certain quarters to terminate this discussion. If I speak but briefly to-day it is not because of any disinclination to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell)—for if he presses it to a Division I shall vote for it—but because I simply wish to explain that in so doing I am not opposed in principle to a Second Chamber. I wish also to make it clear that in so acting I believe that I am expressing the views taken upon this matter by the loyal minority in Ireland, and especially that portion of the loyal minority which dwells outside the Province of Ulster. The Prime Minister has said that the only thing now under discussion is the principle of the Second Chamber, and he has also stated that the Government are not rigidly pledged to the particular proposals, as regards the Second Chamber, which are connected with this clause. That is all very well, but we must deal with the clause as we find it in the Bill. This is not the first time that the right hon. Gentleman has proposed to make protection by some kind of double Chamber for the Irish minority. For seven years he has been re-considering the scheme he produced in 1886, and the result is that the present proposal, in every respect in which it differs from the first, is far worse. There is no protection whatever in the present Bill. The Second Chamber, as now proposed, far from affording protection from the dangerous influences which we most fear in the First Chamber, will really tend to aggravate them. The right hon. Gentleman says that there is every disposition on the part of the Nationalists to go as far as possible in meeting the wishes, and what he considers to be the fears, of the minority in Ireland. I shall look forward with great curiosity to the votes which the Nationalist Members may give from time to time as Amendments are brought forward in order to test the real views and intentions of the Government and of their Irish allies. I want now to explain very shortly why it is that, approving as I do of the principle of a Second Chamber in every country where the Government is conducted on representative lines, I am prepared in this particular case to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I, myself, confidently believe that this Bill will never pass. I do not believe that this Bill or anything like it would ever have been proposed were it not that the Prime Minister with his great influence in the country hastily adopted such a scheme, and found himself compelled to persevere with it. I do not think this Bill or anything like it will ever pass, and in the part I shall take in this discussion and any other discussions during the progress of the Bill I shall be guided entirely by the influence which I believe the discussions in Committee will have of making the Bill every day more detestable. This provision under discussion has been put into the Bill obviously and professedly as a sweetener of the bitter pill. It is put forward as a safeguard and a protection for the minority, whom the vast majority of the people of the Three Kingdoms, whatever they might think of Home Rule in principle, were determined should be really protected in any proposals for the extension of local government to Ireland. But of all the delusive and misleading provisions with which the Bill is stuffed this is the most delusive. It is not only that people outside might naturally suppose that the institution of a Second Chamber was introduced into this Bill for the purpose of giving protection to the minority in Ireland, and might, therefore, be misled into thinking that some protection was really given to the minority by the proposal; but the Prime Minister has done his best to give importance to the proposal as a satisfactory protection of the minority in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman in introducing the Bill said that he considered the Legislative Council—

“As affording the fairest, most Constitutional, and most unexceptionable method of redeeming the pledge which they had given to meet the expectation which they had repeatedly held out, that they would, if they could, give the minority some means of vocal expression, and of securing fair and liberal consideration for their views.”

That would naturally produce in this country the impression that the clause really secured not only the vocal expression of the views, but the full and fair consideration of the views of the minority. I pass by the right hon. Gentleman's reference to the effect of Second Chambers in the Colonies, because the circumstances of Ireland and the particular object for which this provision is supposed to be introduced does not exist, and never have existed, in any of the Colonies where Second Chambers have been instituted. I say that the statement of the Prime Minister in introducing the Bill held out the distinct hope to the people of England that he had, in the proposed Second Chamber, provided for the full and fair and satisfactory consideration of the views of the minority; and to-day the right hon. Gentleman insisted on the great advantage that would be secured in the delay in legislation which the Second Chamber might produce—a delay, he said, which would give the opportunity for the full consideration of the views that might be put forward by the minority, and which would give character, dignity, and stability to the proceedings of the new Irish Legislature. But anybody who looks at Section 8 of this Bill will see the whole delay that would be interposed to the action of a domineering majority supporting an imperious Minister by the interference of the Second Chamber—supposing, for the sake of argument, that it took a different view on the question submitted to it from the view of the First Chamber—would be little more than three months. I am aware that there is an alternative suggestion of two years' delay; but that is nugatory and worthless; for if a Minister wishes to push his Bill in spite of the opposition of the Upper Chamber, he has simply to dissolve the Assembly; and if he were returned to power again no further delay could be interposed. All the Minister would have to do would be to advise the Lord Lieutenant to dissolve the Assembly, and then there would be no practical delay beyond four or five, or even six months at the most, in giving effect to his wishes. But I deny altogether that there is any hope or ground for reasonable expectation that there would be any substantial opposition in the Second Chamber to proposals carried in the First Chamber against the wishes of the minority of Ireland. I do not wish at any length to go over the arguments which I submitted on this point on the Second Reading of the Bill. But no answer has been given to those arguments by the Government. No answer has been given to my argument that the effect of the particular franchise which has been chosen would simply be to return to the Second Chamber a class of Representatives not materially different, in sympathy, in education, or in capability for judging great and important questions of policy, from those who would constitute the First Chamber. There will be no distinction as regards the minority between the views entertained by the majority of the Upper Chamber and those entertained by the majority of the Lower Chamber, except so far in this way: that I believe myself that the Second Chamber, which is put forward as a great protection to the minority, will be less enlightened than the other, and that there will be less chance of obtaining independent support in the Second Chamber from any section of those whom we know as the Nationalist Party than there would be in the First Chamber. The Representatives in the Second Chamber of the South and West of Ireland would, except so far as the three boroughs in the 48 seats are concerned, practically be returned by the tenant farmers, the very class who are most under, if I may use the expression, the thumb of the Catholic priesthood in Ireland. What are the chief dangers to which the Irish minority would be exposed from a domineering majority under an Irish Parliament—danger to their property and undue religious interference, and in both these respects the tenant farmers would be more powerful in the Legislative Council than in the Legislative Assembly, because they would be more under the influence of the Catholic priests. Therefore, I say that the minority would have a worse chance in the Legislative Council, as proposed to be set up by this Bill, than they would have in the Legislative Assembly—for, at all events, the Representatives in the Lower Chamber of the boroughs, where intelligence is greater, and where education is not so backward—might be supposed to contribute some element of independence and some basis of alliance to resist the overwhelming, preponderating influence of the tenant farmers and Catholic priesthood of Ireland. There is one other ground on which I wish to resist this proposal. I have said that my chief reason for objecting to this proposal is that, if carried, it would be likely to mislead and humbug English voters by leading them to believe that there is some protection for the minority in Ireland; but I object to it also from this point of view: Supposing the Bill were in actual operation, the only safeguard of the minority in Ireland would be in this Imperial Parliament; and I say that if this Bill were to pass, it is far better that the absurd inconsistencies and injustice of these proposals should be submitted in the first instance to the English people, and afterwards to the Imperial Parliament in their naked deformity than that they should be concealed in such a misleading and utterly bogus proposal as this Second Chamber.

*MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) said, the question now before the Committee was the most important that had yet come before it, and was one of the most important questions that could come before the Committee, and he did not desire on this Motion to give a silent vote. They had two schools in the matter of Second Chambers. One said that no system of representative government could work unless there was a double Chamber, and the other said that under no circumstances, in no place, at no time, should a Second Chamber of any form whatever be established. He was not able to accept either of these extreme propositions; but in this particular case he could not disguise from himself the fact that the proposed Legislative Council was, in its essence, really a limitation of household suffrage. It was a proposal to take away a part of the power which had been conferred by the Suffrage Act upon the people generally of Ireland. He was perfectly prepared to admit that if they were to have anything of the nature of plural voting, they could scarcely adopt a system which would be less offensive than the form of a Second Chamber. But as a believer in the principle of democracy, he was entirely opposed to all limitations upon the right of the people to vote. He thought there was a strong presumption—he did not put it higher—against such limitations, and he thought the general experience of mankind had shown that in the large majority of cases Second Chambers had been either useless or positively mischievous. Having that general view, what was the position he ought to adopt with regard to the Amendment? He would say frankly that if it were proposed in a Home Rule Bill for Scotland to introduce a Legislative Council such as was proposed in the present Bill, he would rather have no Home Rule Bill for Scotland than have it with such a clause. It would meet with the most strenuous opposition. But he must not forget that the circumstances of Ireland and Scotland were not identical. They had no loyal minority in Scotland. The reason why they had no loyal minority in Scotland was because they had never had the ascendancy of an Episcopalian party in Scotland. If the English Government of many years ago had succeeded in imposing upon the Scottish people an Episcopalian ascendancy party, he did not doubt that they should have had a loyal minority in Scotland. But they were happily free from that; and in the circumstances of Scotland, he should say there was no justification or excuse for attempting to limit the exercise of household suffrage by any bi-cameral scheme. Both sections of the Irish Members were prepared to make what was for them as democrats an enormous concession of principle. They were prepared to accept the Second Chamber, and that was a concession in the interests of conciliation and peace. It might be, as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) had said, that the loyal minority were not satisfied with that large concession. But when he (Mr. Hunter) found that the Irish Members—who, after all, must be taken to have as good means of forming an opinion of what was advantageous for Ireland as he had—were, in the peculiar circumstances in which they were placed, prepared to accept this undoubted limitation of the democratic power, he looked upon that as an augury of the happiest character for the future. It showed a disposition to go very far, indeed further than the limits of logic or strict reason justified, in order to—he would not say to receive the support—but to remove the difficulties of every portion of the country. In these circumstances, he considered that if he were to vote with the hon. Member for South Tyrone who, by the way, was not an Irishman, and to vote against the views of the Irish Members, he should feel that he was sacrificing to political pedantry on an important practical point.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I am desirous that no misapprehension shall exist, so far as I am personally concerned, as to the grounds on which I endorse the proposal submitted by my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone. Those who, like myself, consider an efficient Second Chamber to be essential in any political arrangement are entitled to support the Amendment on the ground that the proposal of the Government does not provide an adequate and efficient Second Chamber, possessing strength and independence enough to discharge the important Constitutional duties allotted to it. The Prime Minister, in his previous attempt to settle this question, constituted a House of Lords that sat in conjunction with an elected body as a Second Chamber. It is needless now to enlarge upon that plan, for the Government have realised that it did not meet the requirements of the situation. In the plan now before us the hereditary element has entirely disappeared. I am not myself disposed to find any great fault with the omission of the hereditary element, for, although strongly of opinion that no political arrangements are deserving of the approval of Parliament which fail to obtain a strong effective Second Chamber for the purpose of safeguarding the interest of the country, I am not so wedded to the hereditary element to make its absence from one of the Chambers a fatal objection, so far as I am concerned, to the plan submitted to us. I cannot but admit that in the case of Ireland the Irish Peerage have ceased to be strongly representative of the landed interest of the country as it was originally intended to be. I will not go into the causes which brought this circumstance into existence, but it is patent to all that the Irish Peerage, if invested with legislative functions derived from the hereditary principle, would not possess that inherent strength which would be possessed by a body largely interested in the soil of the country. On that ground I am not disposed to find any fault whatever with the Government for having failed to include the hereditary element in their new Constitution for Ireland. But what is the substitution which they have provided in this Bill? They have provided a so-called Second Chamber—whether it should be called a First or Second I do not undertake to lay down as a matter of Constitutional practice; but, at any rate, this Council is a Body which appears to me in no shape or form to fulfil any of the requirements of a Second Chamber in any Constitutional arrangement. What does it represent? It represents a class which, as my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) reminded the Committee, are not such as possess the character for independence which would render it safe to place political power to any great extent in their hands. I go further, and say that this Chamber would represent the class most prominently associated with disloyalty and crime and outrage than any other class in Ireland. I must remind the Committee that the outrages and the scenes of violence and disorder which have made Ireland a bye-word amongst the nations for many years past have not been committed by what are called the rabble in towns, but have been the work of those who would elect the Body which the

Mr. Hunter

Prime Minister asks us to create. The tenant farmers of Ireland, who would be registered as voters under this proposal are, I venture to say, the class that is more especially associated with the Plan of Campaign, with moonlighting outrages, and with other proceedings which have made their country a disgrace. And that is the Body which the right hon. Gentleman asks us to rely upon as providing a check upon any un-Constitutional action of the other portion of the Legislature, and on which loyal subjects might rely upon for protection. Could there be a greater mockery than a proposal of that kind? I say that an inadequate Second Chamber is worse than no Chamber at all; a Second Chamber which does not possess independence, which would give way to popular clamour would be a great danger, and I think it would be better to be without a Second Chamber than one so constituted. What tendency would this Second Chamber created by the Bill have to resist popular clamour? It would be elected by the persons who have been organising all the popular revolutionary movements which have been going on during the last few years; it would be a Chamber more especially representative of disorder than any which could be elected by means of an appeal to the urban population of Ireland. At this moment the urban representation of Ireland is far superior to the representation of the rural portions of the South and West of that country. So far from the franchise which the right hon. Gentleman suggests affording any guarantee whatsoever, or holding forth any hopes in any shape or form of a controlling force to be called into existence, it would be more especially the means of bringing about the representation of the criminal classes in that country. When I speak of the criminal classes, I mean those who have made crime and outrage their main occupation for years past. I think the Committee is perfectly aware that the net result of elections held under this proposed Constitution would be that the South and West of Ireland would be largely predominant elements not only in the composition of the Lower House, but also of the Legislative Council or Upper Chamber, and we should be landed in this position: that the loyal classes in Ireland would have to rely for their protection upon a Body which could not be relied upon to afford that protection. This Upper Chamber is a sham, and but for this reason I feel sure it would be very heartily opposed by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on this other side of the House. The grounds upon which I and my hon. Friends support the Amendment is because, while we are determined to insist upon the Government replacing this sham Chamber by some effectual Constitutional safeguard, we consider the Legislative Council proposed to be worse than useless. It must be understood that we do not abandon our insistence upon the creation of an effective Second Chamber. While I candidly own that, I hold the same principles as my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket)—namely, that I would vote for any proposal which I thought would smash this Bill, at the same time I do not wish in so doing to abandon principles which on general grounds I steadfastly entertain. Upon the grounds that this proposal in the Bill is a sham, that it will do a vast deal more harm than good, that it will create a false impression and expectation—upon these grounds I shall support my hon. Friend who moved the Amendment, and I hope the proposal will be omitted from the Bill.

Mr. S. WHITBREAD (Bedford) said, he did not wish at this stage of the Bill to enter into a discussion as to what should be the position of a Second Chamber, which was not the question immediately before the House. He frankly said at once that he was in favour of a Second Chamber, and he was content to rest his support of the Second Chamber upon the experience of the world, upon the experience of all free peoples who had tried to do without a Second Chamber, and had ultimately come back to an Upper Chamber. But what he rose for was to take the earliest opportunity of noticing what seemed to him to be an absolutely new departure in Parliamentary practice. He had listened with surprise and pain to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University when he proclaimed that it was his fixed intention to take this and every opportunity to try to make this Bill more hateful in the eyes of the people of this country, and more unworkable. He had never heard such an astounding statement made by one who had held responsible office. He had read what was said out-of-doors last Saturday by the Leader of the Opposition, and he looked upon it as mere reckless outside oratory; but he never expected to hear such language used in that House, and apparently with the full approval of a great many of the Front Opposition Bench. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down said he would not, for Party purposes, abdicate great principles. Was that the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University? To deliberately try to make a Bill in its passage through Committee more hateful to the whole world and more unworkable was the worst piece of political gambling he ever recollected. Hon. Members said they did not believe the Bill would ever pass, and would take care that it should not pass. Well, it was possible it might pass, and in what position would the right hon. Gentleman and his friends be then, who had made the Bill more unworkable, and, as they thought, more hateful and detestable, than it now was if it should pass? One could understand words and ideas of that kind being given utterance to in a moment of temper and passion; but he could not believe it would be a deliberate policy pursued by a great Party.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, the hon. Member for Bedford, who had last addressed the House, told them to accept the Upper House—the House of Lords. That was naturally what they would expect from an hon. Gentleman who was very likely to go to the House of Lords, and it would be rather suicidal policy of him to want to abolish the House of Lords, because, like the rest of the brewers, he would probably end by going there. He himself was not opposed in the slightest degree to Second Chambers; the very reverse; therefore it must not be assumed that those of them on that side of the House who were supporting the Amendment were doing so because of their objection in any sense to the House of Lords. But it was quite possible for one to object to a wretched caricature when they would not object to the reality; and the higher their estimate of the House of Lords as a Second Chamber the more desirous they should be to object to this wretched Second Chamber which was about to be set up in Ireland.

Mr. S. Whitbread

With regard to the Second Chamber in England, there was a certain amount of dignity attached to it. Gentlemen were often anxious to enter that Chamber on account of the dignity; but where would be the dignity attached to the Second Chamber in Ireland? Members for that Second Chamber would require no qualification of income, education, or anything else; and they would be elected, for all practical purposes, by the same electors as would return Members to the Legislative Assembly. Almost all the counties would return Members of the very same political colour to the Upper House as to the Lower House or Legislative Assembly; and, that being so, this Chamber would have no dignity or position of any sort or kind. If this Second Chamber were put forward on the ground that it would stay hasty legislation, he should be willing to vote in favour of it. But, as he understood, this Legislative Council was inserted in the Bill not for the purpose of being a check on hasty legislation, but as a safeguard to the loyal minority in Ireland. It was because it was represented as a safeguard that he objected to it. It absolutely failed to be a safeguard, and he thought there was nothing in this world so bad as a delusive safeguard. It lulled into sleep those, perhaps, who were to be safeguarded by it; and, on the other hand, it acted as an irritant on the majority against whom this safeguard was framed. If an Irish Parliament were to be established, and the loyal minority were to be given over to the majority, he should infinitely prefer they should be given into their hands without any check whatever. With regard to plans in the matter of safeguards there could only be three. There could be no safeguards at all; there could be sham safeguards of no value whatever; and there could be real safeguards—or rather they were told that there could be real safeguards—but, for his part, he had never been able to see how they could possibly safeguard a Parliament. Therefore he, for one, would desire this matter of safeguards to be dropped altogether if this Bill passed. The feeling of the English people was that they would not establish a Parliament in Ireland unless the minority were safeguarded; but they (the Unionists), as Representatives of the loyal minority, repudiated entirely this Second Chamber as a safeguard, and it would do them a great deal of harm rather than good. The Prime Minister said that the Nationalists desired to accept this Second Chamber, not because they liked it, but because they desired, as far as possible, to conciliate the loyal minority. Well, they might stop in that desire at once, for this did not conciliate, it irritated the minority. The main object the hon. Member for South Tyrone had in putting this Amendment on the Paper was to make known thoroughly to the electors of this country that this was no safeguard to the minority, and was of no value to them from any point of view. The Upper Chamber which was to safeguard them was to be composed of 48 Members. Calculations were made as to how many of these would be Unionists on the franchise on which that Chamber was founded. The hon. Member for South Tyrone said his calculations led him practically to the length of 20 as a maximum. The hon. and learned Member for Mid Armagh said his calculations led him to 10, and a Nationalist Member of that House the previous day showed him (Mr. Rentoul) his calculations, and they led him to the length of 12. Altogether it seemed clear they would not have one-half of the Members of that Chamber that was to protect them, and it was a strange fact that no one who had yet spoken on behalf of the Government had attempted in any way whatever to show them that they would have a majority, or were likely to have a majority, on the Legislative Council. If, then, the majority was to be a Home Rule majority in the Legislative Assembly and in the Legislative Council, it was very difficult to see how this Upper Chamber would serve the minority from any point of view. Since that Amendment was moved some of the Radicals had hinted that they were looking forward to the time when the Second Chamber in England would be abolished. That was the desire of many Radicals at the present time. [An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] The hon. Gentleman opposite said, "hear, hear;" but he would ask him how did he purpose to abolish the Second Chamber in England? Was it by vote of the Lower Chamber or by a revolution? If he purposed to abolish it by vote of the Lower Chamber, would there not then be a precedent for the Lower Chamber in Ireland to abolish the Upper Chamber in the same way? However, the one point they wanted to make in the matter of this Amendment was to impress upon the people of England that the Loyalists of Ireland with one voice repudiated this Upper Chamber entirely as being no safeguard or of any value to them from any conceivable point of view. The Chief Secretary and the Home Secretary, in the Second Reading Debate on this Bill, in substance, said—"If you are to regard the majority in Ireland as a parcel of rogues and vagabonds, then no safeguards will be of any use." [Mr. J. MORLEY: Hear hear!] The Chief Secretary applauded that statement. That was to say, they must regard them either as honest men or as dishonest men. Politically, they were absolutely dishonest from their (the Unionist) point of view, or absolutely honest. If they were absolutely honest, then, he said, let them have no safeguards of any kind. If they were absolutely dishonest, let them have safeguards that would prevent them from being able to do the loyal minority in Ireland any harm. If the Chief Secretary spoke on this Amendment—as he hoped he would—he should greatly like the right hon. Gentleman to point out how this Upper Chamber would safeguard the landlords of Ireland from any possible point of view. The Upper Chamber would be returned by the votes of the tenant farmers even to a greater extent than the Lower Chamber, and by the vote of the smaller tenant farmer. How, then, would it safeguard the landlord class, who would need most of all to be safeguarded? How would it prevent them being robbed of their possessions by the Irish Parliament, which would receive a very strong mandate in this direction? If they were to be safeguarded under a sort of perpetual police protection by means of this Upper Chamber, let it be effective police protection, let it be done in the right and proper way, and not have held over them a sort of paper safeguard which any gentleman could kick through any moment he liked. He was not against a Second Chamber, but he was strongly in favour of a proper Second Chamber, such as we had in this country, and it was his respect for Upper Chambers that prevented him desiring to see a thing of this sort put in a place of so-called dignity and represented as an Upper Chamber. The Prime Minister had remarked that this clause of the Bill was not the occasion to refer to the Legislative Council, and that it should be deferred until later on. But in the clause they were discussing reference was made to "the" Legislative Council and "the" Legislative Assembly. If this section of the Bill established a Legislative Council, then he agreed this would not be the time to discuss the composition of that Council; but the word "the" clearly brought in the composition of the Council, because it was a particular Council formed in a particular way. That being so, it was impossible for anyone to see the word "the" without casting his eye down the Bill to see what that "the" meant. When drafting this part of the Bill the framer had before him a definite Legislative Council established in a definite way, and composed of a definite number. Therefore he submitted that it was in Order to discuss the composition of this Legislative Council; and, in point of fact, it would be perfectly idle to speak on this matter at all unless they entered into the composition of it, which was the whole question, because there could be no Legislative Council formed that would be a safeguard. If there was a Legislative Council of 100 Members nominated for life, and if all those Members were Unionists, who forfeited their seats if they ceased to be Unionists, that, no doubt, would be a safeguard. At any rate, it would be a real safeguard, whereas the one they were offered was a sham. The idea of a Legislative Council to be composed of Unionists nominated for life, let them know something of the difference between the strong and vigorous reality and the weak and drivelling sham, because that was all the proposed Legislative Council was; and it was on that ground—on the ground of the utter absurdity and uselessness as a safeguard of this Legislative Council—that he desired to support the Amendment.

*MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Longford, N.): Mr. Mellor, I hope I may be allowed to recall the attention of the Committee for a moment to the question that we have been engaged in discussing, or rather, I should say, that we are supposed to be engaged in discussing. The clause proposed to be amended contains these words—

"On and after the appointed day there shall be in Ireland a Legislature, consisting of Her Majesty the Queen and of two Houses, the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly."

The Amendment proposed is to leave out certain words which, when left out, reduce the Legislature to Her Majesty the Queen and the Legislative Assembly. Therefore, the Amendment proposed intends to prevent Ireland from ever having a Second Chamber. If the clause is passed in such a way it does not matter what the constitution of a Second Chamber might be. The Second Chamber is denied to Ireland by those who vote for the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Mr. James Lowther), in vigorous words, denounced the Second Chamber as a sham and an imposture. If I were to consider the whole process of this Debate it is not to a Second Chamber that I should apply the words "a sham and an imposture." We have heard in this discussion a great deal of what I cannot help calling simulated passion and rage that went beyond ordinary conceivable hyperbole. Now, what are we to think of the sincerity and straightforwardness of men who get up one after another and say that they are devoted in principle to the existence of a Second Chamber, and that, therefore, because of their ultra-devotion, they are going to vote against any kind of Second Chamber for Ireland? Of course, there has been a frank expression of opinion from our point of view. We cannot object to that course. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) was so blunt and so frank as to say that he wanted to make this Bill more detestable than ever it was. [An hon. MEMBER: He cannot.] Well, if he wants to make the Bill more detestable than ever, of course he is right enough in trying to strike out this clause granting a Second Chamber.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I rise to a point of Order. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) is not in his place, and what he merely said was—[Loud Irish cries of "Order!" amid which the hon. Member resumed his seat.]

THE CHAIRMAN having called on the hon. Member for North Longford to proceed—

MR. M'CARTHY, continuing his speech said: We all heard what the right hon. Gentleman said. He spoke, as he always does, with remarkable clearness, and there was no possibility of even the dullest person mistaking him for one moment. An hon. Member below me, an Ulster Member, said that nobody could make this Bill more detestable than it is at present. Then why be at the pains of trying? Cannot the Bill be allowed to go through with all its supposed horrors on its head, and thus save us the trouble of this controversy kept up almost altogether by gentlemen who say that their whole heart and their whole feelings go one way while their vote is bound to go another. I have not heard in the course of this discussion a single word from any hon. Member belonging to the Opposition which suggested in the remotest degree what manner of Second Chamber he would accept as being capable of meeting the necessities of the case. There was, indeed, a suggestion made or hinted at by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet that he thought some revival of the Irish Peerage might be almost good enough. Well, hon. Members of this House who believe in the re-galvanising of the Irish Peerage have an amount of hope, and faith, and imagination which surpasses the most poetic intellect. Then I believe there was a suggestion made by another hon. Member—I forget whom—some suggestion that there might be a Chamber of hereditary legislators. I am afraid he would find it rather difficult to establish a Chamber of that kind which could secure the confidence and affection of the Irish people. But I think it is a strange and even an extraordinary thing to find hon. Member after hon. Member in the ranks of the Opposition getting up and enunciating two absolutely conflicting opinions—first, that there ought to be a Second Chamber everywhere; and next, that there ought to be no Second Chamber in Ireland, because that Second Chamber is not acceptable to them. But, Mr. Mellor, I am more concerned to state frankly what the position is—what the views of my Colleagues and myself with regard to this Amendment are. We know that there is in Ireland, and possibly in England, a certain fear that the interests of the minority might be overborne under possible conditions by the strength of the majority. We are also assured that to meet that possible dread or susceptibilities of that kind the most convenient form of protection for minorities would be the creation of a Second Chamber. I am not now going to say a single word about the constitution of a proposed Second Chamber. We are now discussing the question of the principle, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian clearly and eloquently pointed out in the early part of the Debate. People are asked now to affirm the principle that there shall be a Second Chamber in Ireland. As we are assured that this form of a Second Chamber would be the most effective, ready, and convenient means of protecting every interest of the minority in Ireland, we, on that account, are perfectly willing to assist in the formation of a Second Chamber. We know and appreciate the immense amount of interest in the Nationalist life of Ireland which is taken by hon. Members on this side of the House, and by some on the other side of the House. We are spurred on by them to make magnificent assertions of the dignity of Irish nationality. We know perfectly well what that is done for. We know how much hon. Members who use those generous and kindly appeals to us ever cared for Irish Nationalist sentiment.

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.): We care just as much as you do.

*MR. M'CARTHY: I was referring, of course, to the Members of the Conservative Party, and for the sake of old associations I shall pass over an interruption of that kind with the charity of silence. I would recommend hon. Members of the Conservative and of the Unionist Party to leave Irish National sentiment in the care of Irish Members. I have heard hon. Members say that a Second Chamber ought to be regarded as an insult by the people of Ireland. The people of Ireland regard it in no such light. There may be in my own Party, as in other Parties, hon. Members who are not in favour in general of the policy or principle of a Second Chamber. There are many other hon. Members who are convinced by experience and by observation that a Second Chamber is an advantage in every country. There are many men who quite appreciate the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, when he pointed out that the common experience of all or nearly all countries is in favour of a Second Chamber; but, however that may be, we are quite willing to give so much consideration to the interests, and probably the honest and sincere alarms of the Irish minority, or some of them, we are quite willing, I say, to give so much attention and regard to that sentiment as to be willing to accept a Second Chamber as a convenient and proper institution in Ireland. That is all the length we go at the present stage of the Debate. We have nothing to do with what hereafter may be proposed as to the construction, or position, or constitution of that Second Chamber. All we say is this—if there be a desire on this side of the water and on the other that a marked and distinct protection should be given to the minority by means of a Second Chamber, that proposal has our most cordial and ready acceptance. We have heard an argument quoted to-day that there cannot be even a fair Conservative minority in the Second Chamber under an Act like this; that even Ulster cannot have her fair representation; but are we not told that Ulster possesses the great bulk of the wealth, and the influence, and the intelligence of Ireland? Are we not told that she has the strength, the brains, the money, and the power in Ireland? And, under these conditions, is it possible to suppose that Ulster cannot make her voice heard in the Second Chamber of the Irish Legislature? I cannot believe that there is the slightest danger of stifling the voice of Ulster in any Constitution that can be framed for the Irish people. And I go farther, and say there is no desire amongst the Irish Members or the Irish people that Ulster Toryism should not have its full weight, its full representation, in the National Councils. It is strange to me that with all that great intelligence and power there is no Ulster Member who tries to suggest, even remotely, some means by which the danger he seems to fear, the danger of the obliteration of Ulster influence in the National Councils, can be got over. But this is what I wish to impress on the English people at the present moment—that we are quite prepared to accept the principle of a Second Chamber. We accept it because we believe it might be a safeguard in trying and momentous times against anything like too rapid legislation, and therefore would be a guarantee for the safety of the minority. On these grounds we accept it, and on these grounds we support it.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) : I have not troubled the House or the Committee hitherto on this Bill. That is not because I have not taken a great interest in it, and I desire now to say a few words on this Amendment. I am in this difficulty. While I desire to support the Amendment, I am unable to agree entirely with the reasons of the hon. Member for South Tyrone; but while I agree with the premises stated in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government I am quite unable to agree in his conclusions. As regards in the abstract the principle of a Second Chamber, I am entirely in favour of it, as a general rule. Therefore I have a difficulty in voting with the hon. Member for South Tyrone in opposing altogether the inclusion of a Legislative Council in the scheme of the Bill. On the other hand, the hon. Gentleman and others have opposed the enactment of this Legislative Council on the ground that its composition is so illusory as a measure for the defence of the loyal minority in Ireland that it cannot for a moment be accepted. On that point I am unable to deny the weight of the reasons stated by the Prime Minister, who said that if the composition of the Legislative Council as proposed in the Bill was unsubstantial it was open for the Committee in dealing with the subsequent clause that provides for the composition of the Body to so amend it that it will provide, in their opinion, a sufficient safeguard for the minority in Ireland. I have in my own experience seen the working of many Second Chambers. The Prime Minister referred to the composition of the Legislative Council in the various Colonies. There are in some of the British Colonies nominative Chambers, some of them with a limited number and some with an unlimited number of Members. There are Legislative Councils elected by the whole Colony voting in one constituency with a restricted franchise; and there are some Legislative Councils elected by constituencies carved out of the Colony similar to that provided by this Bill. And, again, there are cases in which the whole Legislative Council is dissolved together, and cases in which the Members go out in certain numbers and at different times. My experience has been that of all the different kinds of Legislative Council those which cause the most jealousy in the Lower Chamber are those which are elected. In Victoria and South Australia, for instance, frequent quarrels have taken place over the interposition of the Legislative Council in legislation against the wishes of the Lower Chamber. Most Members will recollect the case in which the Upper House declined to pass a Bill for the payment of Members, whereupon the Assembly tacked it on to the Appropriation Bill. The Upper House threw out the Appropriation Bill, and the Minister of the day dismissed the whole of the public officers who were paid by the annual Vote. On the other hand, in the Colonies where the Legislative Council is nominated I have not seen any of these jealousies arise. But my objection to the present proposal is of a different character. It is on all-fours with the objection expressed in the previous Debate as to the character proposed to be given to the Legislature in Ireland. There have been attempts made to assert, by distinct enactments in the Bill, declaration of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament; but I think that these proposals, though just and logical, are somewhat unsubstantial, because the declaration of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in the Preamble is about as illusory as the suzerainty of Her Majesty in the Transvaal. The Irish Legislature is not to be called a Parliament. There is not much in the name of a Parliament; but it will be a Parliament to all intents and purposes, and it would not be long before it asserted its rights to wider powers, and to secure by its influence in this House much larger concessions. The Prime Minister mentioned as the sole case of a Colonial Legislature that had obtained the name of Parliament the Parliament of the Dominion. That is a Parliament in all its attributes, because it has secured to it a long list of functions, such as the right of control over trade, navigation, shipping, and commerce, weights and measures, and all those other matters which are expressly reserved by this Bill from the power of the Irish Legislature. The hon. Member also mentioned the only cases in which he said that a Legislative Council of some kind had not been appointed as part of the Legislature—namely, the Provincial Legislatures of Canada, and said he would not refer to them, as they were not cases in point. But I venture to say that they are precisely cases in point. If we desire that the Legislative Body in Ireland should not be a Parliament, but a delegated Legislature with statutory powers; that it should be confined to those statutory powers, restricted in its functions; limited, as the Provincial Legislatures of Canada are limited, by the reservation of Parliamentary powers to the Dominion Parliament, then it would be appropriate, natural, and safe that it should not have a Legislative Council, which is the natural portion of a Parliament. That this Legislative Council might really be made a safeguard I do not deny. In 1886 the right hon. Gentleman proposed that it should represent the Peerage and property and all those who would have an interest in the preservation of law and order, and in the safeguarding of property; but there is no such proposal in this Bill. We have only a proposal for a Body to be elected by small tenants who would also elect the great majority of the Members of the Legislative Assembly in Ireland. It would be impossible to make such a Body a safeguard. But my point is that we should have no Second Chamber, because we should have no Parliament; and it is with that view, and not with the view stated by the hon. Member for South Tyrone, that I intend to support his Amendment.

*MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon) said, he had listened to the Debate with great interest, as it touched upon a subject which he had studied in other countries. Reference had been made to the experience in America, which had a Second Chamber praised by almost every writer and speaker on the subject. Lord Salisbury had said that they might view that Second Chamber with envy even in England itself. What was the principle in that Second Chamber? The principle was that of selection by the Representatives of the people. They would like to know why they could not apply that principle to Ireland? It might be said that they did not possess the materials for doing this in Ireland. But one of the first acts of the Irish Legislature would be to appoint County Councils, and then they would have the material to form a Second Chamber in Ireland. As soon as the County Councils were in a position to choose the Senate, they might be allowed to do so; and until the Senate was so chosen, the system provided by the Bill might fairly be accepted as a provisional arrangement until a more stable system could be formed. The County Council would send their best and most experienced men to the Senate; and it would possess the good qualities now seen in the American Senate.

*MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North-East Manchester had given an interesting and valuable statement of his Colonial experiences in the matter of Second Chambers; but he was bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman did not make plain to him why he had adopted the conclusion at which he had arrived in regard to the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman was not alone in that respect. The characteristic of the Debate had been that, whatever side hon. Gentlemen had professed their intention of voting upon, they had begun by saying that in principle they belonged to the other side. Hon. Members who were in favour of a Second Chamber proposed to vote against the Second Chamber; and hon. Members who were against the principle of a Second Chamber proposed to vote for the constitution of a Second Chamber. These remarkably incoherent arguments and conclusions would, perhaps, be maintained to the end, and he only hoped he would not fall into them himself. But his object in rising was to explain why he felt constrained to differ from his hon. Friends, and why he should vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. He did not say that the argument of experience was conclusive, or even that the argument a priori was not open to some obvious objections; but he thought that experience did justify what was said by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government in the speech which he delivered to a too thin Committee earlier in the day, that, on the whole, Second Chambers had worked well throughout our Colonies. He was afraid it was true that there was more discontent with them than the Prime Minister was disposed to recognise, and that there was a disposition, which in one or two places had ripened into action, to do away with them. But this feeling had been founded more on the expenses attendant on the institution of a Second Chamber than upon the political injury supposed to be derived from its existence. He ventured to say that in the arguments which had weight with many who wished to abolish Second Chambers—such as the irritating bar Second Chambers had afforded to rapid legislation, and the hindrances sometimes placed in the way of measures being put on the Statute Book which the majority of the voters in the Colonies wished—there had been a neglect to consider the advantages that had accrued on the other side, from that inability which beset politicians like other men to imagine what would happen if the system which prevailed had not prevailed, and if a totally different system had been in operation. They knew the inconveniences of a Second Chamber, but they were unable to realise the evils a single Chamber would involve. He thought that the weighty reasons advanced by the Prime Minister ought to be recalled to the minds of the Committee, that a Second Chamber did at least afford this advantage—that, however little a Second Chamber might be differently constituted from the First Chamber, there was always a tendency on the part of the Second Chamber and its Members to look at questions brought before the Legislature from a point of view of their own. There was a disposition to differ from the other Chamber, which was useful in causing the other side of the question to be properly discussed and brought before the community which was represented by the Legislature. There was also the great advantage, as his right hon. Friend had pointed out, of securing time for second thoughts. He asked any hon. Member, therefore, whether there was not at least a risk in Ireland, if a single Chamber was constituted, of seeing in the action of that Chamber rapid, impulsive, not always reflective action; whether there was not a risk that such a Chamber would be too hasty in its judgment, and perhaps unjust through its haste, and whether the mere possibility of delay in respect of Ireland, and considering the circumstances of Ireland, was not a thing to be desired? He went further, and said that in a purely democratic sense and spirit, as long as they had Chambers elected as they were and would be, if they wished to make the Legislature representative of the minds, will, thought, feeling, and interests of the country over which it ruled, they ought to have some means of getting represented not only impulse but hesitation; not only action but hesitancy; that despondency should be represented as well as resolution; and that the doubts and fears which existed in the community should, as well as the hopes and confidences, be reflected in the Legislature. Those great advantages could only be secured through a Second Chamber. It might be said all this was in the air. He was only repeating, in less eloquent and less powerful words, the arguments used by the Prime Minister, and those arguments would have to be considered in the future course of the Bill. The Committee was now really discussing the question whether they would permit any Second Chamber, and not whether the particular Chamber in the Bill should be adopted. As for that Second Chamber, it was urged that it was a sham, and that it would be no check, and that it would only represent the same classes that would be represented in the First Chamber. He believed that to be true. He had no hesitation in accepting that conclusion, and making it his own. This Second Chamber would be a tenant farmers' Chamber, just as the First Chamber would be. But the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government wished to make the Second Chamber something which would supplement the first, and bring in different elements, and not be a mere repetition of the first. The Committee would have the right to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman, when the question of the composition of the Second Chamber came up, that it bore the utmost similarity to the First Chamber, and that it should be varied. The hon. Member for Carnarvon had suggested that when County Councils came into operation in Ireland they should elect the Members of the Second Chamber. But they need not go so far as that. Some Second Chambers were nominated. It would be conceivable to support a nominated Second Chamber, or a Chamber partly nominated and partly elected, or one partly nominated, partly elected, and partly made up of ex officio members. For instance, they might have in that Chamber persons holding particular offices in relation to the greater Corporations in Ireland, and Representatives of Chambers of Commerce of the great commercial cities, and ex officio Members from the educational corporations in Ireland. They might in this way, or in some other way, so model the Second Chamber that, without being an inflexible, irresistible bar to the action of the first, it would be a correlative to it, supplementary to it—a useful addition to it. It was said—"All this is very well—you may suggest all these things; not one of them will be listened to in this Debate. The scheme of the Bill is to be preserved, and if you are going to take this first step, you will be constrained to acquiesce in all that follows." He did not deny it was possible, though it would be very hard for the Prime Minister to maintain, consistently with the sincere observations he had addressed to the Committee that day, an attitude of inflexible hostility to any proposed change in the composition of the Second Chamber in the direction he had just indicated, and he did not believe the right hon. Gentleman would maintain any such attitude. On this question, he (Mr. Courtney) would like to make an observation bearing upon many other questions that would be brought before the Committee, and which would be more forcible, perhaps, from its general than its specific application. Unfortunately, they were all of opinion, and they all knew, that this Bill would not become law. He said "unfortunately," not because he did not desire that it should not become law, not because he was not stoutly opposed altogether to the notion of setting up this Parliament in Ireland, but unfortunately for the purpose of the discussion of the Bill in the House. It was pretty manifest amongst the Members of the Government themselves that they would like the discussion on the Bill to be abbreviated as much as possible, and its fate sealed as quickly as possible; their action which had been indicated, and their action which had been revealed, or partly revealed, was action which tended towards lightening the Bill of debateable matter, so as to get it through the House as quickly and with as little friction as possible, and then, whatever followed afterwards, would follow. But the certainty of the fate that would befall the Bill elsewhere made the Government not unnaturally wish to economise their time and labour here by avoiding the discussion of things which need not be discussed, and by dropping parts which would be necessary to a Bill if it were to become an Act, but which were not necessary to a Bill which was to pass this House and to be sent to the House of Lords. On the other hand, the opponents of the measure knew that the Bill would not become law, and so they also were indisposed to discuss its principle. They could discuss abstract principles, but they were indisposed, he was afraid, to discuss, in a practical sense, the particular provisions of the Bill. This question was not going to be settled now, and what the ultimate issue might be no one, he thought, could venture with precision to say; but, in view of the possibilities that might follow, he thought the Committee might be usefully employed in making provision by the discussion here for the serious entertainment of propositions that might come before the House in a more practical shape hereafter.

An hon. MEMBER: From which Party?

*MR. COURTNEY: Perhaps from the hon. and learned Member himself. He should prefer to see hon. Members opposite, who were so deeply interested in this question, not sitting like mutes at a funeral, but taking a part in determining their own fate. They were now preparing materials for what might be a solution of the Irish Question hereafter, and in that view he thought the discussion a useful one. Having regard to the future, and being impressed with the belief that if ever Ireland was cursed with a Parliament of its own a Second Chamber would be pre-eminently useful, he should have no hesitation in voting against the Amendment.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) said, that the hon. Member for Bedford, who had made such a violent attack on the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin, might have remembered that the hon. Member for Northampton and other hon. Members who opposed Second Chambers were going to support the proposal for a Second Chamber in the Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I never said that I was going to vote for a Second Chamber.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The hon. Member stated that he was not going to support the Amendment, and in that case he was either going to vote against the Amendment or leave the House and not vote at all. But the hon. Member was not the only Member of the House who declared himself against the Second Chamber, but, nevertheless, was going to vote for one. The Home Secretary had told his constituents that Second Chambers were generally mischievous, and yet he was going to vote for a Second Chamber in connection with an Irish Legislature. The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) had expressed the same opinion, and he was going to vote against the Amendment; therefore, there was no ground for the moral indignation which the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) had expressed in regard to hon. Members sitting on the Opposition Benches, and which might well have been reserved for hon. Gentlemen sitting in his own circle of the House. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Plunket) had said that he desired to make the Bill more detestable in the eyes of the public, and the hon. Member for Bedford held up his hands in righteous indignation, and declared that the right hon. Gentleman was the creator of a novel system of Parliamentary tactics. But, surely, if one disapproved of a measure there was nothing immoral in the intention to make it distasteful. It was quite clear that what his right hon. Friend meant was that the Bill was a bad Bill, and that there were provisions in it which disguised its badness, and that it should, by stripping it of all its disguises, be made more detestable; but that was a different thing from saying that he desired to make it a worse Bill than it was. A man might be a villain, but by unmasking him you did not make him more of a villain, though he was made much more detestable. The Bill was a bad Bill, and its provisions were so disguised that it was the duty of all who were opposed to it to strip it of all its disguises and exhibit it in all its naked depravity. The Prime Minister begged the House to vote for the Second Chamber in regard to the general principle involved; but he (Mr. G. W. Balfour) had no objection in principle to a Second Chamber, but to the proposed composition of the Chamber. If the Chamber could be made satisfactory he should certainly vote against the Amendment, because, generally speaking, he favoured Second Chambers if one could be devised and the materials existed for creating it. The analogy of the American Senate would not apply. The American Senate represented the sovereignty of each State, and each State, whether large or small, was represented by two Members in the Senate. Seeing that in Ireland, an agricultural country, the men of education, position, and property were almost entirely Unionists, he altogether despaired of being able to construct a Second Chamber, and it was upon that ground that he should support the Amendment.

MR. B. COLERIDGE (Sheffield, Attercliffe) said, that if, on that side of the House, the question under debate were in the nature of a tabula rasa, he thought very few hon. Members would be found voting for a Second Chamber. He supposed that those who advocated Second Chambers desired the minority to rule, and that those who desired the majority to rule were opposed to Second Chambers. There were no judgments so satisfactory as those which were given with full responsibility; and if a man were tried for his life on the question of fact there was no appeal, and there were no decisions arrived at with greater care than those from which there was no appeal. The question arose—What were they going to do in that Debate? He expected that a Second Chamber had been introduced into the Bill in order to conciliate opposition, and the course of the Debate showed that it had signally failed. That being so, who, then, was in favour of a Second Chamber? There was no one on the Liberal side of the House in its favour, and he did not think that the Nationalist Party desired a Second Chamber. They only accepted it mainly to remove hostility to the Bill as a whole. But the proposal had not disarmed hostility, and, in that case, might they not ask the Government to re-consider their position? If the Second Chamber had simply been introduced to conciliate the Opposition, it had failed; and, looking to the future of Ireland, if the Second Chamber were withheld, they would be preventing the introduction of causes of conflict between two classes of the people, and, that being so, he thought the Government should re-consider their views on the question.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): It is suggested that this proposal for a Second Chamber may have been introduced with a view of conciliating opposition. I am sorry to say that the notice we had of the attitude hon. Gentlemen opposite were likely to take up led us to expect that neither a proposal of this kind nor any other proposal would conciliate their opposition; and I would tell my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield that, so far from conciliating the opposition, if we were to withdraw this clause they would find the Bill worse without it than with it. What is the question before the Committee? It is, it seems to me, whether in this Bill we are to have a provision for a Second Chamber or not?

The hon. Member for Leeds, with the ability and ingenuity which distinguish him, has argued that it would be impossible under any circumstances to have a Second Chamber.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Not in any circumstances, but to have such a Second Chamber as would be accepted and would have a chance of success.

*MR. BRYCE: I accept the correction, but it is difficult to understand why hon. Members opposite should think that no suggestions they can make can possibly have weight with Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty's Government are quite prepared to meet all reasonable apprehensions which hon. Members opposite or the minority in Ireland can entertain, and to endeavour to construct as good a Legislature in Ireland as we can. In Clause 6 Amendments can be moved which would be compatible with the 1st clause, but which would completely alter the character of the Second Chamber; and, if that is so, it follows that we are now discussing nothing but the general principle. It is to that general principle, as applied to the case of Ireland, that I will confine myself. We all know that when we arrive at Clause 6 we shall have all these discussions over again. Every word that has been said to-day and that was said yesterday against the proposed composition of the Chamber can, on Clause 6, be said over again. Therefore, it is useless now for me to justify our proposal of this particular Chamber, or for hon. Gentlemen to disparage it. But I would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite of the nature of the vote they are going to give. It is a vote against any Second Chamber whatever. It is a vote which is not grounded upon proof that no Second Chamber can be created for Ireland; therefore, what conclusion do I draw as the effect of such a vote? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bodmin Division observed that the question could not be settled by this Bill; and he grounded on that observation a reflection which seemed to me very opportune as to what I will call—if I may say it without offence—

the irresponsible spirit in which hon. Gentlemen opposite are discussing the Bill—namely, the reflection that hon. Gentlemen are discussing the Bill as if they expected it never to take effect. [Opposition Cheers.] I am glad I have the assent of hon. Gentlemen opposite to that view. They are discussing the Bill with the avowed object of simply making a demonstration of hostility against a whole policy in its nature guilty and vicious. But hon. Gentlemen should carry their grasp of the future a little further. The question may not be settled by this Bill, but neither will the question be settled by the rejection of this Bill. If the Bill should fail, we all know that it will be followed by another Bill. Therefore, the discussion on this Bill is not thrown away, because even if the wishes of the Party opposite should be realised and this Bill is rejected it will be followed by another, and the present Debates will largely influence the character of the measure then brought in. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that this Amendment were carried, and suppose that next Session Her Majesty's Government bring in another Home Rule Bill—it would be impossible for them, in the teeth of the decision of this House, to introduce a provision for a Second Chamber into that Bill. Even if they were convinced by the arguments of hon. Members opposite that this was a bad Second Chamber and that there ought to be a better one, they would be absolutely precluded from having a Second Chamber brought in. It would be in the highest degree unstatesmanlike for the Party opposite to drive the Government to that conclusion. I cannot depart from this aspect of the question without expressing the hope that hon. Gentlemen opposite will pause before they give a vote which can be directed only against the principle of any Second Chamber in Ireland, and which will be remembered when the question of a Second Chamber for England some day comes up. With regard to hon. Members on the Government side who dislike voting for any Second Chamber at all, I would remind them that they, with the views they entertain and have declared, will not be giving a vote against a Second Chamber based on a property qualification, but on the very difficult and large general question whether, under any circumstances, Second Chambers ought to exist or not. It does not appear to me that any vote given on this Amendment will, so far as hon. Members on this side of the House are concerned, have any bearing on any opinion they may entertain with regard to the House of Lords. Hon. Members opposite, if they condemn the scheme of a Second Chamber, will give a vote unfriendly to Second Chambers generally; but hon. Members on this side, whose object is merely to express their dislike of the House of Lords, will go far beyond the necessities of their position if they vote against having in Ireland a Second Chamber which will furnish no precedent in favour of the House of Lords. Some hon. Members have compared the proposed Second Chamber to the House of Lords; but I can conceive nothing less like a Chamber founded on hereditary right than a Chamber founded on a £20 qualification. Let hon. Members who oppose this Second Chamber put themselves in the position the Government occupied when they framed the Bill. They had to consider whether or not some Second Chamber could be introduced. When they looked round Europe at the experience of Second Chambers they found that in every European State but two which have Legislative Bodies there existed Second Chambers, the only exceptions being Greece and Bulgaria. When they looked to the United States, they found that 44 States and four Territories have Second Chambers; and when they looked to the Colonies, we found that in each one of the Australian Colonies there were two Chambers, in Cape Colony there were two Chambers, and in most of the Canadian Provinces, as well as in the Dominion Parliament, there were two Chambers. It is said that two Chambers do not always work harmoniously together. My observation on that is that the object of having two Chambers is to secure, not that things shall always work smoothly between them, but that they shall frequently differ, and provide a means of correcting such errors as either may commit. That observation has many bearings, and I confess that the result of the inquiries I have made into the working of the Australasian Colonies is that the Chambers which have of late years worked most efficiently there have been the elective and not the nominated Second Chambers. In Victoria, and in South Australia, the Legislative Council, like the Senate in democratic France and the Senates in the democratic States of North America, has more and more come to be regarded as a valuable part of the Constitution, and upon all this past experience I base the general proposition that there is nothing anti-democratic in a Second Chamber. The democracy may be just as much a democracy whether there is one Chamber or two. Therefore, I beg hon. Members on the Liberal side not to suppose that they will pay any tribute to the genius of democracy by voting against the proposal of the Bill. The general question of having one House or two is far too large for me to enter upon here. Nor is any general conclusion possible which shall apply to every country. All I desire is to show the strong primâ facie case there is for trying a bicameral system in Ireland. I must be content to rely on the very weighty and thoughtful speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bodmin Division, who stated—as the Prime Minister had done when the House was not so full as it is now—the general grounds on which Second Chambers are commended as offering a protection to minorities. Looking round the world, and seeing what a large consensus of experience there is in favour of having two Houses, and knowing how much has been said about the desirability of safeguarding the Legislature of Ireland, we should have exposed ourselves to far more hostile criticism from the Opposition if we had brought in a Bill which provided for only one Chamber. I think I have said enough to justify our proposal. I cannot accept the view that there are no materials in Ireland for the construction of a Second Chamber. There are many of our Colonies and many of the States of America where the population is quite as homogeneous as in Ireland, and where the need for having a Second Chamber is not so strong as in Ireland, and yet where it has been found desirable to have it. A principal reason why Second Chambers have been established in these communities is that they not only involve considerable delay, but also a double debate. Questions come a second time before public opinion. Every question, when it has run the gauntlet of one set of minds in one Chamber, has to run the gauntlet of another set. Every Chamber, by the law of its being and its sense of self-importance, of necessity seeks opportunities for vindicating its right to existence by exposing every question that comes before it to a second consideration and criticism. The result is to waken up still further the opinion of the country. We all know that the value of the Debates that take place in this House lies not so much in the effect they have on our minds, because we mostly come here pledged to vote in a particular direction, but that they awaken opinion in the country. [Opposition Cheers.] Yes; hon. Gentlemen opposite concur in that view. They may be sure that we rely upon public opinion, and will lose no chance of enlightening it, and so, too, we want to give Ireland a chance of having all questions thoroughly discussed from every point of view. We want the Irish Legislature to be one in which all measures shall run the gauntlet of a double debate, and in which everything that can be done for the political education of the people, so long neglected in the past, shall be done by the legislative machinery of the country. We hold that if ever there was a country where it would be fair to try the experiment of having two Legislative Chambers, that country is Ireland, and we hope that the House will pause before it destroys the opportunity we wish to give the Irish people of having such a Constitutional machinery. I have said that this is a question not of the particular Chamber we have proposed, but of whether Ireland shall have a Second Chamber or not. It is also a question of cutting off and destroying one of the safeguards which the Bill provides. Gentlemen opposite contend that a Second Chamber would not be a safeguard; but no one can possibly argue that the Legislature will be any the worse for possessing it. Is it not, therefore, the very wantonness of Party passion to strike off a safeguard which may prove exceedingly useful for the sake of damaging the Bill? I hope we shall give the Irish Legislature the opportunity, which nearly all the democratic Legislatures of the world possess, of starting on its career with all the advantages which full discussion and the possible divergence of two Chambers can provide.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down tells us that it is beyond the scope of the present Debate to discuss the general question of Second Chambers.

MR. BRYCE was understood to dissent.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I was not going to indulge in hostile criticism of that remark, because my next sentence would have been that anybody who heard his speech would admit that a more interesting discussion on the general question of Second Chambers was never heard in this House. I listened to the general remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, not only with great admiration for the compressed learning he contrived to put into them, but with very general agreement in the broad principles he laid down. But I must remind him of one truth connected with the philosophy of Second Chambers which I think has escaped the minds of himself and his hon. Friends. There is nothing magical, mysterious, or supernatural in a Second Chamber which should mitigate the evils of a single Chamber. It depends very much whether it is to produce good results upon what is the constitution of the Second Chamber. It is not every Second Chamber that is an improvement on every single Chamber. If it is a well-constituted Second Chamber, it is an improvement on a single Chamber. It is, therefore, impossible to divorce the abstract and general discussion from the particular discussion of the composition of the Second Chamber. The right hon. Gentleman would have us believe that the mind of the Government is open upon the question. What does that mean? Does it mean that the Government are going to allow debate upon their proposals on the clause itself? Of course they cannot prevent that. The question is, are the Government prepared to alter their plan, and to alter it materially? If it can be shown that the Second Chamber is a futile expedient for obtaining what they desire, will they be prepared to restore the proposal of 1886 in favour of an Irish House of Lords? In any event the scheme we have now to consider is the scheme which is before us. We know the power of the Government over their followers is such that they are going to compel gentlemen like the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who has over and over again declared—I was going to say their principles, but we are told that this is not a principle, but only an opinion—they are going to compel hon. Gentlemen who have actually got Amendments on the Paper on this subject to go into the Lobby with them. With such disciplined forces before us, should we not be idiots if we relied upon the general declaration of the Government that they will listen to any proposal to alter Clause 6? If the Government have any general declaration to make on that subject, now is the time to make it; but if they intend to adhere to Clause 6, as I gather from an indication given by the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) is the case, do not let us be told that we may dismiss from our minds the criticisms we have to make upon the particular proposals they have laid before us. The right hon. Gentleman appears to think that all who give a vote in favour of this Amendment will commit themselves against Second Chambers in general, and the House of Lords in particular. He actually seemed to suppose that by objecting to this particular scheme for Ireland we shall thereby be committed for all time against the establishment of Second Chambers and against the House of Lords.

MR. BRYCE: I said it would be remembered.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I suppose remembered is a polite phrase for misrepresented. I suppose the right hon.

Gentleman means that whenever a question of the retention of the House of Lords comes to be seriously considered someone will rake up the votes given in this House, and will say to those who gave them—"Oh, you do not like a £20 rating Chamber in Ireland, with what face can you support the existence of a House of Lords?" I trust that anyone who takes the trouble to rake up the evidence given on this occasion will also take the trouble to read the speeches which have been made. If this is done, it will be found that not a single Member has declared an intention of voting for the Amendment without giving as much emphasis as the right hon. Gentleman himself has done to his belief in the necessity for a Second Chamber. The right hon. Gentleman really refuted his whole argument about five minutes after stating it, because he said—"Can anything be less like the House of Lords than the Chamber we propose?" No, Sir; nothing could be less like it, and nothing could be more fatal to the carrying out of the function which the right hon. Gentleman thinks a Second Chamber is fitted to carry out than the Second Chamber proposed by this Bill. We have, after all, to approach this Amendment in one of two frames of mind. We have either to suppose that the Bill will be carried much in its present shape, or that it will be so amended as to pass in a shape which we shall disapprove less than its present shape. Let us consider the first of these hypotheses. If the Bill is to pass much in its present shape we are justified in voting for the Amendment, because we regard the Second Chamber proposed as a ridiculous comedy, an illusory safeguard, and a danger to those whom it is intended to protect. But if we take the other hypothesis, and suppose that we shall in Committee be able to amend the Bill so as to reduce the evil to the lowest possible proportions, I see no reason why we should not support the Amendment; because we shall, by these hypothetical Amendments, reduce the Legislative Assembly in Ireland to the ideal once dear to gentlemen opposite—in other words, we shall have made Home Rule a "Gas and Water"

Home Rule. If the Assembly we are going to establish in Ireland is to be a Gas and Water Assembly, I do not think it would be necessary to check its declarations by establishing a Second Chamber at all. We have not established Second Chambers in setting up County Councils throughout the country.

MR. T. M. HEALY : What did you do in your own County Council Bill for Ireland ? Seven men and the Sheriff !

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The hon. and learned Gentleman is entirely mistaken. There was no Second Chamber proposed in that Bill. Is it pretended that there is a Second Chamber in the Scotch County Council Bill ? If not, how can it be pretended that there is a Second Chamber in the Irish County Council Bill, which, in this respect, was framed upon the Scotch Bill ? However, Sir, I do not mean to be led off the track of my argument against this proposal by any discussion in regard to the Local Government Bill which I had the honour to introduce, and which, for anything I know, I may some day have the honour to pass. I want to bring before the House, and especially before the right hon. Gentleman who preceded me in the Debate, a consideration to which I think he will attach some value. I agree with him that, if you were to set up a Legislature in Ireland with powers at all in excess of those I have described as gas and water powers, such an Assembly would require a check of some kind. I have stated that I think the check he proposes is an illusory check. I go further, and say it will be a dangerous check. I think it will prevent the application of the only possible efficient check which can be applied to the deliberations and actions of an Assembly in Ireland. The proper check upon such an Assembly is the action of this Parliament and the veto of the Crown given in accordance with the action of this Parliament. Here, and here alone, is the proper Court of Appeal from the Irish Assembly. If you establish this Second Chamber, is it not the opinion of every man who knows anything of our Constitution that hon.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Gentlemen in this House will get up and say of any Bill that is objected to, that it has passed not only the First but the Second Chamber, and ask why we should endeavour to mutilate and check legislation which has run a gauntlet of that description ? It is because I think this House should survey and scrutinise every action of the Irish Legislature ; because I believe that when it thinks fit to interfere it should have no arguments brought against its interference, and because I think the true Second Chamber is to be found within these walls that I—agreeing absolutely with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bryce) as to the necessity of having some check, and with what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bodmin Division (Mr. Courtney) as to the teaching of universal experience that a single Chamber without a check is not a safe form of Government, and believing that the proper method of supervising the performances of such a Chamber is to be found on this side of St. George's Channel—shall, if the hon. Member goes to a Division, vote for the Amendment.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) said, the Debate disclosed a very great peculiarity—namely, that every one in favour of a Second Chamber would vote against it, while a great many against the principle of such a Chamber would be found voting for it. He was one of a small minority which proposed to give both an honest and a logical vote. He could not at all understand the position of the Leader of the Opposition, who usually was logical, but who in the present case had not the courage of his opinions, and was not going to vote in favour of the Second Chamber principle. He admitted that he was in favour of Clause 1, and the principle it embodied ; but he would vote for it because he did not like Clause 6, which established the machinery for giving effect to the principle of Clause 1. Now he himself objected to Clause 6, because it introduced the aristocracy as well as an oligarchy. He hated them both ; but if he had to choose between the two evils, he would a thousand times prefer the aristocracy. They had been told by the right hon.

Gentleman the Member for Midlothian that a Second Chamber would prevent hasty and crude legislation. He disputed that, and he remembered that some years ago both Houses in our own Parliament passed very hastily a Bill affecting Ecclesiastical Tithes, and now everybody was ashamed of it. The House of Lords, instead of preventing hasty legislation on that occasion, simply expedited it by suspending its own Standing Orders. Again, as an instance of crude legislation, the House of Commons last year passed a Scotch Bill of 400 clauses. It was to come into force on the 15th of this month, and yet already it had been found necessary to bring in a Bill to amend it. In his view, therefore, the bi-cameral system had produced nothing but evil, and he was, therefore, an uni-cameral man. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen was in error in describing Norway as a bi-cameral country. It was a country with one Chamber which sometimes divided itself into two Grand Committees, and it was the most advanced single-cameral country. The right hon. Gentleman also said the Second Chamber worked well in Victoria. Could it be said to have worked well when twice during 40 years it had created a deadlock in the Government of that Colony when the Appropriation Bill had been thrown out, and supplies for Government, Police, and Judges refused? A Second Chamber had been thrust upon the Colonies, and they had accepted it as the lesser of two evils. They could no more be said to have demanded it than Ireland could be said to be demanding a Second Chamber now. He should vote for the Amendment, and he did so because that was the only logical and honest course to pursue, holding the opinions he did.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, there were many questions arising under the Bill which were essentially Imperial questions and affected the British Empire at large; but the one they were now discussing was an essentially Irish question, and it essentially affected the future welfare of the Irish people. The Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Duchy had fallen into a common mistake. Both right hon. Gentlemen had made geographical excursions all over the world, and as a result they had formulated the provisions of the Bill upon the varied experiences of the countries that in their imagination they had visited. But he would like to ask the right hon. Gentlemen whether in these excursions they had found another Ireland? Some people might think it unfortunate—others might think it fortunate—that there was but one Ireland on the face of this planet; and, therefore, the arguments of the Prime Minister and his Colleagues utterly fell through from the fact that the analogies they tried to draw from other countries were absolutely inapplicable to the country about which they were now legislating. To say that legislation which had been successful in Tasmania, or in Australia, or in Canada must therefore of necessity be satisfactory in Ireland was not more wise or pertinent than to urge those Colonies to burn turf because that fuel was used in his country. The right hon. Gentleman, in his conciliatory speech, sought to induce the Irish Unionists to accept the principle of the proposal, and said that when they came to deal with the clause regulating the composition and condition of the Second Chamber he would be ready to consider any suggestion that might be made. Yes; but from what quarter? In one sense the Government was a gutta-percha Government, capable of being moulded and squeezed into any shape if the squeezing had been below the Gangway. It was a sponge that might be wrung, but the hand that wrung it must be found amongst the Members who enabled the right hon. Gentleman to continue on the Treasury Bench. Many of the right hon. Gentleman's followers were anxious to find out whether the Irish minority looked upon the Second Chamber as a real safeguard. No doubt the majority of the right hon. Gentleman's supporters were in favour of a Second Chamber, and he could assure those hon. Members that, so far from looking on the Second Chamber as a safeguard or security, they looked upon it as exactly the reverse. One thing had happened. They had learned from the Debate that the Gladstonian Party had been put into a very ugly fix through this proposal. They had had a remarkable speech from the hon. Member for Northampton, but he did not take it seriously. The hon. Member for Northampton did not wish any one to take him seriously; he looked upon the whole of this question with absolute contempt, and a slight scratch would remove the Radical skin of the hon. Member and probably show him to be a blue-blooded aristocrat. What was the view held by the followers of the Prime Minister? That our Second Chamber was endured so long as it was an echo of the will of this House. True, it contained hereditary elements, but it was a sort of political Greenwich Hospital for worked-out Parliamentary wrecks. The only reason for proposing this Second Chamber in Ireland was that it was bound to be an echo of the other Chamber, and, therefore, absolutely useless. The hon. Member for Dumfries had told them that if they carried that Amendment they would incur great responsibility, and that it would hamper those who in the future might bring in a Home Rule Bill. The hon. Member went a little too quick; he seemed to be certain that in a future Session the Government would have the pleasure of bringing in a Home Rule Bill, but the Unionist Party did not intend they should have that opportunity, and therefore they intended to strip this Bill of all the delusions and shams in which it was wrapped. In fact, this was an electioneering blind. He could imagine the speeches that would be made on the perfection of the safeguards that had been introduced. This Second Chamber would be elected by men who could not be trusted to try criminal cases; it would be an aristocracy of squalor, elected and created by a Senate of the gutter. The £20 farmers in Ireland were far more under the influence of political coercion than the labourer; the farmers had got houses covered with thatch that could be fired, cattle that could be houghed and mutilated, and goods that could be boycotted.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): And farms from which they can be evicted.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he did not object to these interpolated interjections from an hon. Member for whom he had the most sincere commiseration, for they all knew he must be suffering under terrific oratorical pressure, and these intermittent interjections and certain inarticulate sounds were the escape of the safety-valve, but for which he believed the hon. Member would explode. This Second Chamber could not be a brake on the rapid action of the Lower House; it would be an ineffective skid which would not impede velocity. It would be composed of men of exactly the same class, the same creed, and under exactly the same influences as would exist in the First Chamber; and if he and his friends consented to be returned to sit in either of the two Houses—which they would not—they would find themselves in exactly the same minority in each; their voices would have just as little effect; and if any difference should arise between the two Houses, it would simply be a dispute as to the division of the spoils. No logical reason had been assigned by any occupant of the Treasury Bench why the Second Chamber would be a safeguard. If they could conceive this Metropolis having two Chambers, one composed of burglars and the other of pickpockets, that would be an analogy to this proposal. Mr. Cobbett once described the House of Lords as a “den of thieves,” and that description would apply exactly to the proposed Chamber. Their view of the situation was that, if they passed safely through one House, they could not escape being despoiled in the other. They were Scylla and Charybdis, and if they escaped one whirlpool they must be engulfed in the other. Because the Second Chamber was a delusive and worthless protection he should vote for the Amendment. It would pass the wit of man to devise a Second Chamber in Ireland that would give any protection of any kind to the Irish minority, and he therefore earnestly appealed to hon. Members in all quarters of the House to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.) said, he had been a good deal impressed by the observations which fell from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, when he told hon. Gentlemen opposite that if they voted for this Amendment that vote against a Second Chamber would be remembered against them in the future. That was exactly the difficulty experienced by the Radicals on this occasion; they felt that if they voted in favour of a Second Chamber, it would be remembered against them hereafter. The reasons urged by the right hon. Member for Bodmin why they should vote against the Amendment were the reasons which would induce him to vote for it. He said he was in favour of a Second Chamber, because the Members of it would look at questions from their point of view; but what they, as Radicals, wanted was that questions should be looked at from the point of view of the persons represented by the Members of the Chamber. His difficulty was increased by the attitude of the hon. Member for Longford, because it had hitherto been assumed that the Irish Members were perfectly indifferent whether there was a Second Chamber or not. The hon. Member's speech rather indicated that the Irish Members desired one. But he observed that the observations that fell from the hon. Member's lips were received with ominous silence by his Colleagues, and he believed the Irish Nationalist Members did not desire a Second Chamber. [Cries of "No, no!"] He said so because he had read their speeches; and he had had the honour of conversing with individuals among them upon the question, and the only reason why they tolerated a Second Chamber was because they believed it would be absolutely ineffective for any purpose—that it was a mere toy and plaything given to the Unionist Party. The idea of the relations of the Legislative Council to the Assembly was evidently borrowed from Norway, where the Storting was divided into parts, of which the Odelsting formed one-fourth and the Lagthing three-fourths, and in the event of disagreement between the two sections they had to re-unite and vote in common after the lapse of a certain period of time. But what had taken place in Norway in regard to that particular system of amalgamation of the two Chambers? There was at present, and had been for some time past, a very active movement for the purpose of abolishing it, because it was found to be ineffective and to lead to confusion. But he recognised that there was no finality in this Bill—that they would, later on, have to make additions to, or alterations in, this scheme of government; and he felt constrained to say that, though the declaration might be received with derisive cheers from hon. Gentlemen opposite—that, as the proposal for a Second Chamber had been accepted by the Irish Party, and acquiesced in by them as a trifling concession to Unionist sentiment, they would not be justified in imperilling the passage of the Bill.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford, City) said, he would like to say one or two words on this question. In the first place, he had listened with gratification, and not without surprise, to the closing declaration of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The earlier portion of the hon. Gentleman's speech decided him (Mr. Redmond) to intervene in the Debate; but he had given to the House reasons for the decision which he had arrived at towards the close of his speech. The hon. Member gave two reasons why the Irish Members did not care for a Second Chamber—why they were opposed to it, although they were anxious to accept it. The first reason was that it was forced upon them; and the second was that they thought a Second Chamber would be ineffective. For himself, he (Mr. Redmond) desired to say that he was in favour of a Second Chamber, and for exactly the opposite reasons of those put forward by the hon. Member for North-West Durham (Mr. Atherley-Jones). He believed the existence of a Second Chamber was not in itself derogatory to the principle of democracy. In the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, he was specially in favour of it. He was in favour of it, first of all, because he desired to add everything to this new Legislative Body which would in any way, in his view, increase the dignity of the Irish Government and the instrument by which the Irish Government would be carried out, and he was of opinion that from that point of view it was well to have a Second Chamber. He was in favour of it, in the second place, because he was convinced it would be effective for the purpose for which it was created. He was not prepared to say now that the proposals in Clause 6 were the best that could be made; but he could not understand how hon. Members could argue that under a £20 qualification it would be impossible to have an adequate representation of Unionist opinion in the Legislature, because he remembered the fact that when there was a £12 rating qualification in Ireland very many constituencies that he could mention which were now represented by Nationalists—County Dublin was a case in point—were, before the qualification was reduced, represented by Unionists. He did not know, but there might be differences of opinion among Nationalist Members—as was natural there should be—in reference to the question of a Second Chamber; but he did not think there were any of the Irish Members who would vote for the Amendment. He desired to make an appeal to hon. Members of the Liberal Party who had declared their intention of voting for the Amendment. On the previous evening they had a question before them which, though a small one, was regarded by a section of the Irish Representatives as of great importance. There was a difference of opinion among the Irish Representatives on that question, and the majority of the Nationalist Members took a particular course, even inducing such intelligent Members of the Liberal Party as his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) to vote with them on the principle that what the majority of the Irish Members desired ought to be conceded. Unlike the case of the previous night, on this occasion the Irish Members would give a solid vote. Were hon. Members opposite going to vote against the Irish Members in such circumstances? He only rose to make it clear to the friends of Ireland, in the House and outside of it, that the Irish Members were not going to vote for the proposal for a Second Chamber because it was being forced upon them or because they believed it would be ineffective. Like all, or most he was sure, of the Irish Members, he was going to vote for the proposal on principle. On Clause 6 they would endeavour to make the Second Chamber effective for the purposes for which it was intended and render it worthy of the dignity of the new

Mr. J. E. Redmond

Irish Government as an effective check on rash and ill-considered legislation.

Mr. Macfarlane rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

*MR. W. SAUNDERS (Newington, Walworth) said, he did not wish to give a silent vote on this question, because he held, in opposition to the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce), that in voting for this Second Chamber hon. Members would be voting for something a great deal worse than the House of Lords. They could measure, to some extent, how much mischief arose from the House of Lords; but this would be a Chamber entirely in the interest of property and against industry, and it would be re-invigorated by periodical election, and therefore it would be a Chamber much more dangerous in the interests of the country than any that now existed. A Second Chamber did not prevent hasty legislation; on the contrary, it often caused it. Was it not a fact within their own experience that after measures had been carefully considered by their own House they had been altered—with very little consideration in most cases—by the other Chamber? He earnestly trusted that they would not impose upon the Irish people anything so mischievous as a Second Chamber. He had not yet found a single Irish Member who was willing to accept it; they merely submitted to it, and by submitting to it he believed that they gravely endangered the Bill. Nearly all the speakers on his own side had used strong arguments against a Second Chamber, and yet they were going to vote for one. How could a decision arrived at in such circumstances be accepted by the country? He had hoped that this question would be decided upon its merits; it was evident it was not being so decided. By voting for a Second Chamber, in his opinion, they were doing more than anything else could do to imperil the passage of the Bill.

MR. R. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.) said, he did not feel it possible to give a silent vote on this occasion. He had the misfortune to differ on this point from the great mass of his Party, and he should feel bound to go with the hon. Member for Caithness and the hon. Member for Sheffield into the Lobby where he had very seldom strayed. On the question of a Second Chamber he belonged rather to the school of the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith) and the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Morley) than to that of the Prime Minister (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and the right hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney). He was prepared to maintain on the proper occasion that the presumption was entirely against setting up a Second Chamber in the present circumstances. They were asked to make a new Constitution for a people that were going to be self-governed. His vote must be determined by what seemed to him to be the attitude of the Irish people on this question. If Ireland desired such a Second Chamber as was proposed in this clause as part of its Constitution that closed the controversy for him. If, on the other hand, he saw that Ireland was, through her Representatives, submitting to and acquiescing in his proposal as a means of getting through some kind of a Bill in any kind of way, he would not be moved by that consideration. He would vote against the proposal for a Second Chamber under those circumstances, and for two reasons: First of all, he thought, generally speaking, that principle was the best strategy, just as honesty was said by those who had tried both ways to be the best policy. His second reason was that he thought pushing the Bill through by hook or by crook was very bad strategy, because hon. Gentlemen on his own side of the House must remember that these discussions were, to a large extent, of an academic character. The Bill might be got through the House of Commons, but they knew very well it would be thrown out by the House of Lords; and their only subsequent chance of success was that they should be able to raise the country against the House of Lords. They would never be able to rouse the country by means of a Bill which had been made to pass. Bills that were made to pass were very like razors that were made to sell. They might succeed in passing them upon the market; but the market would find them out. They would never excite public enthusiasm by a shifty and patchy Bill, in which the country would know that principles were sacrificed to mere tactics. If he found unmistakable proofs that the Irish people were accepting this clause with a very tepid enthusiasm, and with no desire for it at all, then he felt he was not in a position to force it upon them. One part of the Irish representation would have nothing to do with this Second Chamber; they scouted it. The larger portion of the Irish Members had said, through the mouth of the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. Justin McCarthy), that they were willing to accept a Second Chamber. In order to accept there must be a party that offered. If they merely said they would take it if it was put upon them, that was not sufficient for him. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond), indeed, attempted to strike a somewhat stronger note, but, to his mind, it was not very powerful. The hon. Member was the Leader of a very small section—he was the Coryphæus of a Party of nine; he was the chief Muse of that small Party. He (Mr. Wallace) felt himself most reluctantly driven to differ from a Party from which he seldom or never differed, but which he thought in the present case was too hastily adopting an attitude which, in connection with subsequent proceedings, they might recall with regret.

MR. J. A. BRIGHT (Birmingham, Central) rose to speak——

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read the third time."

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said, he could not allow the Bill to pass without a protest against the policy of the President of the Board of Trade. The right hon. Gentleman promised before Easter that, if some satisfactory arrangements were not made between the Railway Companies and the traders with regard to the new rates, he would put his foot down, and deal with the question. That promise had not been fulfilled, and he (Mr. Weir) would warn the right hon. Gentleman that unless he stiffened his back, put his foot down firmly, and dealt with the Railway Companies energetically on this matter, there would be some difficulty in getting Railway Bills through this House. He (Mr. Weir) had no desire to press his opinion to a Division; but he thought that the right hon. Gentleman should not allow himself to be captivated and fascinated by those who controlled the great railways.

MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough) said, that, while he had no desire to stop the Bill, he wished to get from the President of the Board of Trade a statement as to the position in which traders and the Railway Companies were at the present moment. He had numerous complaints by traders and agriculturists that the Railway Companies were not carrying out their agreement to go back to the old rates, and to refund the overcharges; and he was afraid the companies were allowing some of the large traders and powerful concerns to go back to the old rates, while the small agriculturists and traders—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is now travelling beyond the particular company whose Bill is before the House.

MR. A. C. MORTON: I am afraid all the companies are alike.

*MR. SPEAKER: Both the hon. Member who spoke first and the hon. Member for Peterborough are quite out of Order in thinking that this is an opportunity for discussing the conduct of the Board of Trade with regard to all the companies in the United Kingdom.

MR. A. C. MORTON said, he would only ask the right hon. Gentleman to make a statement as to the present position with regard to railway charges, and as to whether the Government could do anything to relieve traders from the present overcharges?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) said, that neither the Railway Companies nor he gave any such assurance as the hon. Member suggested. He hoped the House would allow this Bill to pass, and also appoint the Committee on Railway Rates. He might say that the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Company had been most anxious to get direct access into London in the interest of the public during the past few years.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) quite agreed that it was desirable that there should be as much competition as possible between the great Railway Companies. The only thing he was afraid of was that when they got another great line running to London the public would get no benefit at all. The Companies had a monopoly for which they paid nothing, and some did well and others badly. The proper course to take with regard to them would be to refuse to pass their Bills if they did not act justly towards the people—when there was an authority appointed to fix fair railway rates just as there were authorities to fix fair rents in Ireland and Scotland.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

LONDON IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

(by Order).

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [10th May], "That Mr. Benn be a Member of the Committee on the London Improvements Bill."—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, he had hoped that it would not be necessary for him to again bring this matter under the notice of the House, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Marjoribanks) would have substituted another name for that of Mr. Benn. As he had explained yesterday, he did not take exception to the name of Mr. Benn on personal grounds, but on the ground of his being a Member of the Body promoting the Bill. He was aware that, in certain exceptional cases, persons who occupied the position of promoters, or who were closely identified with Bills, had been placed on the Hybrid Committees which have sat to consider those Bills; but he ventured to think that these were examples rather to be avoided than followed, and that very serious inconvenience and mischief would result from a departure from the normal practice of the House, which was to constitute its judicial tribunals in a manner which would secure not only that their proceedings should be conducted with impartiality, but the confidence of the outside public. In the case before them five of the Members were nominated by the House and four by the Committee of Selection. He imagined that the parties or sections of the House would be proportionately represented on the Committee; but the fact still remained that the odd vote which would carry the Bill, or insure its rejection, or the determination of its clauses, or of an Amendment of importance, might be that of the Member who was himself one of the promoters of the Bill. Now, in his judgment that was a state of affairs which, if persisted in and made a practice of, could not fail to bring discredit upon the character of the business of the House for judicial impartiality. He might be told that it was sometimes convenient for a Committee to have at hand some person who was conversant with the details of the Bill they were considering—someone who could give information at first hand. But he maintained that the proper place for a Member who was prepared to render assistance of that kind was the witness chair. Besides, every Member of the House had the right, at all times and seasons, to be present when a Bill was before the Committee—save at those times when the room was cleared for the purpose of consultation. And he had known cases in which Members had claimed as a right to address Committees otherwise than as witnesses on a Bill from the point of view of interested persons, in the same way as counsel could address them. He remembered the present Sir Robert Peel claiming that right in the case of the Birmingham Sewage Bill. On these grounds it would be seen that there would be no occasion, in the interests of the information of the Committee, for the presence, as a Member of the Committee, of a Member of the London County Council. The exceptions which he had referred to, in which the general rule had been departed from, were, to his mind, unfortunate precedents which the House would do well to avoid repeating. He would remind the House—without going, however remotely, into the merits or demerits of their legislation—that the London County Council had been in the past, and were at present, and were likely, probably, in the future, to be promoters of Bills containing a great deal of contentious matter, and that was an additional reason for insuring that the judicial proceeding of the House in regard to those Bills should be conducted in a manner which would be recognised both inside the House and outside as absolutely impartial. He hoped that on reconsideration the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury would see that it would add to the strength of the Committee, and afford it that opportunity for private consultation amongst its Members which it could not exercise if one who had a right to be present at its innermost counsels was a promoter of the Bill, if some other name were substituted for that of the hon. Member, who, if he were not a member of the London County Council, he (Mr. James Lowther) should be the last person to object to.

MR. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said, that if this were a personal matter he should not attempt to address the House upon it; but as it involved a question of principle, which was of great importance to the London County Council, he begged to be allowed to say a word or two. The short time he had been a Member of the House had enabled him to discover that they had two kinds of Committees—namely, a Select Committee, which was of a judicial character, and a Hybrid Committee, the Members of which were appointed by the House, for the purpose of adding Members who might be described as partizans. He was not present yesterday when the right hon. Member (Mr. James Lowther) referred to this matter; but he had read in The Times this morning that the right hon. Gentleman had said—

“It was the practice of Members who served on Select Committees to sign a declaration to the effect that neither individually nor through their constituents had they a personal stake in any Bill that came before them.”

He had read that paragraph with astonishment, because the right hon. Gentleman must have known, with his long Parliamentary experience, that Members of Hybrid Committees were not called on to sign such a declaration.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER said, he had drawn a distinction between a Hybrid Committee and a Select Committee.

*MR. BENN said, that if that were the case, he could not understand the right hon. Gentleman's statement, unless it had been to prejudice his (Mr. Benn's) case. As to precedents for the course which was now being taken, they were ample. The late Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works had always been put on Hybrid Committees considering Metropolitan Board Bills, and the London County Council had been ably represented on the Strand Improvement Bill and the Water Commission Bill by the hon. Member for St. Pancras. The House was not asked to do a new thing now, but merely to endorse a practice that prevailed in connection with all such business. This Bill had been referred to a Hybrid Committee at the request of the right hon. Gentleman and his friends. On the 26th April the hon. Baronet the Member for South Kensington (Sir Algernon Borthwick) had moved that the Bill be referred to the Committee on the London County Council (General Powers) Bill, in full view of the fact that he (Mr. Benn) served on that Committee. It was strange that the right hon. Gentleman opposite should now have changed front in such a remarkable manner. The right hon. Gentleman had said, according to The Times report—

“He did not object to the hon. Member on any personal grounds, but he maintained that his appointment on the Committee would take away from the spirit of judicial impartiality which was always associated with Committees of the House.”

He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to apply his microscope to the Benches on his own side. He was driven to make that remark because on the Committee referred to, as well as on previous Hybrid Committees, the hon. Member for Wandsworth had found a place, and he was none other than the Vice President of the Property Defence Association—an Association composed of such persons as the Duke of Norfolk, the Duke of Portland, and the Duke of Westminster.

*MR. KIMBER said, that the Society in question was not represented in any way before the Committee.

*MR. BENN said that, at any rate, the hon. Member was the Vice President of the Property Defence Association, and that body had issued a manifesto against the present Bill. He thought that what applied to the London County Council in this matter should also apply to this Society. He (Mr. Benn) did not ask the House to add his name, but in common fairness to follow the long list of precedents in regard to Hybrid Committees, and to add to the Committee the name of a Member of a Public Body directly interested in the success of the Bill.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, that if anything was wanting to induce him to support the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. James Lowther) it would be furnished by the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down. They had heard before of a man being a judge in his own cause, but here they had a man who was judge and counsel in his own cause. The hon. Member (Mr. Benn) was an old friend of his. He had known him long, and he was astonished that he should rise to say a word in the matter, seeing that he was personally interested. Precedents had been referred to, but it would be impossible to mention a more exaggerated case than that before the House. The hon. Gentleman was not merely a member of the London County Council, but had acted as the Whip of the Progressive Party on the Council for the past three years, and he had been a most efficient Whip, as he (Mr. Rentoul) could say from his own knowledge as a member of that Body. The hon. Member was about the most extreme member of the advanced or Progressive Party in the Council; therefore, if any name could be objectionable on this Committee, it was that of the hon. Member. It would manifestly be an unfair thing to put upon a Committee the person who might be described as the chief promoter of the Bill that Committee was appointed to consider.

*SIR J. MOWBRAY (Oxford University) said, that, as Chairman of the Committee of Selection, he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet, because the constant, if not invariable, practice had been for the House to nominate on these Committees two or more Members who had a personal interest in the question to be dealt with. It was the special duty of the Committee of Selection to select other Members who would form the impartial and judicial element, and although the Committee of Selection did not nominate the Chairman, they always placed on the Committee some hon. Member whose standing and position in the House was so recognised that he was generally chosen as Chairman.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire) said, he thought the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee of Selection constituted a full answer to the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet, who had opposed the nomination of the hon. Member for the St. George's Division of the Tower Hamlets on the ground that it was a departure from the ordinary practice. Instead of so being a departure, it was, undoubtedly, in accordance with the practice which had prevailed in the House as long as he could remember. Before the London County Council came into existence the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works was constantly appointed as a Member of those Committees; and that was by no means the first time that a member of the County Council had been appointed, and that, too, without objection being raised. When objection had been raised to a Member sitting on a Committee it had been on the ground that he was pecuniarily interested.

MR. J. LOWTHER: He or his constituents.

MR. MARJORIBANKS, continuing, said, that the hon. Member for the St. George's Division certainly was not pecuniarily interested in this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) seemed to have mixed up in his mind the cases of Hybrid, Private Bill, and Select Committees. That, he (Mr. Marjoribanks) would remind him, was a Select Committee, and the practice hitherto adopted in these cases had been to consider the appointments first in a judicial capacity, and then in a capacity for representing the various interests, so that Members might cross-examine the witnesses from the different points of view involved. If there was any doubt as to the impartiality of that section of the Committee which the House was now asked to appoint it would be the duty of the Committee of Selection to remedy the defect, and that they might be sure would be done. He certainly could not, under the circumstances, support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, and he would not withdraw the name of the hon. Member for St. George's Division.

MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.) said, there was a feeling in the London County Council, not confined to the moderate party, that members of that Body who happened at the same time to be Members of the House should not sit on the Committees. The hon. Member might not be pecuniarily interested in the Bill, but he was a prominent member of the London County Council—he was leader of the Progressive Party; and that Party, having thrown away the Coal and Wine Dues, were now at their wits' end to devise a scheme in order to make a purse. In the Bill under consideration the Progressive Party had inserted a clause which, if carried, would create an unequal tax; and he did submit that bearing in mind this peculiar character of the Bill, and the fact that the London County Council would be well represented before the Select Committee both by counsel and expert witnesses, the placing of the name of the hon. Member on the Committee would tend to convert what should be a Judicial Committee into a practically partizan tribunal. Its Report, under such circumstances, would carry with it less weight. Surely the Secretary to the Treasury would do well to withdraw this particular name, to substitute for it one equally strong from a Party point of view, but still the name of a Member not so obviously interested in the Bill to be considered.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said, that in the present case the matter had gone further than precedent; for when the Notice referring this Bill to the Select Committee was put upon the Paper an arrangement was made between the hon. Baronet the Member for South Kensington (Sir Algernon Borthwick) and the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) that, in order to avoid any difference of opinion, each should put down a Notice in identical terms. It was this very Notice they were now discussing. He might add that when, in 1890, a Hybrid Committee was appointed on the betterment question they had the high authority of the then President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) in placing upon it strong advocates of each side of the question.

*MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) said, he did not understand the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet to deny it had been the practice to place on Hybrid Committees persons interested in the Bill to be considered. What the right hon. Gentleman did argue was that the practice was bad in principle, and that it ought not to be extended by this House as now proposed. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Oxford University would see that, in consequence of the present balance of Parties in the House of Commons, the Government majority, on a Committee of nine, would only be one; and if that odd man happened to be a member of the London County Council, it was obvious that the conclusions of the Committee would be merely a registration of the foregone conclusions of the London County Council. If the name of the hon. Member was adopted he should ask that his own name be removed from the Committee.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.) said, that, as a London Member, he could not altogether agree with the position taken up on this matter by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet. It would be an unfortunate thing if the idea got abroad that any member of the London County Council, who, at the same time, was a Member of the House, was thereby disqualified from serving on a Committee. In former days the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, a salaried official, was put on every Committee which had to deal with the affairs of the Metropolis, and no great objection was raised to the practice, although the fact of his receiving a salary might have given rise to objection; but here the case was entirely different. The members of the London County Council received absolutely no pay, and if they had strong opinions they were the outcome of natural convictions. The people of London would consider it rather hard if membership of their County Council was to be deemed as a special disqualification for sitting on Parliamentary Committees, when no such disqualification attached to the membership of other corporate bodies. Of course, it would not be fair that only one side of the Council should be represented, but he understood that the Committee of Selection could put on four more Members, and they would probably put on the Committee one Member representing the other Party in the County Council. In any case he entered his protest against taking a direct line of policy which it would be difficult to defend in London, and which also pre-supposed that there would never be on the County Council any real, strong representation of moderate opinion. He hoped his hon. Friends would reflect upon the construction likely to be placed on their action.

*SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) said, he very much regretted that a new practice had been introduced that day. A proposed Member of a proposed Committee had defended himself that day, and another proposed Member of the Committee, without himself being attacked, had thought it right to get up and attack the other Member. This was very much to be regretted, and he hoped that it would not be repeated. Hon. Members were not nominated unless it was understood that they were willing to serve; and, therefore, the task of vindicating their nomination against any opposition that might be raised ought to be left in the hands of their friends. He held that what had occurred had been very undignified, and trusted that it would not be repeated.

*MR. KIMBER: As a matter of personal explanation, I should like to say I did not attack the hon. Member for the St. George's Division. I scarcely referred to him. I think the hon. Baronet could not have been in the House when I spoke.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID: I sat through the whole discussion. I can only say it is a matter greatly to be regretted, and I trust that in future these personal questions will be avoided.

*MR. KIMBER: I must ask that my name be not placed on the Committee.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I appeal to the hon. Member to withdraw his objection. I think the five Members have been very fairly struck.

*MR. KIMBER: I think that after the statement made by the hon. Baronet I am bound out of self-respect to withdraw. I have not the slightest objection to sit, and have always found the duty a pleasant one; but I do think it rather hard that the hon. Baronet should have designated my observations as an attack on a gentleman whose name I did not mention.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID: I hope the hon. Member will not imagine that I desired to attack him in his personal capacity. I have known him many years, and well know what an able man he is. I trust, therefore, that he will serve on the Committee.

*MR. J. LOWTHER: I understand, from what has passed this afternoon, that the appointment of partizans on either side is a practice which many hon. Members appear to regard with favour. Personally, I take a different view, and I entirely dissent from what my noble Friend (Lord R. Churchill) urged as regards the practice which ought to prevail; and although I think it is a very bad practice, yet if the House wishes to adopt it I ought not to stand in the way.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Brodie Hoare, Mr. Kimber, Mr. James Rowlands, and Mr. Snape nominated other Members of the Select Committee, with four to be added by the Committee of Selection.—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)

QUESTIONS.

SIR THOMAS BRADY.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any decision has yet been come to with respect to the pension of Sir Thomas Brady; and whether, having regard to the agreement of all sections of Irish opinion on the subject, the Treasury will hasten to relieve Sir Thomas Brady from his present position of uncertainty?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The matter referred to is one of considerable difficulty, and has for some time been under the consideration of the Treasury; but I hope that a decision will be very shortly arrived at.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: How soon?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I hope very shortly.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Have not other hon. Members refrained from putting questions on this matter so as not to embarrass the Treasury?

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.): In considering the matter will the Treasury bear in mind that all sections of the Irish Representatives are very anxious that this pension should be granted?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am well aware that all sections have joined in supporting it.

THE DECIMAL SYSTEM.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland why the teaching of the decimal system does not begin in the public schools of Scotland until the Sixth Standard is reached, by which time the great majority of the children have left school, while in England it is taught in the compulsory Standards?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): No general desire has been expressed in Scotland for the extension of the teaching of the decimal system, and the recent suggestion to that effect from the Decimal Association was not received until the Code for this year had been revised. We have advised the Association to communicate on the subject with the School Boards, and the matter will be further considered at the next revision of the Code, when we understand what the opinion of the representative Educational Bodies may be.

THE SOUTH WALES MAILS.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that residents in important towns on the main South Wales line of the Great Western Railway have, in order to be in time for the 8.30 London morning delivery, to post their letters at an earlier hour than residents in many English towns nearly double the mileage distance from the Metropolis; whether he is aware that about two years ago the then Postmaster General admitted the necessity of improved postal facilities for South Wales, and promised to consider the matter at the first favourable opportunity that presented itself; and whether any, and, if so, what steps are being taken to remedy the grave inconvenience under which the public in South Wales is suffering? I will also ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that letters from the South-West of England arriving at Bristol soon after 12 p.m. are forwarded in Gloucester, and do not reach Cardiff, a little over an hour from Bristol by the direct route, in time for the first morning delivery; and whether he will make arrangements for having these letters conveyed to Cardiff through the Severn Tunnel instead of round Gloucester?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): I am aware of the circumstances referred to by my hon. Friend in these two questions. The delays are due to the fact that there are no trains on the South Wales system of railways which would enable better postal arrangements to be made. The expense involved in providing special trains would be so serious that, although I am anxious to give effect to the wishes of the hon. Member, I do not see my way at the present time to press the subject on the Treasury.

MR. D. THOMAS: Is there no power to refer questions such as these to arbitration?

MR. A. MORLEY: I do not think the arbitration powers apply in such a case as this.

THE PROMOTION OF NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will sanction the relaxation of the last paragraph of Article 638, Royal Warrant, 1892, to admit non-commissioned officers who before 1st July, 1888, accepted and held appointments under Article 617, Royal Warrant, 1884, to the rank of quartermaster sergeant without necessarily obtaining a first-class certificate of education; and, if not, whether he will specially consider the cases of non-commissioned officers who have served 17 years and upwards?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The Article referred to applies only to non-commissioned officers serving as clerks, and it requires the possession of a first-class certificate of education as a qualification for promotion to the highest grade. I am advised that men in this position are useless unless well-educated; and that any relaxation of the Rule would be prejudicial to the Service. The Rule has been relaxed for four years, which has given ample time to non-commissioned officers who aspire to the rank of quartermaster sergeant to qualify for the position.

THE IRISH GENERAL POST OFFICE.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a scheme for the improvement of the salaries and status of certain officers in the surveying branch of the Irish General Post Office was forwarded to the Treasury in November last; and what delays a decision, and when it is likely to be arrived at?

MR. A. MORLEY: The matter is still under consideration by the Treasury, and no decision has yet been arrived at. With regard to the latter portion of the question, I must refer the hon. Member to the right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

ASSISTANT INSPECTORS OF SMALL ARMS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Infantry officers acting as Assistant Inspectors of Small Arms are qualified for promotion to Inspectorships, or whether these posts are reserved for Artillery officers; whether Lord Morley's Committee, while suggesting that the Inspectors should have passed through the Artillery College at Woolwich, proposed that the scope of the College should be widened so as to admit all officers who were candidates for scientific appointments; and whether facilities will be afforded to Infantry officers to enable them to qualify as Inspectors of their own arms?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : Infantry officers acting as Assistant Inspectors of small arms are eligible for promotion to Inspectorships. The Committee on the Manufacturing Departments, over which Lord Morley presided, did recommend that the Artillery College should be opened to officers of all arms who were candidates for scientific appointments. I find that no steps in the direction of that recommendation have yet been taken; but I will look into the matter.

GERMAN INFANTRY EQUIPMENT.

MR. HANBURY : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the War Office has any information as to the intended use of aluminium in the equipment of the German Infantry soldier, with the object of reducing the weight carried by him by nearly 12 lbs.; and whether any steps in this direction are being taken by his Department?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I am informed that the German Infantry soldier, when fully equipped, carries a weight of nearly 69 lbs. Proposals are said to be under consideration for reducing this weight by about 11 lbs.; but only 2 lbs. 4 oz. of that reduction is to be effected by using aluminium. The only articles of British Infantry equipment in which aluminium could be substituted for the present materials are the water bottle and the mess tin; and these together only weigh 2 lbs. 2 oz., so that no great saving in weight could be looked for. Experiments were made with aluminium in 1891; but the cost was held to be prohibitory.

THE WAREHOUSING CODE.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Book of Instructions known as the Warehousing Code, at present in use in the Customs and Excise Services, was issued to these Departments; how many of its paragraphs have been superseded or altered by General Orders since its issue; and when a revised issue will be supplied to those Services?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The Instructions referred to were issued on January 1, 1885. Many paragraphs have been superseded or altered since then. A revised edition is being prepared, and, it is hoped, will be supplied in the course of the present year.

THE STATE OF BELFAST.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen The Irish Catholic, 6th May, 1893, and noticed a leader in which it is stated that Belfast is now on its trial, but that provided it resumes and continues good behaviour no one will be desirous to resort to extreme punishment, but that it might become a duty to recommend to the Catholic people of Ireland a course of action which would test their prosperity in a manner they might not like; and whether he proposes to take any action concerning this threat to Belfast?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : I have read the article referred to by the hon. Gentleman. I do not see what action could be taken by the Government in this matter, or, indeed, that any action is called for.

MR. W. JOHNSTON : Does the right hon. Gentleman now see the reason why we do not wish to trust these people with the Government of Ireland?

MR. J. MORLEY : I see nothing in the article to shake my confidence in them.

Mr. A. Morley

FEMALE TELEGRAPHISTS AT DUBLIN.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, in view of the facts that there are eight female telegraph learners in the General Post Office, Dublin, qualified and doing regular clerk's duties, although not appointed, that all passed the competitive examination in 1891, and that three outsiders who were over age and did not compete were appointed, to the detriment of the others, will he explain why present vacancies are not filled by appointing those who entered the Service regularly; and will their appointments date as from last year, so that no injustice may be done them?

MR. A. MORLEY: The facts are not as stated in the question. The number of telegraph learners is only five, not eight; only one, not three, outsiders have been appointed; and when this appointment was made no one of the telegraph learners was qualified. At the present time there are no vacancies.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is now the general rate of allowance per diem to County and District Inspectors Royal Irish Constabulary for forage for each Cavalry and Transport horse, why is this allowance, like that for stable requisites and repairs of saddlery, not paid to the men in charge of the animals, seeing that the men purchase the forage themselves, who are at present often out of pocket for a month, and are in some instances obliged to take repayment by instalments from the officers who draw the full allowance monthly, and do any officers make a profit on the business; are County and District Inspectors, who draw a yearly allowance of £50 for a private horse and £46 for a servant, permitted to convert the outhouses of the barracks where they are located into stables and carhouses; has this practice, apart from the sanitary objection, the effect of depriving the men who pay the rent of any place to store their provisions, which to their loss must be bought daily in small quantities; do County and District Inspectors draw a yearly allowance as rent for an office in addition to the rent for a house when they convert a room in the barrack into an office; and what was the result of the agitation of the officers about a year ago for an increase in their stationery allowance, and did they then look for similar treatment for men in charge of stations?

MR. J. MORLEY: The allowance to the Royal Irish Constabulary for the forage of a troop horse is 1s. 8d. per diem, and of transport horses, and troop horses doing transport work, 2s. per day. The allowance could not, I am informed, be paid to the man in charge, inasmuch as the officer is held responsible for the provision of forage of the best quality. When forage is exceptionally cheap the horses may possibly be fed for less than the above rates; but, on the other hand, the Inspector General has invariably refused frequent applications for increase of the allowance when the cost of forage was exceptionally high. The Inspector General informs me that, in taking houses for barracks, great attention is given to sanitary matters and the conveniences of the men to be stationed therein; he has no reason to think that any encroachment or failure in these respects has occurred, as implied in the question; but if any instance of the kind is brought under his notice, or any case in which an officer has failed to pay for the forage of the horses in his charge—which would be a distinct breach of the Regulations—such cases will be promptly dealt with. County Inspectors receive an office allowance of 1s. per day, which provides for cleaning, fuel, and light, and also for the wear and tear of any office furniture, such furniture not being supplied by the public, but by the officer out of his own pocket. It is considered desirable that, as far as possible, offices should be placed in barracks, and the Regulations require that a barrack at a district headquarters should have a suitable office for the District Officer. In the very few cases, however, where this cannot be done, and the District Inspector is obliged to convert a room in his house into an office for the transaction of public business, he is allowed £10 per annum. The stationery allowance of County Inspectors was increased from £8 to £10, and that of District Inspectors from £2 to £3 per annum, in December, 1890. When applying for the increase these officers were not, I am told, in a position to make any application of the nature suggested; indeed, a strong point in their application was that the allowance to sergeants in charge of stations had been doubled, while they (the officers) had received no increase.

MEMBERS AND GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

MR. STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) : I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the statement made by the hon. Member for Wednesbury, in a speech delivered at a Primrose League meeting held at Wednesbury on 27th of April, that he (the hon. Member for Wednesbury) had had the privilege of doing something directly for the borough by influencing for a large firm an order from the Admiralty which would extend over five years; and whether he can give particulars of the contract referred to, and the grounds on which it was allotted in the manner described?

MR. WILSON LLOYD (Wednesbury) : Before the question is put—I do not know what the motive is, but I presume it is personal to me, and suggests that I did something that was wrong—I should like to explain that I certainly used all the influence possible to induce an Admiralty order being placed at Wednesbury; but I did not suppose that the influence of so humble an individual as myself would weigh with the Admiralty, although, as the order did go to Wednesbury, my constituents naturally think otherwise. But I do desire to repudiate altogether the suggestion that I used any improper influence; and, indeed, I do not for one moment think that the Admiralty would have been susceptible to any improper influence. I only did what I was strictly justified in doing.

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee) : The hon. Member for Wednesbury addressed a letter to the Director of Admiralty Contracts, in November last, requesting that favourable consideration might be given to a firm at Wednesbury who had tendered to supply chain cables for the Navy. Following the usual practice, the lowest tenders were accepted; and as that sent on by the firm alluded to was a tie with that of another firm, and these two were lower than the tenders of the other competing firms, the orders were divided between the two. The letter from the hon.

Member had not the slightest effect in determining the acceptance of the tender.

FREE EDUCATION AT BIRKENHEAD.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that a leaflet which has been extensively distributed to parents of children being educated at St. Peter's School, Birkenhead, in which parents desiring perfectly free education for their children are recommended to copy out and sign an application to be forwarded to the Vice President, stating that they desire and cannot get schooling without fees; whether he has in consequence received any complaint as to the absence of free education at St. Peter's School; and whether he is aware that, as a matter of fact, free education is given at St. Peter's School to the children of all parents who ask for it, and that 400 children are being educated free there now; and, if so, whether he will take steps to put a stop to the circulation of such leaflets, as being calculated to injure the voluntary schools?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) : I have not seen the leaflet to which the hon. Member refers. The Department have recently received a large number of applications for free education from parents in Birkenhead, and have, in pursuance of their duty under the Act, made a very careful inquiry into the number of free school places available in the district. It appeared that, at the time of this inquiry, St. Peter's National School provided 346 free places, of which, however, only 40 were for older children, the remainder being for infants. I have neither the wish nor the power to put a stop to the circulation of any documents informing parents of their rights under the Act, nor do I suppose that it was the intention of Parliament, in passing the Act, that its provisions should be concealed from the persons whom it was meant to benefit.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN : Arising out of the question, may I ask if the right hon. Gentleman does not consider it his duty to stop the circulation of a leaflet which distinctly says that free schooling is not provided in voluntary schools, when, as a matter of fact, any parent can get it for his children if he only asks?

MR. ACLAND: Judging from what appears in the question as to the contents of a leaflet which I have not seen, I can only say I see no objection to it.

SEAMEN AND THE EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

MR. HARRY FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the expression "seaman" in Clause 6, Sub-section D, and in Clause 7, Sub-section 2, of the Employers' Liability Bill, is intended by the Government to include members of a crew of a fishing vessel, where such members are not part owners, but are joint adventurers with the owners, receiving no weekly wages, but being entirely dependent upon the risks of the adventure for their share of the profits; whether the expression "ship," in Clause 7, Sub-section 2, of the said Bill is intended by the Government to include sailing vessels engaged in the fishing trade, where such vessels also carry oars; and whether he is prepared to accept Amendments to the said Bill, making it quite clear that the expressions "seaman" and "ships," respectively, are not so intended to apply?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): The term "seaman" in the Employers' Liability Bill is unqualified, but the language of Clause 1 would only be applicable to such seamen as are in the service of an employer, and not to seamen who are co-partners in a fishing adventure. The answer to the second paragraph is "Yes," and with regard to the third, so far as I can judge, no Amendment is necessary in this respect, but I can express no opinion until I have seen the words in which a proposed Amendment is embodied.

THE INDIAN TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India with regard to his recent statement that the number of officers of the Indian Telegraph Department had been raised to 86, and that for exceptional reasons the number of the staff had fallen to 76, but steps are now being taken to raise them to 86, whether the Secretary of State is aware that in the last three years five officers have died and 21 have retired; whether these retirements occurred under the special provisions made in 1887, and were foreseen and provided for; and, if so, how; whether it is true that, out of a sanctioned strength of 84, there are only 74 officers in the Service, and of this number 16 or 17 are either absent on leave or about to take leave; that in three years six officers have joined from Cooper's Hill, three others have been transferred from the Indo-European Telegraph Department, and three upper subordinates have been promoted, while only two officers are now under provision from Cooper's Hill; whether, owing to the increase of work in the Department, the Government of India, before the hot season has set in, has intimated that no more leave can be granted; and whether it has been represented to the Secretary of State that there is danger of a breakdown among the officers owing to the extra work imposed on them?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): The number of deaths, according to the latest information, is six; of retirements, 19. The retirements were provided for in the reorganisation scheme of 1887, the annual number of appointments from Cooper's Hill being raised from two to three. The strength of the Department is 74 at present, of whom 11 are known to be on leave. The facts are correctly stated by the hon. Member except that, with the view of bringing the staff up to its full strength, the annual recruitment both in this country (as already mentioned) and in India has been increased. It has been necessary to refuse leave to officers of the Department; and to relieve the tension we are appointing five temporary officers from this country. The answer to the last question is, "No"; but the necessity of recruiting up to the full strength of the Department as soon as possible has been urged by the Government of India and is fully recognised by the Secretary of State.

COMPANY LAW.

MR. S. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid) : In the absence of the hon. and learned Member for West Cavan, I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a pamphlet by Mr. Bouchier F. Hawksley and another, on "Companies limited by guarantee without nominal capital," and showing the advantages of such companies from the point of view of the promoter, inasmuch as, according to the statement of the authors,

"The shares may be issued at a discount, the promoters may themselves be Directors, and sell their property to the company without the interposition of an independent and intelligent judgment of the transaction," without fully disclosing material facts, and the promoters and Directors avoid action for misfeasance if the sale be at an extravagant price ; whether, having regard to the recent dicta of Mr. Justice Hawkins, any extension of the privileges of promoters is considered desirable by the Government ; how many applications have within the past year been made to the Registrar of Companies for the registration of Trading Companies limited by guarantee without nominal capital, and what were the names of the proposed companies ; what was the action of the Registrar with regard to those applications ; and whether he will undertake that the Board of Trade will not allow any such company to be registered unless the Registrar should be compelled to register it by judicial decision ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) : My attention has been called to the pamphlet mentioned by the hon. Member. Twelve applications of the nature referred to have been made to the Registrar : Five of such companies have been registered, and the other seven applications have been refused upon instructions from the Board of Trade given on the advice of counsel. Legal proceedings against the Registrar in the case of one of the companies refused are now in progress ; and, pending those proceedings, I think it better to express no opinion as to the future.

BUTTER RATES FROM ENNIS TO CORK.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company are charging 4d. per firkin more than last year for single firkins sent from Ennis to Cork and intervening stations ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I am informed by the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company that they have a large number of consignments of single firkins of butter by passenger train, and that the rates have not been advanced ; they remain as they were in 1892. The hon. Member has been good enough to send me a delivery note ; but it was a note of the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, and not of the Waterford and Limerick, and I am in communication with that company on the subject.

THE LONDON EQUALISATION OF RATES BILL.

MR. BOULNOIS : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the London Equalisation of Rates Bill will be printed ; and whether a full opportunity will be given before the Second Reading is taken for the Metropolitan Authorities to consider it ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) : I hope that the Bill will be circulated before Whitsuntide ; perhaps by next Tuesday.

MARLBOROUGH STREET POLICE COURT.

MR. BOULNOIS : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is any foundation for the statement that, in consequence of two new Police Courts being required for the Metropolis, the Marlborough Street Court, now extensively used for that part of London, is to be abolished ?

MR. ASQUITH : I answered this question some time ago. There is no present intention of abolishing Marlborough Street Police Court ?

THE HOME RULE BILL AND THE IRISH CHURCH FUND.

MR. AIRD (Paddington, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the amount of the Church property in Ireland which it is proposed in Clause 15 of the Government of Ireland Bill to give over to the control of the Irish Government ?

MR. J. MORLEY: Investigations made in 1890 have shown that there is a sufficient margin left between the charge on the Irish Church Temporalities Fund and the income to afford a good security for its liabilities. But it is not practicable to form an estimate of the capital value of the unappropriated residue, inasmuch as the annual income of the fund alters from year to year from causes beyond the control of the Government, such as the redemption of annual charges by means of capital sums paid to the fund by those liable for payment, and similarly by the conversion of perpetual income into Terminable Annuities. A full description of the property of the fund will be found in the Report of the Irish Church Temporalities Commission for 1880 (C. 2,773 of 1880), and the charges upon the fund appear in House of Commons Paper, No. 130 of 1890, in regard to which the only appreciable change which has since arisen is in the first item, "The Church Loan," which has been reduced by about £750,000.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): Do I understand the Chief Secretary to say that, in the opinion of the Treasury, there is an available surplus in the fund, which would be a sufficient margin upon which to make further advances?

MR. J. MORLEY: That is not what I said. There is margin enough to meet outstanding liabilities. As to further advances, the answer might be different.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman lay on the Table a Return of the receipts and charges on the fund at the present moment?

MR. J. MORLEY: I will inquire if that can be done.

TRIAL BY JURY IN ASSAM.

MR. PAUL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the notification of last October limiting the right of trial by jury in Assam has been withdrawn?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The Secretary of State has been in communication with the Viceroy on this subject, and has ascertained that the Chief Commissioner of Assam has been instructed to withdraw the notification to which my hon. Friend refers.

PROMOTION IN THE CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. THEOBALD (Essex, Romford): I beg to ask the Postmaster General why a clerk named Dunford, employed in the Central Telegraph Office, was recently promoted over the heads of upwards of 400 of his colleagues, who were senior in date of appointment by, from one to eight years; and whether he is aware that this is the second time that Dunford has been promoted over the heads of others of longer service?

MR. A. MORLEY: Mr. Dunford, in 1887, was selected by the Controller for special duties in the Controller's Office. The office in question has no separate classification; but the Controller selects from the general body of officers the best man he can find. In 1887 candidates were invited to offer themselves, and of these Mr. Dunford was selected as the most promising, and after two years' service in the Controller's Office was promoted to the first class. Last year the man standing immediately above Mr. Dunford in the Controller's Office retired on a pension; and Mr. Dunford, who stood next to him, was promoted in his room. On the general classification, Mr. Dunford's rotation number, counting from the top of his class, was not 400, but 283. It will be seen that Mr. Dunford's promotion in 1889, no less than in 1892, arose out of his selection for the Controller's Office, and this selection was determined by his superior qualifications.

CIVIL SERVANTS AND LEISURE HOURS.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether civil, military, and naval officials are allowed to use their leisure in working Co-operative Stores, and the said stores are permitted a lighter system of Income Tax Returns than that accorded to ordinary business firms; and whether the Government intend to propose a measure which will prevent officials, paid by the State, from taking part in the management of such Societies?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Co-operative Stores, like those known as Army and Navy and Civil Service Stores, are not treated more favourably in the matter of Income Tax than ordinary business firms. With regard to the remainder of the question, so far as it affects the Civil Service, I can only say that I am not prepared to recommend an alteration of the existing Rule on the subject, which I quoted on Monday from the Orders in Council relating to the Civil Service. I cannot answer for the Military and Naval Services.

MR. FIELD: Will the Government have any objection to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the whole question, which is one of vast importance to the commercial community?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The matter has been fully considered by the Ridley Commission, and the late Government upon their Report came to the conclusion that it would not be desirable to interfere with the actions of Civil servants after office hours were over.

NORTON CANES SCHOOL.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education what steps the Department have decided to take with reference to the opening of a new school at Norton Canes, Staffordshire; whether they have made inquiry into the circumstances under which the sanction of the School Board was represented to them as having been obtained, and has now been formally withdrawn; and what inquiries as to the legality of this alleged sanction by the School Board were made before the Department itself consented to recognise this school as one entitled to receive an annual grant?

MR. ACLAND: The Norton-under-Cannock School Board wrote to the Department on the 19th April, stating that, at a meeting on the 17th, they had rescinded their previous resolution agreeing to the proposed school being put on the Annual Grant List by the Department. They have been informed that the Department cannot, on that account, withdraw from their undertaking to allow annual grants to the new school. There was nothing in the terms of the Board's original resolution which called for any inquiry by the Department, and the Board do not allege that it was passed in an irregular way.

MR. HANBURY: Is it not the fact that the information sent to the School Board was given solely on the authority of the Chairman, and that the resolution passed in consequence was revoked? Is nothing to be done?

MR. ACLAND replied, that if any evidence of illegality were forthcoming it would be carefully considered.

BANGOR COLLEGE.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the University College of Bangor is subsidised out of moneys voted by Parliament; and, if so, what is the amount of the annual grant; and whether he can inform the House what Ministerial Department is responsible for the Vote, and to whose account the grant, if approved by Parliament, is paid?

MR. ACLAND: The Estimates for each year since 1884-5 have included a Vote of £4,000 to the University College of North Wales, Bangor, which will be found under Class IV., Head 7 (Universities and Colleges, Great Britain). The Treasury is the accounting Department for the Vote which includes this item, and pays it quarterly to the treasurer of the College. But the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education is the Minister who, as representing the Government in this House on educational matters, would defend the Vote or give explanations with regard to it.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: May I ask if any Report will be laid before this House to show that the funds are properly administered, before the Vote is asked for?

MR. ACLAND: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will put that question on the Paper.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT AT THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works what was the cause of the temporary failure of the electric light on Monday night last; and whether the failure was the result of any defect of the apparatus within the precincts of the House, or whether it was due to any default on the part of the company which supplies the light?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): The temporary failure of the electric light in some parts of the House on Monday last occurred in the case only of those lights supplied by the Westminster Electric Supply Company, and not in those connected with engines in the House. The failure was due to the melting by the electric current of one of the main safety fuses at the junction of the company's main cables with a main in the building. The current does not appear to have been abnormally strong. The fuse, therefore, which was originally supplied by the company must either have been originally too weak, or have been weakened by use. It is now proposed to replace it by one with a greater fusing margin.

TELEGRAPH MESSENGERS' DRILL.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the telegraph messenger boys are already drilled with the Martini carbine; and if he will state definitely when the Artillery Volunteers will be supplied with that arm?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It has been already stated that 23 corps of Artillery Volunteers have been supplied with Martini carbines, and that it is hoped that the remainder of the Force will be so supplied by the end of the present financial year. The arms which have been issued to the telegraph boys for the mere purpose of drill are unserviceable weapons, which cannot be fired, and which are not fit for either conversion or repair.

MAJOR RASCH: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Enfield with which the troops are armed was obsolete in the days of Mr. Cardwell?

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): May I ask when these weapons were first supplied to boy messengers in the Telegraph Service; and whether the Post Office Authorities consider skill in the use of rifles as an essential part of the physical training which the present Postmaster General described as so beneficial to the boy messengers?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: If my hon. Friend had heard my answer he would have learnt that the weapons issued to these boys are unserviceable weapons, which cannot be fired. If any further particulars are desired my hon. Friend must put a Notice upon the Paper.

EDUCATIONAL STATISTICS.

MR. BARTLEY: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he can state the number of children in England and Wales of school ages (i.e., between 5 and 14) who were estimated on the 31st August, 1892, to be of the class usually found in elementary schools; how many of these were on the school registers on that day, and the increase since the adoption of free education; and whether he can supply a Return similar to that at the bottom of pages 8 and 9 of Return C. 6,984, lately presented to both Houses of Parliament, showing the increase in the number and percentage of scholars on the school registers at the different ages since the introduction of free education?

MR. ACLAND: With regard to the hon. Member's first question, I cannot give any other information than that which is to be found on page 41 of the Return C. 6,984. The estimated number of children between 5 and 15 of the class usually found in public elementary schools at the middle of 1892 is there put down as 5,750,146. It is impossible to say how many scholars were on the school registers on any particular day, because the Returns are made up at the end of the school year for each school. The Returns for the schools inspected during the year ended 31st August, 1892, show that there were 4,489,041 scholars over five years of age on the registers, being an increase during the year of 126,913. If 50,000 of this is taken as due to normal increase of population, it may be assumed that the effect of the Free Education Act had then been to bring between 70,000 and 80,000 children of school age on to the school registers. I shall be happy to supply a Return which will practically give the information as to increase in number and percentage of scholars which the hon. Member desires.

MR. BARTLEY: Do I understand that Papers will be laid on the Table without further inquiry?

MR. ACLAND: If the hon. Member will move for them they will be granted.

THE LEE-METFORD RIFLE.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many cartridges, loaded with cordite powder and nickel covered bullets, can be fired from the Metford regulation .303 barrel, before the same becomes worn and unfit for accurate shooting?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : From experience in the proof of ammunition the number of rounds which may be fired before the rifle becomes unfit for accurate shooting appears to be about 3,000.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) : Did I rightly understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the rifle is worn out after firing 3,000 rounds. Is that at all a satisfactory condition of affairs?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I did not say it was then worn out. I said it became unfit for accurate shooting. If the hon. Gentleman wishes for further information will he put a question on the Paper?

MR. ORMOND'S APPOINTMENT.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Bauffshire) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Secretary of State for India has been drawn to the Memorial of the Indian Association against Mr. E. W. Ormond's appointment to act as Second Judge of the Small Cause Court at Calcutta (an office carrying a salary of Rs.1,400 a month), and to an article giving in detail the facts of the case, both appearing in the May number of India; will he state what were Mr. Ormond's judicial experience and qualifications which induced the Indian Government to appoint him Second Judge of the Small Cause Court, in which position he will have power to review the decisions of Mr. K. M. Chatterjee, the present acting Third Judge, in all cases not exceeding Rs.500; and whether, in view of the fact that the number of Indian litigants is in excess of European litigants, and that one of the first two Judges is a European, he will consider the desirability, in the interests of Indian suitors, of appointing an Indian as the other Judge?

*MR. GEORGE RUSSELL : The Secretary of State has not seen the article mentioned in the question; he has, however, seen a Memorial, which is, no doubt, the one referred to, presented by the Indian Association to the Governor General in Council, who saw no reason to interfere with the discretion exercised by the Lieutenant Governor in appointing Mr. Ormond. The salary of Mr. Ormond as officiating Second Judge is Rs.700 a month. Before appointing Mr. Ormond, the Lieutenant Governor considered the claims of several barristers who were eligible for the post, and eventually selected that gentleman, who is a barrister of six years' standing and was believed to be in all respects well fitted for the duties of the office. As regards the rest of the question, there is nothing to add to the replies already given (on the 10th and 14th of April) to my hon. Friend, except that it is not the case that the Second Judge of the Court, sitting alone, can review the decisions of the Third Judge. The practice is that applications for a new trial or to set aside a decree are heard before at least two Judges, one of them being the Judge who tried the case, and the other, ordinarily, the Chief Judge. At the present time, out of six Judges (including the Registrar of the Court, who disposes of many small cases under Rs.10), four are natives of India; and, in the circumstances, the Secretary of State does not intend to interfere with the discretion which the law gives to the Lieutenant Governor in this matter.

*SIR W. WEDDERBURN : Arising out of the question, may I ask whether it is not the duty of the Secretary of State to make inquiries into any complaints that may be made as to race partiality on the part of a Government in India making appointments to judicial offices, and, if necessary, to redress grievances if they should be proved to exist?

MR. W. A. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) : Is it not the case that the act of superseding Mr. Chatterjee is viewed very unfavourably by all interested in India who are capable of judging Mr. Chatterjee's merits?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL : I have only to say that the conduct of the Lieutenant Governor in this case cannot reasonably be now taken into consideration. It is not for me, in dealing with this particular case, to pass any judgment upon him. As I have already said, in the present instance no case has been made out for the interference of the Secretary of State.

*SIR W. WEDDERBURN : I beg to give Notice that I shall, on the Indian Budget, call attention to the failure of the Secretary of State to give effect to the Queen's Proclamation, which enjoins strict impartiality as regards race, caste, and creed.

THE AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture why "the wide prevalence of agricultural distress" referred to in the Queen's Speech has as yet received no consideration at the hands of Her Majesty's Government, and if, having regard to the long-continued drought, the absence of food for horses, cattle, and sheep, the depreciation of stock, and the prospect of a hay famine, no remedial or palliative measures are to be proposed; and why two months of legislative time have been allowed to elapse before the appointment of the Select Committee promised on the 16th of March last, to consider the desirability of enabling the public to detect imposition and to distinguish between British and Irish products and those of foreign countries by requiring the latter to bear a mark of their foreign origin?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): It is not the case that the existing depression in agriculture has received no consideration at our hands. On the contrary, we have been only too glad to investigate the numerous proposals which have reached us on the subject; and in this connection we regret that we have not had the assistance of the Committee which we proposed to appoint, and in regard to which Notices still stand in the names of hon. Gentlemen opposite. With reference to the particular circumstances of the present moment to which the hon. Member refers, I should hope that the existing apprehensions in some districts owing to the absence of rain may yet be removed, and it is obvious that the possibilities of any Government action are but very small when difficulties are due to exceptional climatic conditions. With regard to the second paragraph of the question, it is scarcely for me to explain here the proceedings which have taken place in connection with the appointment of the Committee to which the hon. Member refers; but I understood that Reference have been the subject of constant communication amongst those concerned since its appointment was promised, and, as the hon. Member is aware, it has now been definitely appointed.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): May I ask whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture has been called to the highly successful experiments in rain-making which have been carried out in certain parts of America; and whether he thinks it his duty to take any steps with a view to putting an end to the long-continued drought in this country by the adoption of the American method?

MR. GARDNER: The subject has been brought to my attention, but I am informed that the experiments tried in the United States last year were not a success, and that the American Government are not granting any more money for the purpose. If the hon. Member or any other hon. Gentleman interested in agriculture would like personally to make some private experiments in the direction indicated I shall watch them with great interest.

*MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask, in connection with the appointment of a Select Committee, whether any communication has reached the right hon. Gentleman to the effect that many Members of the Opposition, although not believing in the adequacy of the Select Committee, would very much prefer the appointment of such a Committee to nothing being done at all; and that if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to narrow the scope of the proposed Reference hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House would use their influence with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford (Mr. Chaplin) to induce him to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. GARDNER: If the hon. Gentlemen opposite, referred to in the question, are able to prevail on their friends to withdraw their opposition to the appointment of a Select Committee, the Government will be glad to consider any suggestions that may be made as to the scope of the Reference.

*MR. BROOKFIELD : Has the right hon. Gentleman given any consideration to the Amendment in my name on the Paper with regard to this particular point?

[No answer was given.]

THE CONVICTION OF JOHN HUNTER.

SIR THOMAS LEA (Londonderry, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to the case of a farmer named John Hunter, who was sentenced at Magherafelt Petty Sessions, on 26th April, for assaulting a constable during the recent Ballyronan disturbance, to a month's imprisonment, and convicted upon the constable's sole evidence, without any corroboration, the Magistrate refusing leave to appeal ; whether he is aware that Hunter's solicitor wished to call witnesses, who, he alleged, could have proved conclusively that Hunter was not there at the time of the alleged assault, but the Magistrate did not hear them, and that affidavits of defendant's innocence have been sent through the solicitor to the Lord Lieutenant, and the names of two sureties willing to enter bail for £1,000 that defendant would appear at any time to take his trial again if liberated now ; and whether any, and what, reply has been returned to this application?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : Is it not a fact that the hon. Baronet and his Colleagues of the last Government invariably voted against giving a right of appeal in all these cases?

MR. J. MORLEY : I cannot say that without notice. Hunter, I am informed, was sentenced to one month's imprisonment for deliberately and without provocation assaulting a policeman ; no witnesses were called for the defence, although the defendant had been summoned a week prior to his conviction, and had, therefore, ample time to produce any witnesses he pleased. The decision of the Magistrates in this case was unanimous, and it is true that they decline to accede to the request of defendant's solicitor to increase the sentence with a view to an appeal. The Lord Lieutenant has had before him the Memorial with affidavits on behalf of Hunter, and has decided that the law must take its course. This decision was communicated to Hunter and his solicitor on the 4th instant.

MR. SEXTON : What is the meaning of the suggestion in the question that a man who has been convicted should have a right to another trial if liberated now?

MR. J. MORLEY : That is a matter which perplexes me.

BRUTAL OUTRAGE AT TULLA.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a horse belonging to Mrs. Perry, of Fomerla, Tulla, the widow of Mr. Perry, who was murdered under circumstances of great brutality near Tulla, has been maliciously stabbed ; and whether any motive has been assigned for the outrage?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am informed that a horse belonging to Mrs. Perry, whose husband was murdered as stated in January, 1892, was maliciously stabbed between the 28th and 30th of April last, by some person at present unknown. The only assignable motive for this latter outrage is the recent dismissal of a man in Mrs. Perry's employment.

HEAD TEACHERS FOR VILLAGE SCHOOLS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Council on Education whether he has received many complaints from agricultural districts as to the difficulty of finding head teachers for small village schools, even though increased salaries have been offered ; if he has any information to show whether the difficulty is largely owing to the fact that pupil teachers who have passed the Queen's Scholarship and have obtained a second class are no longer permitted to take charge of schools where the average attendance does not exceed 60 ; and whether he proposes to take any steps to meet the difficulty?

MR. ACLAND : I am not aware that many complaints have been received in the Department of the kind stated. But I will make inquiries, and if I find that the difficulty is really serious I will endeavour to take steps to meet it.

DOMINICA.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state the decision at which the Colonial Office has arrived in respect of the inquiry asked for by the elected Representatives of Dominica into circumstances of the recent shooting of the people at La Plaine; and whether an inquiry will be granted into the administration of the public loans, the taxation, expenditure, and general conduct of the Government of Dominica?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The Secretary of State has given his most careful attention to the late lamentable occurrences in Dominica. So far as we are already in possession of the facts of the case, there seems to be no necessity for instituting a special inquiry into these events. But the Governor has been called upon to furnish a full Report on the statements contained in the Memorial of the elected Members; and, further, he has been instructed to report fully and carefully on the grievances complained of by the people of La Plaine, so that action may be at once taken to remedy, where possible, any injustice or disability from which the people may be suffering.

MR. TUIITE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any official Report has been received at the Colonial Office from the Governor of Dominica with reference to the recent fatal riots at La Plaine; whether the Governor of the Island and the Chief Magistrate, Mr. Le Hunte, were present when the police fired on the people, killing four persons and wounding two others; whether Mr. Le Hunte, who was in command of the police on the occasion, afterwards presided at the inquest on the victims; and, if so, what action will be taken with regard to that official; can he state the nature of the document which Sir W. Haines Smith and Mr. Le Hunte asked the man Collard to sign; and whether an inquiry will be instituted into the conduct of Sir W. Haines Smith and Mr. Le Hunte, and the circumstances which led to the disturbances?

MR. S. BUXTON: The answer to the first question is, yes. As regards the second question, the Governor and Mr. Le Hunte were present when the firing took place. The police fired without orders, but under extreme provocation, and the Governor at once gave orders to cease firing. Mr. Le Hunte was not in command of the police on this occasion. He presided at the inquest as Coroner of the district. As regards the fourth question, the Governor offered to allow Pierre Colar to resume possession of his house, from which he had been ejected, if he would give an undertaking to pay the amount he owed for taxes and costs at some future time, if he were able and were called upon to do so. On his refusal, the police proceeded to carry out the process. As regards the last question, I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I have just given to the hon. Member for West Kerry.

SHIPPING LIGHT DUES.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in the year ending 31st March, 1892, the sum of £518,241 18s. 11d. was received from light dues from shipping, that in addition thereto there was received the sums of £3,460 1s. 9d. and of £111 16s. 5d. or £3,571 18s. 2d. in all from unclaimed wages of deceased and living seamen, and the sum of £1,087 16s. 7d. for unclaimed wreck and salvage; whether, in all, there was received in the said year a total sum of over £522,000 directly derived from ships and sailors which was credited to the Mercantile Marine Fund; whether payments amounting to 142,543 5s. 11d. were made out of that Fund, not for the maintenance of lights, buoys, and beacons, but for salaries and expenses of Mercantile Marine Offices and Surveys; and whether it is proposed by Her Majesty's Government to continue to direct funds derived directly from ships and sailors to purposes not for their immediate benefit?

MR. MUNDELLA: The figures quoted by the hon. Member are given in the published account of the Mercantile Marine Fund for the year ending March 31, 1892, to which must be added a grant of £40,000 made by Parliament. The salaries and expenses of the Mercantile Marine Offices and Surveys are charged to the Fund in pursuance of Act of Parliament; and I cannot agree with the suggestion of the hon. Member that ships and sailors derive no immediate benefit from the expenditure.

THE TRANSIT OF LIVE STOCK.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill to amend the law with respect to the liability of carrying companies to compensate the owners of live stock for injuries inflicted during transit and losses accruing from unwarrantable delay; and whether the proposed Board of Arbitration shall have the power to assess and levy the amount of damage caused by bruises, or deterioration arising from the want of proper accommodation or from the negligence of such companies or their officials?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am advised that, under the Act of 1854, every Railway Company is liable for loss or injury to horses and cattle occasioned by neglect or default. A company must also deliver within a reasonable time. I do not know to what proposed Board of Arbitration the hon. Member refers.

MR. FIELD: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the fact that we can never get a decision as to what a reasonable time is?

MR. MUNDELLA: That is a question for the Courts to decide, having regard to the facts of each particular case.

OVERCROWDING THE DIVISION LOBBIES.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware of the great discomfort suffered by Members of this House from the insufficient ventilation of the Division Lobbies; and whether, to remedy this, he will cause either open gratings or swing windows to be placed over the doors in the Lobbies, instead of the present arrangement by which all fresh air is excluded?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I fear that occasionally when any large numbers of Members vote in the same Lobby there is discomfort from the want of fresh air as well as from overcrowding. The ventilation officers endeavour to meet this as far as possible by supplying an additional quantity of air; but, as this is not always a sufficient remedy, I have directed the attendants, when very large numbers of voters are expected, to open the windows before the Lobbies are cleared for Divisions. The framework over the doors in the Lobbies is already entirely open and has been so for some years past.

THE FACTORY ACT IN INDIA.

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if the Government intend to send a Factory Inspector to India to report on the working of the Factory Act in that country; and, if so, will he print and circulate a copy of the Instructions to be given to the Inspector?

*MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: There are Factory Inspectors already at work in India under the orders of the Government, and we are now awaiting their Reports for last year. The Secretary of State will ask the Government of India to append to their Reports copies of any General Instructions issued by them, or by Local Governments, for the guidance of Factory or Mine Inspectors. We are now sending out an Inspector to inquire into the working of the mines.

MR. PROVAND: Will a copy of the Instructions be printed and laid before the House?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: Yes, Sir.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): Will the special attention of the Inspector be called to the continued employment of women in underground mines?

*MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: Yes, Sir. That is one of the chief objects in sending out the Inspector. He is specially directed to inquire into that.

THE PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will explain on what grounds the chief clerk in the Paymaster General's Office, who was retired on 1st January 1892, under the provisions of Clause 10 of the Order in Council of 15th August, 1890, as being over 70 years of age, was nevertheless employed and paid the difference between full pay and pension up to 30th June, 1892; and who is responsible for this contravention of the Order in Council?

Mr. Mundella

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The late chief clerk in the Paymaster General's Office was, after the award of his pension, employed in a temporary capacity for the convenience of the Public Service pending final arrangements for the superintendence of the Department. The temporary service did not count for pension, and there was no contravention of the Order in Council.

THE MINES (EIGHT HOURS) BILL.

MR. WOODS (Lancashire, Ince): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, with a view of facilitating the passing of the Mines (Eight Hours) Bill into law this Session, it having passed its Second Reading on 3rd May by a large majority, he will give to the promoters of the Bill reasonable opportunities for relegating the Bill to the Grand Committee on Law?

MR. DAVID THOMAS: At the same time I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there is any precedent for referring to the Grand Committee on Law a private Member's Bill of so highly controversial and exceptional a character as the Mines (Eight Hours) Bill?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): There are many reasons why it would be desirable, if we could, to find further opportunities for the discussion upon this Bill; but with respect to the particular mode of procedure suggested—though I can quite understand the reasons for the suggestion—there are, I am afraid, great objections. I doubt very much whether the Bill could be referred to a Grand Committee without much debate; and I doubt whether, when it came out of Grand Committee, there would not be a disposition to discuss over again the matter there decided. This is a solid ground of objection, because I think it must be admitted that when there is so considerable a minority opposed to a Bill—and opposed to it, not upon casual and secondary grounds, but upon matters of principle and substance in the Bill—it would hardly be in accordance with the understanding on which Grand Committees were established that we should refer such Bills to a Grand Committee.

MR. TOMLINSON: May I inquire whether the Government intend to propose any Amendments; and, if so, when they will be placed upon the Paper?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Government has not taken part as a Government in the question, and until there is some opportunity of further progress with the Bill, I do not think it is very likely the Government will put down any Amendments.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): Will the Government give an opportunity for the Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not in a position to give any promise on that subject.

THE REGISTRATION BILLS.

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consider the expediency of proceeding with the Scotch Registration Bill, independently of the English Bill, the former being less contentious in its character than the latter?

SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton): On a point of Order, I beg to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the concluding part of the question does not include controversial matter?

*MR. SPEAKER: It would be well if the words "the former being less contentious in its character than the latter" were omitted.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend is aware that our desire is that this Bill should be further considered and passed; but my opinion is that our best course is to keep it as nearly pari passu with the English Bill as we can, and in company with the English Bill. I do not think there would be any advantage in discussing the main provisions of the Scotch Bill before they have been discussed in the English Bill; but if we can discuss them in the English Bill, then the difficulty with regard to the Scotch Bill will disappear.

VACCINATION.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I beg to ask the Home Secretary, with reference to the Motion standing in his name—for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Vaccination Act of 1867—which he proposes to take under the special Standing Order at the commencement of Business, if the Bill is based upon the recommendation of the Royal Commission, and if it proposes to abolish compulsory vaccination? If it does, does he not think it of too controversial a character to be brought in with these exceptional facilities?

MR. ASQUITH: If it were a Bill to abolish compulsory vaccination I should entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman; but it is nothing of the kind. A Commission has been sitting for some years, and the main subject of the Commission—namely, the expediency of compulsory vaccination—is a subject on which they have not yet reported; but they have presented an interim Report, signed by every Member of the Commission, in which they suggest that two changes in the law should be made at once. In the first place they report—

“We think that the imposition of repeated penalties in respect of the non-vaccination of the same child should no longer be possible. . . . We have arrived at this conclusion quite independently of the question whether vaccination should continue to be compulsorily enforced.”

The second recommendation is that persons imprisoned under the Vaccination Acts should no longer be subjected to the same treatment as criminals, but should receive the privileges of first-class misdemeanants and persons committed for contempt of Court. They add—

“Many of those whose imprisonment arises from their contravention of the laws relating to vaccination regard the practice as likely to be injurious to the health of their children, and are well-conducted and in other respects law-abiding citizens.”

This Report is signed—without giving all the names—by the present Lord Chancellor, Sir James Paget, Sir William Savory, Dr. J. S. Bristowe, Professor Michael Foster, and Mr. Jonathan Hutchinson; and the Bill has been framed to give effect to these unanimous recommendations of the Commission.

INCENDIARY FIRES AT HULL.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): I beg to ask the Home Secretary whether he can give any information as to the reported great fire at Hull last night; whether there is any evidence that the fire was intentionally caused; and whether any person has been brought to justice for the repeated fires which have recently occurred in the town?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. ASQUITH: I have not received official confirmation of the report, and I will, therefore, ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to give notice of the question.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): May I ask the President of the Board of Trade when he intends to move the appointment of the Select Committee on Railway Rates and Charges?

MR. MUNDELLA: I hope to move it on Monday night.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have decided what Business they will take first after the Whitsuntide Holidays? Will they take the Home Rule Bill on Monday?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No; we shall take Votes in Supply.

THE DUBLIN TRAINING COLLEGE.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint a Professor in the training college instead of Professor Joyce lately resigned; and whether he is aware that in consequence of delay the teachers are deprived of their usual lectures in method and organisation?

MR. J. MORLEY: It is intended to appoint a successor in the Marlborough Street Training College to succeed Mr. Joyce. Arrangements for instruction in matters of school organisation have been made pending the appointment, and the students are, therefore, not deprived of any instruction they otherwise would have had.

MR. FIELD: At what date may the appointment be expected?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am afraid I cannot answer that, but I will inquire.

IRISH DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

DR. KENNY (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Boards of Richmond District Lunatic Asylum, Dublin, and of the Cork District Lunatic Asylum, have passed resolutions condemning the new Rule of the Lunacy Board of Dublin Castle, which provides for the abolition of the office of visiting physician or surgeon to district lunatic asylums in Ireland; whether any remonstrances against this Rule have been made to him by the general public or the medical profession on the grounds that it cuts off the inmates from all independent connection with the outside world; and whether he will have said Rule re-considered with a view to its abolition?

MR. J. MORLEY: I find that the new Rule referred to was issued in December, 1891, after careful consideration, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Manchester (Mr. Balfour), and as a result of a specific recommendation of the Committee of which Sir Arthur Mitchell, of the Scotch Lunacy Department, was Chairman, appointed to inquire into the administration of the Lunacy Laws in Ireland. It is true that a few Asylum Boards (the Cork Board, but not the Richmond Board being among the number) passed resolutions in favour of the retention of the office of consulting or visiting physician; but the great majority of the Boards either expressed warm approval of the new Rule or accepted it without comment. I might also mention that some of the principal medical authorities on mental diseases and lunacy administration, at their meeting in London in May, 1892, expressed the opinion that the change would be found to act with decided advantage to the lunacy work generally in Ireland, as has been the case in other countries where the corresponding office has been abolished. I do not consider that any sufficient grounds have yet been shown for a reversion of the old system in this respect.

MR. JOHNSTON: Was this resolution passed in consequence of the subsequent remodelling of the Board and of its being packed by Nationalists?

MR. J. MORLEY: Not at all.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL
(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 10th May.]

FOURTH NIGHT.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.) moved an Amendment to leave out the words "the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly," and insert, "to be styled the Senate and House of Commons of Ireland." He said he thought that this Amendment could not be subjected to the same opposition which was offered to the Amendment he proposed in regard to the use of the word "Parliament," nor would it arouse those susceptibilities and jealousies which the Chief Secretary said would be called into play if the word "Parliament" was used. He imagined that there would not be any diversity of opinion among the Irish Members in regard to the Amendment. He had not based his Amendment upon the fact that these words were used in Canada, any more than he thought that an objection to the Amendment should be brought forward because the words were not used in the Legislative Bodies of the various Colonies of the Empire. There was no analogy between the case of Ireland and the case of the Colonies in regard to these names. They were not starting a Legislature in Ireland for the first time; what they were doing was restoring to the Irish people the right of governing themselves which they had before; and, that being so, they were bound to take into consideration as far as they could what the names were which were in use in the old days, when the Irish people had their own Parliament. There could not be any question at all that there was a strong sentiment in favour of the adoption of the words "House of Commons." The adoption of that title could not be injurious to the prospects of the Bill. If they adopted the words of his Amendment there would not be a single additional vote against the Bill; and if they did not adopt the words of his Amendment they would not relax, so far as he knew, the hostility to the measure shown by hon. Members who had announced their intention to vote against it. He, therefore, appealed to the Government to accept his Amendment. He believed this change was strongly desired by the Irish people. Whatever the feeling of the majority of the Irish Members might have been in regard to the substitution of the word "Parliament" for "Legislature," he did not see how there could be any difference of opinion among them with regard to the substitution of the words "House of Commons" for "Legislative Assembly," and "Senate" for "Legislative Council." He was sorry that he had interrupted the hon. Member for North Longford yesterday, because it was done under the erroneous impression that the hon. Member was making a statement to the effect that he (Mr. Redmond) cared very little about the interests or the dignity of the Irish Parliament. That was a statement which he could not allow to be made about him by anybody; but, as he had found that the hon. Member for North Longford was not referring to him, he would say that he regretted having made the interruption which he did. When he was attacked he would always interrupt as far as he could. But with regard to this Amendment, he was glad to say that there was no difference whatever between the Member for North Longford and himself, as was shown by an article in the March number of The Nineteenth Century. Under these circumstances, he did not see why the Government should hesitate to accept the Amendment, because it was an Amendment which, in the words of the hon. Member for North Longford, substituted words far more preferable to the Irish people of all sections than the words "Legislative Council" and "Legislative Assembly." Unless the Government could see some solid reason against it, he would earnestly urge them to accept the Amendment. He was certain that almost every Member opposite who was in favour of Home Rule for Ireland would be in favour, if the Irish Members desired it, of allowing them to call their Assembly the "House of Commons," under the old style adopted in the days when Ireland had a Parliament of its own. He was quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was anxious to meet the wishes of the Irish people as far as it was possible. He would, therefore, appeal to him to make this Bill more palatable and satisfactory than otherwise it would be.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 13, leave out "the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly," and insert "to be styled the Senate and House of Commons of Ireland."—(Mr. William Redmond.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On a point of Order, Sir, may I ask whether it is necessary to put the whole Amendment of the hon. Gentleman at once? I ask you for this reason—that while I should be disposed personally to vote for the Upper Chamber being called the Senate, I should certainly vote against the Lower Chamber being called the House of Commons. Therefore I should like to know whether the Amendment cannot be put in two divisions?

MR. W. REDMOND: Perhaps I may be allowed to say that it is with regard to the words "House of Commons" that I feel most strongly. You may call the Upper Chamber what you like.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he should put the Question that the words "the Legislative Council" stand part of the Clause.

MR. J. MORLEY: I hope the hon. Member will believe I am sincere in saying I am very sorry that the Government cannot accede to the Amendment. My hon. Friend asks whether we can give any solid and sufficient reason for such refusal; but I think, if no other reason could be found, it would be found in the fact that the night before last the Committee negatived the use of the word "Parliament" as a designation for the two Chambers. If "Parliament" had been adopted, there would have been some show of reason for substituting "House of Commons" for "Legislative Assembly," and a less obvious one for substituting "Senate" for "Legislative Council." The word "Parliament" is used in Canada, and not in the other Colonies, for the simple reason that the Dominion Parliament is at the head of a Federation and has subordinate Legislatures under it. For that reason, among others, we object to the use of the word "Parliament" in this Bill, and on the same ground, among others, we cannot accept "Senate" and "House of Commons."

Except in the case of the Dominion Government the term "Senate" is entirely unknown in our diversified Colonial system, and I do not know why in Ireland in particular it should be first employed.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, he would advise the hon. Member not to proceed with the Amendment, first of all because he belonged to a Party which was not considered at all in this compact, and which, therefore, had not the slightest chance of being granted any concession.

MR. W. REDMOND : In order to save time I may tell the hon. Gentleman that I never dream of taking his advice.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he knew that, but he was going to submit another reason for the withdrawal of the Amendment, which he thought was a stronger one. When they got this Parliament they could call it what they liked in spite of law or Act of Parliament.

*MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, that the word "Senate" might bring disagreeable remembrances to the English people. The word "Senate" suggested the glories of Rome, and he wondered that in consulting the susceptibilities of his hon. Friends it did not occur to the Chief Secretary that the place where Cato lived and Tully spoke would rather tend to dignify the body which he was about to establish in Dublin. To the English mind it recalled the one nation that had ever conquered us, and certainly the nation which, if this Home Rule Bill passed, would have conquered us for a second time, might fitly have its Senate also. He would also like to know whether there was any objection in Constitutional Law to calling this Body a Senate?

Mr. T. M. Healy rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said : Yesterday the Committee accepted the principle of a Second Chamber, and my desire is to see that the Second Chamber should be one, as far as possible, capable of carrying out its functions. I think the Committee should be committed to making a strong Second Chamber if you call it by the name "Senate" rather than by the colourless appellation "Legislative Council." The Senate of the United States, of France, and of Canada were all Bodies of great importance, carrying much weight in their respective political systems. If you are to adhere to the Second Chamber, I desire it should be an effective one, and honoured by a name which would practically compel those in charge of the Bill so to modify their proposals as to enable the Second Chamber really to carry out its functions.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said, he observed that the one thing on which the House had been wonderfully unanimous was that there should be no "Parliament" in Ireland—a point about which his constituents had been much alarmed, because they were told that there was to be a Parliament in Ireland. The Government had decided they would not have the word "Parliament," and now they had determined they would not distinguish this Body by the word "Senate." He believed that in this matter the Government were representing the views of his constituents, and doing the best they possibly could to destroy this delusion of Parliamentary Government, and he should vote against the proposal as to the use of the words "House of Commons."

MR. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour) said, if the constituents of the hon. Member were as satisfied as he was, and their only objection to an Irish Parliament had been removed by the exclusion of the word "Parliament" from the Bill, the Irish Members felt very happy. They were delighted to have had the opportunity of reconciling the constituents of the hon. Member; and if his constituents were really of the same mind as the hon. Member, the Nationalist Members of Ireland had reason to congratulate themselves very much. Their objection to the word "Council" was really because of the public inconvenience which it would create. It was a word in very common use with respect to Municipal Bodies, and it might come into common use in respect to other Local Bodies—such as County Councils—which might be adopted hereafter, and if they were to have no other means of distinguishing the Upper Assembly except the word "Council" it would lead to much confusion. He did not, therefore, see any reason why the Government should not adopt some better word, such as that proposed. He supported the Amendment, but not for the same reasons as had been given by the Leader of the Opposition. So long as the power was vested in the Body, and that Body exercised the power, that was the real thing to them. But they submitted, with regard to a matter of this kind, it would be a public convenience if a better term than that of "Council" were used, and he, therefore, supported the Amendment.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, the hon. Member for Clare was an object deserving the sympathy of the House. He had now made repeated efforts to bring under the attention of the Government the sentimental aspirations of the Irish people. Yesterday the Prime Minister declined to make the smallest concession to the hon. Member or his supporters in Ireland. That day the hon. Member had returned to the charge, and had minimised still more his request. There was a difference between the hon. Member defying the Prime Minister in the wilds of County Clare and the hon. Member when he came to that House and, with bated breath—

MR. W. REDMOND rose to a point of Order. He asked leave to make a personal explanation. The hon. Member had been kind enough to say he (Mr. Redmond) said things in his constituency he was not prepared to say in that House. He could tell the hon. Member that he had not one face for the country and another for that House. If the hon. Gentleman desired to draw a comparison between his speeches in that House and in the country he would ask the hon. Member, Had he come down armed with quotations to support his contention?

MR. MACARTNEY was certainly not armed with quotations. If he were to bring all the quotations that would support his statement he thought he should alarm the House, and be guilty of what hon. Gentlemen opposite would consider obstruction of the Government in their endeavours to carry on the administration of the country. But the manner in which the hon. Gentleman put the views of his Party in Ireland differed very considerably from his manner in that House, and as that Amendment had been divided into two parts for the convenience of Debate, he did not wish to give the hon. Member any advice; but he believed he would be more likely to obtain his ends if he put his views with greater force to the Government and pressed them on the Prime Minister in a little more insistent manner. The hon. Member evidently foresaw his Amendment would not be accepted, and he fell back on an article written by the hon. Member for Longford, in which that hon. Member said that he wished this and he wished that about the Legislative Council. The hon. Member for Clare had been long enough in the House to know that when an hon. Member only wished this or that he was very little likely to attain his end. It would be more to the purpose if the hon. Member for Longford had asserted his contention by backing up in the Division Lobby of that House his desire to see the future Legislature of Ireland ornamented with the name he thought consonant to its dignity and duties. The Government had declined to accept the hon. Member's Amendment, and he thought this was a very significant illustration of the amount of confidence which they could place in the assurances which were given, or, at all events, allowed to be understood, with regard to the intentions of the Government, at a future stage of this Bill, in the composition of the Second Chamber. Yesterday they were told all they were discussing was the principle of a Second Chamber, and that with regard to its component elements, and whether it might or might not be strengthened, the Government had an open mind. But now they found upon the first instance upon which the Government had an opportunity of showing whether they intended to reserve an open mind on the question of the Second Chamber they resolutely adhered to even the most stringent verbal machinery of the Bill. If the Government desired the House to believe they had the slightest intention of making any alteration whatever in the power or authority of the Second Chamber they had an opportunity, on the Amendment now before them, of giving some substantial guarantee for this assurance. The Government had declined to accept the name which carried with it certainly a far greater popular view of Legislative and Executive authority; therefore, he could not for one moment believe, when they hereafter had to discuss the component elements of the Second Chamber or the duty and authority with which it might be charged, that the Government had the slightest intention of departing from the scheme sketched out in this Bill. For the purpose of testing the sincerity of the declarations the Government had made he intended to vote with the Leader of the Opposition.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) considered it was extremely inconvenient that although the Government must have known from the question he had put that the Leader of the Opposition was going to support the first part of this Amendment, and that the Amendment had been divided into two portions, the Chief Secretary should get up after the hon. Member for Clare, and at once put down a non possumus to this Amendment. It was almost like beating the air now for anyone to discuss it. There was no reason why, because the Chief Secretary had treated the House in what he thought was rather a discourteous manner, they should be prevented discussing the Amendment at all. He, for one, favoured the first part of it. He voted against the Legislative Council the previous day, because he thought it was a sham, a delusion, and a snare. But the Chancellor of the Duchy spoke later in the afternoon, and gave them to understand he had a very high opinion of what this Second Chamber was going to be. The right hon. Gentleman told them he believed it would be their duty to differ from the First Chamber, and to give time for reconsideration, and he appealed to the House to allow the Second Chamber to be constituted, and then they might consider whether they could not make it a real element in the constitution of the Irish Parliament, or whatever it was to be called. That being so, he thought it only natural they should give it a name, and something rather different to the Council of an Agricultural Society, or a Borough Council, or any other Council. He, for one, in order to test the sincerity of the Government, would certainly vote for the Amendment as it now stood; and he hoped in future, when hon. Members desired to give their opinions in favour of an Amendment, they might be snuffed out all at once by a Minister getting up.

*DR. KENNY (Dublin, College Green) wished, in the first place, to say that he and his hon. Friends did not desire such sinister help as had been held out to them from either Tory or Liberal Unionist. He congratulated the Leader of the Opposition and some of his hon. Friends on their entire change of attitude towards the Bill. Hitherto they had professed their intention of voting for any Amendment which would make the Bill worse, and voting against any Amendment which would better it. They had expressed their intention of doing all they could to reduce the Bill to a position of the utmost contempt. Their attitude had quite altered, and the right hon. Gentleman who led the Opposition had stated he would vote in favour of the word "Senate," because it would give increased dignity to the Body. That was an entirely new attitude which he welcomed very warmly, and he trusted it would be persevered in by the Tory Party and the Liberal Unionists throughout the discussions. With regard to the answer which had been made by the Chief Secretary, he did really expect to hear from that right hon. Gentleman some more solid argument against the Amendment than he put forward. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to rely on the fact that the word "Parliament" in some way or other excluded the idea of a Legislative Council and Assembly, and was inconsistent with them, whereas if they used the words "a Senate" and "a House of Commons" it must mean "Parliament." He could not see that there was the least connection between the two ideas. They might have a Legislative Council and Assembly and call them such, and yet they might be a Parliament, and they might also have a Senate and House of Commons, and they might not be a Parliament, so that he could not see any solidity whatever in the argument. But, as regarded the whole Amendment, the hon. Member for East Clare and his Colleagues did not attach the same amount of importance to that portion which suggested the word "Senate" as they did to the question of altering the other name to that of the "House of Commons." They advocated the adoption of the word "Senate" on the ground of the balance of convenience as well as an addition of dignity; but with regard to the use of the term "House of Commons," they rested their demand on a totally different ground. They rested it not on the analogy of Canada, but on the unalterable feeling of nationality of the Irish people and on historical continuity. They had had a House of Commons and they desired again to have a House of Commons. The Chief Secretary and his Colleagues had not sufficiently yielded to their desires to grant them the name of "Parliament" the other night; but he hoped that, in the present case, they had not said their last word, but would, at least, accept that portion of the Amendment which dealt with the name of the House of Commons. The Chief Secretary and his Colleagues were making determined and able efforts to give the Irish people Home Rule, because it was the demand of the Irish people; and if this desire for the name of House of Commons were portion of their demand, why not be consistent, and let them so call it? He appreciated the desire of the Government to placate and do homage to the National sentiment, and they would give an extra proof of that desire by allowing the Irish people to use the name of the House of Commons.

COLONEL WARING: On a point of Order, I desire to know, Mr. Mellor, what words you are going to put?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is proposed to leave out the words "Legislative Council" in order to insert the word "Senate." The Question I have to put is that the words proposed to be left out—"Legislative Council"—stand part of the clause.

MR. GRIFFITH - BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) said, the hon. Member who had just sat down (Dr. Kenny) had accused hon. Members of the Opposition of altering their attitude. He ventured to say that in supporting the adoption of the word "Senate" they were doing nothing of the kind. They adopted that course because they wanted an Upper Chamber which would be a really strong Upper Chamber, and which would resist the Lower Chamber where necessary. It was because they believed if the present Upper Chamber were called a Senate they could subsequently modify the provisions for its constitution and make it more likely to carry out the object they had in view that they supported that part of the Amendment. He had put down an Amendment to the effect that this Upper Chamber should be called the House of Lords, and he should prefer that to Senate, because he believed that 60 Irish Representative Peers would be the only really efficient safeguard for the rights of the minority. Though, as he said, he preferred the House of Lords, he should not mind if the word was "Senate," because he thought they could subsequently so constitute the Senate that it should be, in fact, a House of Lords. Reference had been made to the Roman Senate, the very first from which the word was taken. That Senate was not an elected body, but it was in practice, and during a great part of the time in theory, an aristocratic body, and it was a strong body in the way of resisting the hasty popular will. He thought if they adopted the word "Senate" they might set up a strong Second Chamber, and with that view he supported the Amendment.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said, as the Chairman's ruling divided the Amendment into two parts, on which two separate votes would be taken, it simplified the course which he thought he and his hon. Friends ought to take. Undoubtedly there was a strong feeling that would justify them, in his opinion, in putting to the test of a Division that part of the Amendment as regarded the name of the House of Commons. But although on grounds of convenience urged by his hon. Friend the Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin there were reasons why "Senate" would be a preferable name to Legislative Council, still there was no such strong feeling on their part as to the word "Senate" as there was in reference to the words "House of Commons." He was bound to say, having heard the speech of the Leader of the Opposition and the grounds upon which he was going to bestow on them the inestimable favour of his support, that those grounds were of the most sinister character. The right hon. Gentleman himself, with unwonted candour, had admitted that his motive in putting in the word "Senate" was that he might make the Upper Chamber such a body as would be repugnant to their feelings. Bearing in mind the candid confession the right hon. Gentleman had made, for his part he would recommend that the first portion of the Amendment should not be pressed, but that it should be withdrawn, and that then, on the second part of the Amendment, he and his hon. Friends should go to a Division.

MR. W. REDMOND said, under the circumstances, he would ask leave to withdraw the portion of the Amendment with regard to the word "Senate." He did not regard the word "Senate" at all except as a matter of convenience; but on that portion of the Amendment which dealt with the name of the House of Commons he should divide the House.

MR. J. G. LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk): There is another Amendment down in the name of another hon. Member. If the hon. Member for Clare withdraws his Amendment, will it prejudice the other Amendment which is down?

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question I have to put is that "Legislative Council" stand part of the clause. Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn? ["No, no!"]

Question put.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I only wish to ask exactly where we are. As hon. Members behind have changed their front completely, we are really in a difficulty to know what we are going to vote for. As I understand, you are going to put the words "Legislative Council." Will that preclude us putting in the word "Senate" afterwards, because that is my point?

THE CHAIRMAN: That will be decided by the vote of the Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask are we here to finish anyone's education?

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.) said, he begged to move, in Clause 1, page 1, line 13, the substitution of the words "House of Commons of Ireland" for the expression "Legislative Assembly" used in the clause under consideration. He was not aware of the intention to divide the Amendment; but he would not trouble the House with any remarks upon it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 13, to leave out the words "Legislative Assembly," in order to insert the words "House of Commons of Ireland."—(Mr. William Redmond.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Legislative Assembly' stand part of the Clause."

MR. A. S. P. GRIFFITH-BOSCawEN rose to move an Amendment to Clause 1, page 1, line 13, to leave out "the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly" and insert "the Irish House of Lords and the Irish House of Commons."

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! The Amendment of the hon. Member for East Clare is before the House.

*MR. J. G. LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) said, he did not agree that the Lower House in Ireland ought to be designated by the title of "House of Commons." There was a word in the Irish language for "a House of Commons." [Cries of "Divide!" and "Hear, hear!" and interruption.]

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) rose to a point of Order. He wished to explain that it was impossible for him and hon. Members near him to hear a word that was being said in consequence of the interruptions of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. I hope that hon. Members will assist me in keeping order.

MR. J. G. LAWSON said, he regretted that a reference to the Irish language should have caused so much disorder and noise.

THE CHAIRMAN: I hope the hon. Member will keep strictly to the Amendment.

*MR. J. G. LAWSON said, that in a dictionary in the Library he had found the Irish word for "a House of Commons." That word was "Tyeay na nuaral." [Loud laughter.] As they had this distinctive word at their disposal, why should hon. Members from Ireland seek to create confusion in these realms by the use of the expression "House of Commons," which was the name already appropriated by the British Legislature? When Henry II. went to Ireland—[cries of "Divide!" and interruption—he summoned an Upper House, which was called "a Council," and a Lower House, which was called "the Synod of Cashel." [Laughter.] That was, no doubt, a Clerical Assembly, and so would the Legislature which the Government proposed to create be largely a Clerical Assembly. If the Nationalist Members were not content to apply to their House the Irish name which he had found in the dictionary, let them call it a Synod. He objected strongly to the proposal to call it a House of Commons.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 482 ; Noes 34.—(Division List, No. 78.)

THE CHAIRMAN : Substantially the two Amendments which stand next on the Paper are covered by the Amendments already decided. The next Amendment is out of Order on Clause 1, and should be moved on Clause 6, and the next is covered by the decision of the Committee. The Question will, therefore, be that Clause 1 stand part of the Bill.

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

*MR. BARTLEY said, they had now arrived at an important point—namely, the question of affirming the 1st clause of the Bill. No one, he thought, could say it was an unreasonable thing that they should discuss the clause as a clause, seeing that it had not been altered or amended in any way. The Debate had not been barren, inasmuch as they had settled distinctly, on the authority of the Government, that there was to be no Parliament and no House of Commons in Ireland. That was a point which they should press very strongly—that the results of the discussions on the various Amendments had been to show clearly that the Government meant that there should never be a Parliament or a House of Commons in Ireland. If they could amend the Bill as it went on so as to prevent the Irish Legislature from altering its own Constitution, they might congratulate themselves that whatever this new Body would be, it would not be in any sense a Parliament, or in any sense a House of Commons. He was in favour of making the Body a sort of larger County Council ; but the Amendment he had on the Paper to effect that object would have to be moved on Clause 6. The Body which would be created under the Bill would neither be a County Council nor a Vestry, nor a Local Body of any sort. It was a sort of hybrid Institution which was to please everybody, but which would ultimately please nobody. The Prime Minister had stated most emphatically that the new Legislature was to be subordinate to the Imperial Parliament. They desired to press that fairly and fully, and he hoped the Irish Members would take the opportunity of informing their constituents of the fact that the Irish Legislature was to be a subordinate Body. If they did that, probably the satisfaction of the people of Ireland with the measure would grow. The clause, however, said—

"On and after the appointed day there shall be in Ireland a Legislature consisting of Her Majesty the Queen and of two Houses, the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly."

Well, there could be no doubt that by affirming that principle they assented to the establishment in Ireland of a sort of rival of the House of Commons. True, it was said that it was not to be a Parliament or a House of Commons, but the whole discussion which had taken place upon the clause, so far as the Irish Members were concerned, showed that they regarded this Legislature as a first beginning—an embryo Parliament which in time would rival this House. This was a question which did not concern Ireland solely or mainly. It concerned Great Britain quite as much as it concerned Ireland, because it would be used to break up the old Constitution, and set Ireland up in the position of an independent nation, and it would cause friction between the two countries. The clause, taken in conjunction with those that followed, was, as some of its supporters desired, the first step towards gradually destroying the great United Empire which had been founded by the patriotism and energy of our forefathers. He thought that even now they ought to pause before taking such a step. He thought that all who had the welfare of the country at heart should protest, if only in a few words, against this clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, to leave out Clause 1.—(Mr. Bartley.)

MR. HANBURY (Preston) was glad it was proposed to leave out this clause. Although they had been unable to alter it, they might succeed in striking it out altogether. At any rate, they had some reason to congratulate themselves upon the manner in which the Government had dealt with it. The Government had admitted that the question of the supremacy of Parliament had been made clear, and surely the 1st clause was that in which it should have been dealt with. But, in accordance with their whole policy of secrecy, Ministers had, while admitting that the subject ought to be dealt with, postponed it to another period. Again, if there was one point on which they ought to have had the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown it was in reference to the clause under discussion. The Government had not the advice in that House of the Irish Law Officers; the Nationalists would not give the Government a seat for an Irish Law Officer; but there was a distinguished jurist on the Treasury Bench, and the Committee were entitled to know his opinion on this matter. The Committee were entitled by every right to take the opinion of the Solicitor General on the clause, distinguished purists in the House having expressed opinions against it. What was the good of having Law Officers if, when their opinion was asked by laymen on what was essentially a legal matter, the House got no guidance whatever? Turning from the Government and the Solicitor General and coming to the Irish Members, on a matter so vital to Ireland they had been met with a conspiracy of silence. O'Connell, the greatest Irish Leader of this century, always denied, when working for the Repeal of the Union, the supremacy of Parliament. Had the Irish Members fallen so far below his standard that the Committee had not a single word from them on this subject? It was all very well to speak of promises, but he fancied that the Irish people had not very much changed since the days of O'Connell. Supremacy was the question involved in the clause, and he asked why it was that the Irish Members, backed by the Government and their Law Officers, had maintained a conspiracy of silence? There had been a conspiracy of silence by all Parties forming the Government majority. There was another Party in the House which was led by the hon. Member for Northampton. It was a small, dwindling Party, and he was not sure if it was not represented only by the hon. Member for Northampton himself. The hon. Member had voted against his own Amendment. [Laughter and "No!"] Well, he said he would. He (Mr. Hanbury) did not know whether the hon. Member kept his word or not. When the three sections of the Government took this line in reference to this clause, the Opposition might well think that, though they had not altered a word, they had scored a success in reducing the thing to a farce. He would ask if the Irish Legislature was to be in any way on the Colonial model, who was to represent Ireland in the House and answer questions with regard to that country? He would also ask that the Prime Minister should clear up the ambiguity with regard to the operation of Clause 33 in reference to laws expressly extended to Ireland. What did "extended" mean? Did it mean that the laws so extended were not for Ireland only, but were passed for England, Scotland, and Wales as well? He hoped they would have an expression of opinion and a definite reply on these points from the Solicitor General.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I am not quite certain whether the Committee or all the Members of the Committee entirely appreciate the extreme importance of the Motion now before the House. This is not like a question in an ordinary Committee. We are dealing with the first enacted clause of the Bill, and if we pass that clause we have then accepted the principle that there shall be in Ireland a separate Legislature. It is, to all intents and purposes, a Second Reading discussion. It will, therefore, be in Order in this discussion to bring forward any statement, argument, or fact that would have been germane to a Second Reading discussion. Of course, I shall endeavour to avoid anything like a repetition of arguments that have been used before—and which have been answered. But we have a right to recall to the mind of the Government that portion of our argument to which at present they have not given the slightest consideration. Our position is rather a curious one. We were told on the Second Reading that we were premature in many of our criticisms on the Bill—that they might more properly be directed to the clauses of the Bill, and that when we came to the clauses we should find that the Government, especially with regard to certain important matters, would have an open mind and give the fullest consideration to our arguments. What has been our experience on the 1st clause? Have we had full consideration of the arguments which we have produced? ["No!"] Have we found the Government with an open mind? Have we found the Government prepared to accept any, even the slightest, verbal Amendment to the Bill? We have had very little debate on the part either of the Members of the Government or their supporters. That is a point to which I direct special attention. We had a right to expect when in Committee that we should be fairly met, and that our arguments would be met by corresponding arguments; but it is a fact that beyond practically official, and very often perfunctory, replies, there has been nothing that we can call a discussion at all. All the discussion has been almost altogether on one side. Not only has there been very little debate, but there have been no Amendments put down by the supporters of the Government. Yes, there have been two or three. One was by the hon. Member for Northampton, and he showed the desire he had of amending the Bill by speaking against his own Amendment. Another was put down by the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire. It was discussed to-day; and when the House was about to vote on it, unless I am mistaken, the hon. Member walked out of the House to avoid voting for his own Amendment. I do not call these serious Amendments. The hon. Member for Northampton is a humorous person, and he may have thought it a joke to put down an Amendment and vote against it, but my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvonshire—

MR. RATHBONE rose, and addressed some observations to Mr. Chamberlain.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I was going to say that my hon. Friend was not a jocose person, but after what he has just said I can hardly say that. What is it, by his own confession, that he has done? He has put down an Amendment on the 1st clause, and he proposes to vote upon it on the 6th clause. If the 6th clause was the right place to vote for his Amendment, why on earth did he put it down on the 1st clause? What I was going to say was that such Amendments as have been put down on the Government side of the House are pour rire and not serious Amendments. Here is a great majority of over 350 Members, and they have not put down a single Amendment on the Bill. Now, why is that? It must be for one of two reasons. Either because they think this Bill is perfect—perfect in every line, in every clause, in every word; for not even to a word have they ventured to put down an Amendment. It must either be that, or else the only other conclusion we can arrive at is that, in spite of all their statements in the country, they have felt that it was more than their political lives were worth to put down Amendments, and therefore they have come here prepared to swallow anything the Government put before them as a sort of a jubilee testimonial to my right hon. Friend. I leave them to judge between one or other of those alternatives. There is no other. Either the Bill is, in their opinion, perfect, or—

MR. T. M. HEALY: The "Bill"? It is a clause under discussion. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think the hon. Member for North Louth is under a misapprehension. This is the Committee of the House of Commons, not a meeting of the shareholders of The Freeman's Journal.

MR. T. M. HEALY rose—[Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: Do I understand the hon. and learned Member to rise to Order?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Yes, Sir. I wish to ask whether it is in Order on a clause to debate the Bill at large?

THE CHAIRMAN: The clause is an extremely important one, and I cannot say that the right hon. Gentleman is out of Order.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I was saying, Sir, that there are only two alternatives open to hon. Members who support the Government. Either they believe the Bill to be perfect, or else they, for other reasons best known to themselves, refuse to give effect to any attempt to revise the Bill. In either case, we have to bear in mind that in future we are to have no assistance from them in amending the Bill, and that our Amendments are entirely and absolutely at the mercy of the right hon. Gentlemen who sit on the Front Bench. If they say "No" to them, no matter how reasonable they are, and how entirely hon. Members behind the Government may agree with us, we know that in future they will vote with the Government against us. In spite of these tactics, we have succeeded in eliciting some information from the Government in the course of this Debate; and I would go further and say that their silence has been even more instructive to us than what they have said. In the first place, there are certain things about which we now know, owing to statements made by the Government; but there are still, unfortunately, some other important points in the Bill about which we know nothing as to the intentions of the Government. I will take, first, the points upon which we know nothing, and upon which they have maintained practically an entire silence. We are to create a Legislature for Ireland. When we were discussing this question on the Second Reading the question of Ulster was raised. We said that, upon the principle laid down by the Government, the principle that any part of a nation, desiring by a great majority of its Representatives to have a certain form of Government, was entitled to have a subordinate Legislature—we said that that principle, if it governed Ireland as regards the rest of the United Kingdom, governed the case of Ulster with reference to the rest of Ireland. We were told, in the first place, that the question of Ulster deserved very little consideration.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I rise to Order, Sir. [Cries of "Order!"] I wish to ask, can the right hon. Gentleman discuss on this 1st clause—

"On and after the appointed day there shall be in Ireland a Legislature consisting of Her Majesty the Queen and of two Houses, the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly"

—can the right hon. Gentleman deal with the whole subject-matter of the Bill?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am arguing against the clause.

VOL. XII. [FOURTH SERIES.]

MR. CRILLY [Cries of "Order!"]: I am asking for your ruling, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand that the hon. Member asks me a question with regard to this clause. The whole clause is open to discussion; but, of course, it is not open to the right hon. Gentleman to discuss any other clause in detail.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN rose.

MR. T. HARRINGTON [Cries of "Order!"] also rose.

THE CHAIRMAN called upon Mr. J. Chamberlain.

MR. T. HARRINGTON: I rise to a point of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: At the time the hon. Member rose to Order the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was speaking to Order, and I did not hear what he said.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I submit, Sir, on the point of Order, that this is a clause for establishing a Legislature for the whole of Ireland. I am opposing the clause, and I am going to show why and in what way it may be desirable to cut out a portion of Ireland from the operation of the clause. I oppose the clause, among other reasons, because it applies to the whole of Ireland.

MR. T. HARRINGTON [Cries of "Order!" and interruption]: I wish to point out, Sir, on the point of Order, that the right hon. Gentleman's speech up to the present has been a complaint that Amendments have not been put upon the Paper. ["Order, order!"] In connection with that, I draw your attention to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has declined to avail himself of his right to put a single Amendment down.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have been listening to what the right hon. Gentleman has said, and up to the present moment he certainly has not been out of Order.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It certainly is a strange thing, Sir, that hon. Gentlemen opposite who cannot speak in this House are allowed to interrupt. Their object evidently is—they can have no other purpose than—to break down the speeches of their opponents. One result of these disorderly interruptions will be, of course, to prolong the Debate. I was saying that this clause provides a Legislature for the whole of Ireland, but I was going on to say that when we discussed the propriety of excluding Ulster, although in the first instance the Representatives of the Government—particularly the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Bryce)—spoke contemptuously of the Representatives of Ulster, at a later period of the Debate the Chief Secretary spoke much more seriously of their claims to consideration. He spoke of the great demonstration in Belfast and of the gravity of the situation. But what I complain of is that, having admitted the gravity of the situation, which every man of common sense must see is sufficiently serious, without embittering it with such observations as were made earlier in the Debate, the Chief Secretary offers no solution of it on behalf of the Government. He merely repeated one of those appeals made so frequently to hon. Members from Ulster to accept the Bill and to join with the rest of Ireland in making the new Legislature a success. I am not going to say whether Ulstermen are right or wrong; but we all know—the Chief Secretary knows—that they refused this appeal and they are going to be converted. Whether you think it right or wrong, the people of Ulster, and of North-East Ulster in particular, will not have this Home Rule Bill. It is not safe, it is not statesmanlike for the Government to admit the gravity of the issue; and knowing, as they must know, that, they cannot overcome the difficulty by a mere appeal, not to put before the House their own proposal for dealing with the difficulty. Because I rather judge they have a proposal. My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury, in the previous discussion, spoke of his willingness to consider a scheme for removing a portion of Ireland from the scheme of this Bill. I say that my right hon. Friend had expressed his willingness to give consideration to any practical scheme for shielding Ulster from his Bill which might be proposed very good. But that is just my complaint. I do not think it is fair of the Government to throw upon us the onus of suggesting a scheme. It is they who have made the difficulty by bringing forward this Bill, and it is for them to show how that difficulty is to be removed. Do they know how it can be removed? Have they a clause which in their own minds is a practical one for removing the difficulty, or do they think it is a difficulty irremovable and impossible to be dealt with? If they have a proposal, they ought to put it on the Table and say how they propose to deal separately with Ulster or any portion of Ulster; but if they believe it passes the wit of man to devise any arrangement by which Ulster shall be satisfied, then I ask you, Sir, to take note that when they are passing this clause, by the confession of the Government themselves, we are face to face with a difficulty they are altogether unable to surmount. I think that the reason that has been given hitherto by the Government for not proposing such a clause has been that they had no ground to believe that Ulster would accept it. I admit that they have no ground to believe that the Representatives of Ulster will accept any clause they propose. I think myself that the Representatives of Ulster are making a mistake. I think they are bound in consistency with what we have all said on their behalf, and with what they have themselves said, to accept any diminution of the evil of this Bill; and if a certain portion of Ireland could be spared the curse, I think they ought to vote for it. I know why they do not accept it. It is from a feeling of chivalry—from the belief that they are bound to stand by the scattered minority in other parts of Ireland. But I think that while they are bound to stand by that minority, they would be better able to defend it if this should become law, outside the proposed new Parliament under a Government of their own, than they ever will be if they only form a minority in the Home Rule Parliament. Therefore, I think the Ulster Members have been wrong hitherto in rejecting an arrangement for an Amendment to exclude Ulster from the operation of the Bill. But, even if they maintain that view, I still assert that it is the duty of the Government to make this proposal. They, at all events, ought to make a clean breast in the matter, and to let us see what is in their minds with regard to it. I pass on to another point on which we still feel in doubt, as to the intentions of the Government—namely, the question of the retention of the Irish Members in this Parliament.

Mr. T. M. HEALY : Question !

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN : There are too many Chairmen of Committees in this House. When I tried to get the assent of the Government to discuss this very important question at the outset of the Bill, my right hon. Friend declined, and declared that any attempt to raise a discussion at that period was premature—that is to say, before dealing with the question of the Irish Legislature it was premature to raise the question of the retention of the Irish Members, although the question of supremacy almost entirely depends upon how that matter is to be dealt with. I have no doubt that when we come to the question of the retention of the Irish Members we shall be told that we cannot discuss the question of supremacy, and that the question of supremacy will be excluded on the question of the retention of the Irish Members. The object of the Government is to confine us on every clause to what is within the clause itself without dealing in the slightest degree with the other clauses that bear upon it. [Cheers.] Yes, and here are people who think that reasonable. This is the Gladstonian view of the discussion upon the Bill. You are to discuss each clause and each Amendment separately, without the slightest regard to its relation to the other parts of the Bill. I say that this question of the retention of the Irish Members is of the utmost importance, and has a close relation with the subject under discussion. Upon this matter we have no definite declaration; but we are told that we can propose a clause. What we want to know is, whether they will adhere to the clause? The right hon. Gentleman rather chaffed me, because he said I had asked him to say that he would adhere to the essentials of the clause, and that I was to be his guide to say what were the essentials of the clause. The essence of the clause is that Irish Members are to be retained for Imperial subjects and not for British subjects. That is all. I am not asking as to the method by which that is to be accomplished, or as to the details. What I asked before, and what I ask again, is this, Does the right hon. Gentleman adhere to the principles he has himself laid down in the most definite language in his speeches in the country, that you will not have the Irish Members, with a Parliament of their own, coming here to discuss British affairs? I cannot understand why there should be any secrecy upon this matter with regard to the intentions of the Government. I do not suppose, and I never have supposed, that they were going to alter their plan. I have seen it stated in some papers—and some of them Gladstonian papers—that they were going to alter their plan; but as they cannot do so without a direct breach of faith, I do not believe they are going to alter it. But then, why do they not say so? If they would say so at this stage of the proceedings, they would considerably shorten the Debate. They would have avoided the earlier Debate on the Motion to postpone the clauses, and they would have avoided the allusions I am now making. This is not all. Here is another question—and I am dealing only with vital questions—of the utmost importance on which we are being kept in the dark. I refer to the financial arrangements under this Bill. We are to create a Legislature in Ireland. One of the cardinal points in reference to the creation of a separate Legislature was stated in 1886 by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) to be that there should be a fair financial arrangement between the two countries. Now we are told that the Financial Clauses are to be postponed to the end of the Bill—that is to say, that we are to be committed to every part of the Bill, to the full and complete scheme, and it is not until the majority have been committed to that that we are to be told what the cost is to be. A very important question arises out of this. I assert deliberately that the financial scheme of the Government, as proposed in the Bill, has utterly broken down—I am not talking now of differences of opinion, but of facts—broken down because, as the right hon. Gentleman himself admits, of the inaccuracy of the estimates upon which the scheme has been based. I have been told a story about this. I do not know whether it is accurate in all its details, but it is very amusing and very characteristic. I am told that some years ago the Treasury of this country wanted for some purpose of statistics, or something of the kind, to ascertain the amount of Irish whisky that paid excise in Ireland, and that was consumed in England. They communicated with the officials in Ireland, and asked them in future to distinguish in their Returns between the two. I do not know what the Irish officials did as to the Returns required, but I am reminded of what the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) told us the other day of an Irishman who had said that we, a stupid people, were trying to govern a keen-witted people, and that that was where the difficulty arose. These keen-witted officials could not understand what the stupid Exchequer officials were doing; and instead of doing what the blundering English officials would probably have done, and making a very accurate and careful examination, they took a shot at it, and ever since these Returns have been made upon an estimate for which there is no justification in fact. At the present time, as the right hon. Gentleman told me in answer to a question, an inquiry is going on, and I am told that that inquiry has already shown that the figures are incorrect, and that the surplus for the Irish Legislature, which was estimated at £500,000, will be lessened by one-half, or, at all events, by by some very considerable amount. If that is the case—and my right hon. Friend told me that an error had been discovered—if that is the case, what becomes of this financial scheme? We are not to know what is the alternative scheme—for there must be an alternative scheme—until we come to the very end of the Bill, perhaps in the Dog Days and when we are all pretty well tired out. Then, and then only, shall we know what is the price England is to pay for Home Rule for Ireland. One thing we do know—namely, whatever arrangement will be made, the financial scheme will be extremely costly to this country. We know it is not the intention of the Government to ask for a fair contribution from Ireland according to her taxable capacity. England is to be asked to make a contribution of £500,000 from the beginning, possibly to be reduced later in aid of the Irish Constabulary. That we know, and I think it is a great pity we did not know it before the General Election. We are going to pay £500,000 a year towards the Irish Constabulary, but in my opinion, when we come to discuss the Financial Clauses, we shall find that the loss is much greater than that. We did not know that before the last General Election; we do know it before the next Election, and we shall take care that the electors know it also. Well, another question of very great importance has been raised in the Debate, as to which we cannot get any information from the Government. I asked my right hon. Friend once or twice for information in regard to the proposals which the Government would make in reference to obtaining what is called the war subsidy from Ireland. This is not a small matter; it is of the very essence of the Bill. Why do we oppose this Bill? We oppose it because we believe it is dishonourable in us to betray and desert our fellow-subjects in Ireland, and because we believe it would constitute a great danger to England; because we believe that in time of national danger, in time of war, and in time of stress, we could not rely on the resources of Ireland as we can under the existing system. I ask the right hon. Gentleman, What are the proposals of the Government? He has refused to put them on the Table at the present time. He says he will present them before the Financial Clauses come on for discussion—that is to say, some months hence. I could well conceive the case of an independent Member who might be prepared to vote for Home Rule under ordinary circumstances, but who, if he found that there were no means of obtaining from Ireland its fair contribution in case of war, would vote against the Bill altogether. Yet we have no information given to us. Why is the House not given any information? There must be a reason, and I think it is pretty evident. It is because hon. Members opposite have said distinctly that they object to the Financial Clauses as they stand, and that they will object to any subsidy in time of war. My right hon. Friend knows that if he put down a clause giving us the same powers as regards subsidy as we have now in time of war, they would not give the same friendly assistance to the Government as they are now giving. I have referred to these four important points on which we are still kept in the dark. I want now to point out to the House one or two things on which some light has been thrown. In the first place, we have discovered that the safeguards in the Bill are absolutely illusory. We have discovered that they are accepted by the Irish Members because they know they are illusory. The Government are perfectly consistent. They think that any safeguard is unnecessary. We know they have only put them in to satisfy the prejudices of the British public, and they hardly take the pains to treat them. Look at this question of a Second Chamber. We were told yesterday—and it was a very suggestive statement of the Government, bearing in mind that the sole thing we were discussing was the principle of a Second Chamber—that the supporters of the Government who voted with the Government voted for the principle. When hereafter, at the beginning of next year, they are trying to get up an agitation about the House of Lords, we shall certainly remind them that they have done their very best to set up a shoddy House of Lords in Ireland. We did not treat it as a question of principle; we treated it as a question of the practical application of a principle, and we said the Second Chamber proposed would be absolutely useless as a safeguard to the Irish people. Again we have the usual tactics of the Government. My right hon. Friend says he attaches great importance to a Second Chamber, but the details will be open to discussion. He wants to make it a real and effective Body. It has been proved beyond a shadow of doubt that it will not be a really effective Body, but that it will be practically elected by the same interests as the First Chamber. That having been proved, why does not my right hon. Friend tell us what he is prepared to substitute for his Second Chamber, so that it may become an effective Chamber and may establish what my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) called the principle of dubitancy in the discussion of political questions by bringing about delay and hesitation? My right hon. Friend stopped short just where his communications would have been most interesting. He is willing to make it an effective Body, but he absolutely declines to tell us how he will do so. Then I come to the most important of all the points raised—the question of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin, in a speech which was so clear, so excellent, so moderate, and so unanswerable that it could be answered only by the Closure, pointed out that this was a really serious and vital issue; that it was a question whether the supremacy was to be vital or sterilised, whether it was to be active or dormant. We have from the Government assurances upon this point which, so far as they relate to their intentions, are perfectly satisfactory to me. They have said in terms which are as clear as, I believe, they can make them that they intend the supremacy to be a real and active supremacy. It is to be a supremacy over all persons and all matters. It is to be a supremacy which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister once said he hoped the House of Commons would not exercise unjustly or unwisely, and which he could not doubt was sufficient for any purpose whatever. That fully and clearly expresses the mind of the Government and their intentions in proposing this Bill. I have no doubt it expresses with equal fulness the intentions of hon. Members behind them. Does it express with equal fulness the opinions of hon. Members opposite? We have to get to the bottom of that. [Interruption.]

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): You are not dumb.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): I move that those words be taken down, Sir. I heard the hon. Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) say, "You are knocked up."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): The noble Lord is wholly mistaken. Another hon. Member said, "You are not dumb."

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I heard the observation.

MR. DIAMOND (Monaghan, N.): That is not true.

MR. T. G. BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I move that the words "that is not true" be taken down.

MR. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): The noble Lord will, perhaps, accept the statement of the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) as to the words used.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I should like to make an explanation. The right hon. Member for Birmingham said he should like to get an answer from the Irish Benches, and I said, "They are all dumb."

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I heard the hon. Member for North Louth say, "You are knocked up."

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I am bound to say that the noble Lord has, owing to the noise, misconceived the phrase used. I am bound to say, in justice to the hon. and learned Member for North Louth, that he made no such remark.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: Well, Sir, this is a question which ought to be decided with the Speaker in the Chair.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry): I must, in the interests of fair play, say that what has been stated by the hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) is quite correct. The hon. Member for North Louth did not speak at all. May I state how the mistake arose? The hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) said, "They are all dumb," and the hon. Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill) said, "You are not dumb, and it would be of great advantage if you were."

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the Committee that the words be taken down? [Cries of "No!"] There was so much noise that I am bound to say that I heard nothing. It is clearly not the pleasure of the Committee that the words be taken down.

MR. T. M. HEALY and MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN rose together, and remained standing amid cries of "Order!"

THE CHAIRMAN: Unless the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham gives way he is in possession.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am sure I should not have taken the slightest exception to the words, which have now been accurately given. If the hon. Member (Mr. Mac Neill) thinks it would be a good thing for his Party that we should be dumb, I quite agree with him. I was going to say that the statement made by the Government and adopted by their supporters with regard to the supremacy is perfectly satisfactory; but what we want to know is whether it is accepted in the same sense by hon. Members opposite? It is with reference to that that their silence is so ominous. It is in connection with this that so much importance is to be attached to the past utterances of hon. Members. We do not know what they think now, because they refuse to speak; but we do know what they have said with regard to this subject in the past, and I think myself bound to bring before the Committee what Members occupying conspicuous positions as Leaders of the Party opposite have said on this question of the supremacy. This Bill is in the nature of a treaty between the Members of the Government and the Members representing the Nationalist Party in Ireland. Is it not foolish to conclude a treaty when you have no knowledge whether the other Party accepts it in the same sense as yourself? I will quote first the language of Mr. Parnell, and I do so because, as far as I know, his language has never been repudiated by any Member of the Nationalist Party, to whatever section he belongs. Speaking at Ennis on the 1st February, 1891, Mr. Parnell said—

"We have shown the world that Ireland now, as always, stands fast to her claim to be sovereign within her own kingdom and country; that she refuses to admit any English veto; that she declines to obey the orders, so far as her own business is concerned, of any Imperial or English Minister, taskmaster, or dictator."

That is perfectly clear. Ireland is to be supreme so far as her own business is concerned, and there is to be no English veto. Under this Bill Ireland is not supreme so far as her own legislation is concerned—the English Parliament retains the right to legislate for Ireland. Therefore, Mr. Parnell's first condition is not fulfilled. There is an English veto in this Bill; there is a veto by the Crown on the advice of British Ministers. There are, therefore, two things in this Bill that Mr. Parnell declared for himself and for the Irish people they would never accept. I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite, have they changed their minds? Do they accept them now? I know perfectly well why they are silent in this House except for noisy interruptions. They are silent because they dare not repeat in this House what they have said in the country outside. When some hon. Member referred to what had been said outside he was asked for proofs. I have the proofs here. I have quoted Mr. Parnell. There is not a single Member on the Irish Benches opposite who has repudiated Mr. Parnell's statement. They are to be held bound by that statement, and they are bound by their own statements. I admit there is another hypothesis—they may have changed their minds entirely since 1892; they may now be prepared to accept a subordinate Parliament with an English veto; but they have not said so. I say there is no folly more inconceivable than the folly of hon. Members who, with these facts before them—that in 1892 these gentlemen said they would never accept it, and that they remain silent and will not say they will accept it—still ask the House of Commons to believe they will do so. I now come to the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond). I am sorry he is not in the House. I can give a great number of quotations from him all to the same effect. I have fortified myself in case of interruption, but it may be enough to quote one or two passages. In the Debate which took place in this House on the 15th of February, 1892, the hon. Member said—

“Mr. Parnell said—‘We want a Parliament with full powers to manage the affairs of Ireland, without trenching on any Imperial prerogative or injuring any Imperial or English interest; but the Parliament we must have must be supreme with regard to Irish questions.’ And Mr. Parnell said there should be no veto for the Irish Parliament except such a veto as was exercised in England. He wanted to know whether that was what the right hon. Member for Derby was speaking of when he talked of ‘Mr. Parnell’s Fenian Home Rule?’ There was not an Irish Representative or politician who would accept one jot less as a final or satisfactory settlement of the Home Rule Question than what was contained in that programme of Mr. Parnell’s.”

Can there be anything plainer than that? I suppose the hon. Member for Waterford is accepted as one of the Leaders of the Irish people? You are making a treaty with him which he tells you beforehand that he is not prepared to accept. The hon. Member made a very clever speech the other day, which was evidently intended to minimise the effect of his former declarations; but he in no way contradicted them. It is clear that the hon. Member is willing for his own purposes that this Bill should pass, not as a final settlement, but as an instalment of something better in the future; and he is willing to swallow it with all its defects. But he has never told us that he approves of it. I have one word more to say on the hon. Member, and I hope that some of his Colleagues will tell him what I have said when he returns. The hon. Member said very recently—I think in the article he wrote—that either he or his friends would propose Amendments in the Bill to the effect that the Imperial Parliament should have no right to legislate on Irish affairs. Why has not the hon. Member done so? I should like to know whether the hon. Member is prepared to say in his place in this House that he has not done so because he has changed his mind, and because he is now willing that the Imperial Parliament shall have a right to interfere in Irish affairs. It is said that the Party led by the hon. Member is neglected by the Government; but, at all events, that cannot be said of the Party which is represented by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. M’Carthy). What does the hon. Member for Longford say on this subject? Speaking on the 16th of December, 1892, the hon. Member said—

“Even accepting Sir Edward Reed’s letter, and its reference to Mr. Redmond’s demands, I see nothing in these demands that is extravagant or unreasonable, and therefore cannot conceive that Sir Edward has any real reason to make them the excuse for opposing the Bill.”

That is to say, the hon. Member for Longford adopted the language of the hon. Member for Waterford, and accepted the conclusions he laid down. Will the hon. Member for Longford tell us that he has changed his mind, and that he is prepared to accept the proposition that the Irish Parliament is to be a subordinate Parliament? Of course, if he would say that, that would conclude the argument. We should then have to admit that the treaty between the Government and the Nationalist Party was complete, and that both Parties had accepted its terms. If the hon. Member will not say that, it matters not whether he is silent or not, because we shall be able to put our own interpretation on his silence, and that will be quite sufficient for any purpose we may have in view. I go now to the declarations of the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. W. O’Brien). The first will be found in The Freeman’s Journal of the 29th of January, 1892, as follows:—

“I take it that we are all united in demanding that the Irish Parliament, while it acts within its own province, shall be as free from Imperial meddling as the Parliaments of Australia or Canada.”

Does this Bill give to the Irish people an Australian or a Canadian Constitution? Under this Bill will the Irish Parliament be as free as the Parliaments of Australia and Canada? The hon. Member knows, not only that that is not so, but that Her Majesty's Government have declared that it shall not be so. I ask the hon. Member for Cork what is the precise reservation under which he is prepared to accept this Bill? Then there is another Leader of the Nationalist Party. One never knows who will be the ultimate Leader of the Party, and therefore I quote several. The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), speaking at Dungannon on the 18th October, 1891, said—

"We stand here to-day representing to the fullest the policy which for 15 years we learned from the lips of Parnell himself. We stand here under the old banner of independent Irish nationality."

Speaking on the 6th of December, 1891, the hon. Member used these very remarkable words—

"Then we will try Gladstone. If his Bill gives over the government of this country into the hands of the Nationalists of this country—as I believe it will—our troubles and our struggles will be over. . . . If it does not, we shall go on until we have wrung from the English Parliament a measure of complete emancipation which will restore to our people the right that they lost 100 years ago to manage their own affairs."

["Hear, hear!"] Do hon. Members from Ireland accept that statement? Why do they not cheer again? I do not want hon. Members opposite to say hereafter that I have misunderstood or misrepresented them. I am perfectly satisfied to give up all the other quotations, and will rest myself upon this quotation from the hon. Member for East Mayo.

MR. HARRINGTON: I rise to Order, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is in possession of the Committee. Does the hon. Gentleman rise to Order?

MR. HARRINGTON: I rise to ask another question in reference to your earlier ruling upon a question of Order. I understood you to rule, Sir—

THE CHAIRMAN: We cannot go back to that now.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not wonder at the interruption, and the Committee will see the object of it. The Committee will see to what the hon. Member is reduced when he rises to a point of Order upon a previous ruling of the Chairman.

MR. HARRINGTON: Mr. Chairman—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I have already said that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is in possession of the Committee.

MR. HARRINGTON: An explanation, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member rise to make a personal explanation?

MR. HARRINGTON: Yes, Sir. I wish to say that I did not rise to contest your ruling with reference to the point of Order to which I have referred. I was merely going to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman was not going into details which you had ruled out of Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is out of Order.

MR. HANBURY: I rise to a point of Order, Sir. I wish to ask whether it is your ruling that an hon. Member is in Order in rising to make a personal explanation in the middle of another Member's speech?

THE CHAIRMAN: Certainly not; but I supposed the personal explanation related to one of the passages of the speech that was quoted by the right hon. Gentleman. If that is not the case, I must call upon the right hon. Member for West Birmingham to proceed.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I should wish to point out to the Committee what is the object of these continued interruptions by hon. Members opposite. This is not a small point we are discussing. I have come to a very critical point. I read a passage from the hon. Member for East Mayo, in which he said he and his hon. Friends would go on until they wrung from the English Parliament a measure which would restore to Ireland the Parliament of Grattan. [Cries of "No!"] Very well, then, I will read the whole of the quotation again—

"Then we will try Gladstone. If his Bill gives over the Government of this country into the hands of the Nationalists of this country—as I believe it will—our troubles and our struggles will be over. . . . If it does not, we shall go on until we have wrung from the English Parliament a measure of complete emancipation which will restore to our people the right that they lost 100 years ago to manage their own affairs."

Well, the right they lost 100 years ago was Grattan's Parliament. When I read that before some Members cheered. I asked them whether they cheered it with full knowledge and accepted the view contained in it, and then they hesitated to cheer it again. It may be said that the hon. Member for South Longford (Mr. Blake) has declared that he is willing to accept the subordinate Parliament for Ireland that is proposed by this Bill. But the hon. Member for South Longford has not been long in this House or in this country, and, fortunately, perhaps, for himself, he has no past record in reference to this question, and he may come here and tell us with perfect consistency and sincerity that he accepts this Bill. But I want to know whether hon. Members opposite, who have said again and again in the country that they would not accept this Bill, will now tell us whether they will accept it or not? Hon. Members opposite are silent. They dare not say upon the floor of this House that they accept the definition of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament contained in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. I have said that our decision upon this clause is a Second Reading decision on the Bill. I think I have said enough to show that the Bill is founded on a sham supremacy, upon sham safeguards, and, above all, upon sham finance. It is upon this sham foundation that we are asked, in words that ought to be memorable, to disintegrate the great capital institutions of the country, and to make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of all mankind.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My right hon. Friend who has just sat down treated himself to inquiries into the objects of the interruptions to which he holds himself to be unduly exposed; and, for my part, I am curious to know the object of the speeches of my right hon. Friend, and the singular method which he adopts in those speeches. I think my right hon. Friend is cute enough to know that by far the best method that he has in his hands is time. He can only lead three Parties into the snare he lays for them. He will, notwithstanding the verdict the country has pronounced, continue through their co-operation to carry on debate on this measure to such a length, and to expand its dimensions to such magnitude, that it shall pass beyond the capacity of human strength to deal with it during this Session; and my right hon. Friend will see that which evidently he greatly desires, the prolongation of this controversy and the withholding of all definite settlement from Ireland; and that that policy which has been so disastrous to us in the past shall be prolonged indefinitely in future. I tell him frankly that I think that is his object. The purpose and method he pursues are so extraordinary that by no other possible explanation can I bring it into rational consistency with the end he has in his mind, for which I must give him, and do fully give him, credit. What is my right hon. Friend's method? He complains that his arguments are not answered. From night to night, and from point to point, with infinite reiteration, he says that his arguments are not answered. And he has to-night said that he has had no answer on the subject of Ulster, no answer on the subject of finance, no answer on the subject of the retention of the Irish Members, no answer on the subject of war contribution, and no answer, as he finally winds up his speech by saying, from the Irish Nationalist Members on the subject of supremacy. In regard to the first four questions—Ulster, retention, finance, and war contribution—on every one of these, I say that full and explicit explanation has been given, relatively to the stage at which we have arrived. Among the astounding doctrines of Constitutional and Parliamentary practice in which my right hon. Friend abounds he sets up the doctrine that we should announce at this time not only what he wanted to propose to the House about the retention of Irish Members, not only what we should endeavour to induce the House to accept, but what we would abide by as a question of life and death. He has asked us to shut our minds against discussion in the House. He is anxious to force us to announce, whatever dispositions and determinations are displayed on the part of the Representatives of the people, that there is one rigid stereotyped method of proceeding to which we have tied ourselves, and from which we cannot escape, and my right hon. Friend will then endeavour to set up every expedient against the plan to which we are invited to tie ourselves, whatever that plan be. It means we are to bind ourselves before discussion as to what shall be the result of the discussion on the retention of Irish Members. Is that a reasonable request? Is the retention of Irish Members an original plan of ours? We did not propose to retain Irish Members. We deferred to the great body of opinion in this country. We saw difficulties, and insurmountable difficulties, in the adjustment of details. My right hon. Friend says I give no explanation. I believe that on introducing this Bill I gave for three-quarters of an hour every explanation upon each and every one of those methods of proceeding, and I did not tie myself to one and will not. For that very reason, having deferred to public opinion, having limited ourselves to setting out the whole and full merits of the case without stint and without prejudice, we will defer to public opinion to the end, as to the choice of the way in which we are to give form to that which we believe public opinion has desired and which we believe it does desire, and with respect to which, using our best means of judgment, and asking others to use their best means of judgment, as to the particular form for giving effect to the principle, we shall in that way offer the best solution we can for the best settlement of the question. My right hon. Friend says there has been no statement on this subject, though he heard from the introducer of the Bill on behalf of the Government three-quarters of an hour of explanation. Yesterday or the day before I was making the best explanation my limited faculties will permit—I do not place myself in comparison with my right hon. Friend—and I had occasion in making this explanation to name my right hon. Friend and to refer to him; but, partially turning round, I saw my right hon. Friend was not in his place, and, not hearing the explanation, no doubt he is in a most convenient situation to come down to this House and demand another explanation. My right hon. Friend may, perhaps, recollect that I stated on the Second Reading that the objections to the Bill might be summed up under four heads—gratuitous assertion, persistent misrepresentation, gross exaggeration, and arbitrary prophecy. He has so poor an opinion, I do not say of our principles or policy—he may think what he likes of those—but of our common sense as to suppose that the Government, the Liberal Party, and the Irish Nationalists, are going to be drawn by these taunts of his into playing his game of leading the proceedings on this Bill into indefinite elongation. Sir, we do not intend to take part in that game. He talks about finance. “A pretty business, indeed,” he says. “Finance is to be put off to the close of the Bill, so that the House is first to give a Legislature to Ireland and then be informed of the cost.” Does he think there is any force in that observation? Have we not informed him of the cost already?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No; the profits.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I beg pardon—it is not wrong. There is no mistake. It is a mere question of manipulating the particular fund by which the £500,000 to be granted to Ireland is to be obtained. Supposing that the fund is £100,000 short, we are not thereby released from our pledge about the £500,000. We must find some other adjustment by means of which the balance can be restored. Therefore my right hon. Friend is grossly, entirely, and absolutely wrong, and has not a shadow of justification for it. We have stated the cost in the most explicit terms, and we adhere to them. Of course, if you want to object to a Bill of this kind, so large and involving such a multitude of important particulars—if you have the spirit of objection in you—there is no difficulty in finding materials. That is a very true explanation of the able speech of my right hon. Friend and of the speeches of other hon. Gentlemen when they produce a hash to-day of what was served up yesterday and will probably appear again in cold fragments on future occasions. My right hon. Friend tries to charm us all in this rather weary and unprofitable work; but, I say again, we do not mean to play his game. We have put finance at the end, and we have put the machinery of Irish Government in the beginning, and so he says—“This is a pretty way of proceeding. You want us to erect an Irish Government, and then to learn what it is to cost.”

Suppose we had finance at the beginning of the Bill and the Irish Government at the end, should we have escaped his criticism? No; for he would then say—"The proceeding is preposterous, for you are going to set up a financial plan for a purpose which the House has not yet sanctioned, and as to the manner of fulfilling which we know nothing whatever." That is the spirit of his objections. Suppose we had proposed one Legislative Chamber instead of two, the ingenuity which contrived to cook up a sort of case for voting against the principle of a Second Chamber—an ingenuity evidently put in action by the hope of a brilliant division—but with a somewhat tragic result—would have been exercised with far more facility than against the actual proposal for two Chambers. I am sorry to say it; but we have adopted the principle of doing everything we can to soften animosities and to narrow the ground of hostilities, and every attempt of that kind is treated as a fresh offence. My right hon. Friend says that we mean one thing and the Irish Members mean another by supremacy; that we were making a treaty and professing to agree upon it, whereas the terms were totally different on the one side and on the other. That, he says, is an unanswered argument. Sir, it is one which I endeavoured most specifically to answer on noticing the admirable speech of his youthful relative, on which I again congratulate him. I met it by stating that it was an exaggeration, if it had any basis in fact, but that it happened to be precisely the reverse of the fact. I stated that we had listened to the explanations of the Irish Members on the vital points of supremacy, finality, and interference by the British Parliament in case of necessity for the redress of gross injustice, that we were satisfied with them, and they formed the basis of our proposals. Our opponents say, "That is a very bad and insufficient answer," though I grappled fair and square with the proposition made, denied it in toto, and, I think, proved my denial. I made that denial upon the ground of the speeches of five leading Members of the Irish popular Party, four of them belonging to the Party bearing the name of Nationalist, and the fifth being the Leader of the small section who, for causes not quite intelligible to me and which I will not attempt to describe, differentiate themselves in some degree or other from the mass of the National Party. I accept these expressions. My right hon. Friend has got a bundle of quotations—by which he says he always fortifies himself. Yes; he fortified himself against me the other day, and said that I had asserted that there could be no supremacy unless the Irish Members were in this House. I never said anything of the kind. "Oh," he said, "I have got the papers," and the Party opposite cheered at the expected triumph. He produced the papers, and what did he find? Simply that I had said I had a great respect for the feeling of those who entertained that opinion about the supremacy. Is his understanding so blunted that he never entertains a notion so absurd? Yes; I have respect for many feelings which form the ground of opinions of others, though I do not share those opinions. I am afraid my right hon. Friend differs from me fundamentally in that matter, and that he has no respect for any opinion by whomsoever expressed except his own. He came down with a heavy charge against the hon. Member for Waterford, whose speech on the Second Reading I heard with the utmost satisfaction, and he picked out a quotation from Mr. Parnell, on which I have to say that when Mr. Parnell uttered it he had ceased to be the Leader of the National Party.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It has been accepted since by both sections of the Party.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: But my right hon. Friend came down very heavily on the hon. Member for Waterford, and said—"Oh, I have shown that you have stated other opinions. You state now that you accept the Bill as a settlement, but you have expressed other opinions, and you have never retracted them." Will my right hon. Friend be willing to submit himself to the same test?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Perfectly willing.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No; if the work of retraction is to begin, let him first begin. If we are to stand in a white sheet, my right hon. Friend will wear that ornamental garment the best. I listened to the speeches of the hon. Members for Waterford, for North-East

Cork, for Kerry, for North Longford, and South Longford, and their declarations were clear and unequivocal. I will not say by those declarations I hold them bound, because that would seem as if I entertained a suspicion which I do not entertain; but they hold themselves bound by those declarations. I accept them freely and frankly. I accept their Parliamentary declarations, and I accept Mr. Parnell's declarations of 1886 as solemn and binding and absolute, given in the name of the Irish people, as forming the ground for this House to adopt in the work of legislation. That is the ground on which we stand. I am going to give hon. Members from Ireland a bit of friendly advice. I advise them not to be drawn by my right hon. Friend—not to be drawn by these flattering, seductive, siren-like invitations—into what are sometimes called vain repetitions. As for my own part, if I were in the position of one of those gentlemen—if I had seen the wrongs and sufferings of Ireland in former times, if the iron had entered into my soul as it has entered into theirs—it is possible that I should not have been more temperate than some of them, under the circumstances, in the language I used. It is too much in the case of an oppressed country to exact strict measure of language from those who have suffered that oppression, and especially when it is borne in mind that in Ireland those who have been associated with the oppression claim for themselves an unbounded licence, and threaten prospectively and contingently resistance to the law. I dare say I shall be told that I might just as well have remained mute, and that I have answered nothing. I have tried to answer one or two of my right hon. Friend's points, and when we come to the proper time I will again answer them. But my right hon. Friend thinks our answers bad, and because he thinks them bad he describes them as null. That is not fair. He ought to have compassion upon our limited understanding. The answers we give are the best we can make. Of course, if we cannot satisfy his superior intellect and the superior intellect of the cream of all the classes which, we are told, has been generally, if not universally, drawn into what are called the Unionist ranks, that is our misfortune not our fault. And with his triumphant notes my right hon. Friend ought to mix, for decency's sake, a few syllables of commiseration. However that may be, into the snare laid by my right hon. Friend—I can speak for myself and Colleagues—we will not be driven nor lured. We will be silent, or speak according to our own judgment, and not according to the judgment of my right hon. Friend, and in claiming that reasonable liberty and choice I believe we shall best perform our duty to the country.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he rose to speak upon the Amendment of his hon. Friend behind him, as he objected to Clause 1 in toto.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no Amendment before the Committee. The Question is that Clause 1 stand part of the Bill.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: Then I rise to speak to that; but I understood my hon. Friend moved the omission of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: I wish to explain. There cannot be an Amendment to the proposal that the clause stand part of the Bill.

*SIR R. TEMPLE said, in that case he rose to speak against the clause, and, having the clause before his eyes, he would confine his remarks to the particular Question. The clause had been attacked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) in a speech that was not only magnificent, but also trenchant and incisive. It was answered, or attempted to be answered, by the Prime Minister in a very spirited speech, emphasised with all that noble gesticulation of which he was so great a master, and at the end the right hon. Gentleman frankly remarked that those on that (the Opposition) side of the House would be saying that he had answered nothing. That was exactly what they did say—that the right hon. Gentleman never answered anything, as it appeared to them, that fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Unionist Party in that House; and they could assure the Prime Minister and his Colleagues that that policy would not facilitate business; that they should thunder at his gate day after day and week after week until he did answer such arguments as those brought forward by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. A most remarkable, powerful, and, as they thought, an unanswerable speech was made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney). The Solicitor General (Sir J. Rigby) rose to reply, but his mouth was shut by Closure moved by a right hon. Gentleman on his own side. The Solicitor General was invited, as one of the first legal authorities in this House and the country, to favour them with an opinion, and because he remained silent they should again and again insist on proper legal information being given on this subject. Perhaps he might revert to a remark that fell with great truth and justness from his hon. Friend behind him, who moved that this clause be rejected. His hon. Friend said this was an occasion on which every Englishman ought to record his protest. Well, he was an Englishman, representing an English constituency, and on their behalf he desired to set before the Committee and the country their most solemn and emphatic protest against this clause establishing an Irish Legislature. They would read of the passing of this clause through the Committee with the greatest alarm and apprehension. It was a clause that was abhorrent to their sentiment and contrary to their most cherished convictions; it was a clause which they would never tolerate, and which would be opposed by every means in their electoral power. He wished he could express adequately to the Committee the hatred, the disgust, and dread with which this clause would inspire the five thousand and some odd hundreds of British electors who sent him to the place where he was now standing. He could answer for his constituency, and he believed that all his Parliamentary comrades on that side of the House could answer for theirs. The Prime Minister declared that he accepted the explanations given of this clause by the Irish Nationalist Members who sat below the Gangway. It appeared to him that the Prime Minister must be thankful for very small mercies indeed if he was satisfied with those explanations the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) cited to them by quotation after quotation; how these very Members had expressed, either through themselves or their Party, or their Leaders, sentiments exactly the opposite. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) brought forward statements of opinion made by Irish Members elsewhere that were unequivocal, most explicit, unlimited and unreserved. But the statements made in this House might be very pleasant to hear so far as they went, but they were not explicit as he thought; they were reserved—they were limited. He would not say they were equivocal, as that would not be polite; but they were susceptible, as he thought, of more meanings than one. They could not be blamed if they declined to accept statements made in that House of a limited character as compared to statements outside, which were most unmistakeable, unquestionable, and unlimited, and this, he begged to tell the Government, was the reason for the doubt which they entertained as to the intentions and wishes of the Nationalist Members who sat below the Gangway. After the challenge which had been flung at them by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), he earnestly hoped, even at this the eleventh hour, they would rise and explain themselves. There was a very important phrase that fell from them—namely, that they accepted this settlement or compromise pro tanto, and he believed that phrase pro tanto was repeated by the Prime Minister. Pro tanto—what did that mean? He supposed it meant it was accepted for what it was worth; they took it as far as it went; but he was afraid, from what fell from them, they would accept it merely pro tanto and pro tempore—that was, only for a little while, in the hope that soon many opportunities might arise for altering that settlement in their own favour. There were mentioned in the clause a Legislative Council and a Legislative Assembly. He had known in other countries Legislative Assemblies and Councils that had been really what they were said to be—Councils for legislation only, without any executive power. But they could not regard this clause in that light; they must take it with its context, and that context showed that many things were to follow, and that it was to be accompanied by Executive power;

therefore, they were bound to regard that most essential contingency. This Executive combination, inevitable according to the Bill, the Executive and legislative power conferred by this clause, rendered this new Institution a large fact, and that character could only be mitigated by a clear enunciation of the supremacy of this Parliament, and it was because they had been unable to extract or wring from the Government any businesslike or satisfactory explanation of the supremacy of Parliament that they objected to the clause. The Committee would remember that night after night, and in Debate after Debate, they endeavoured to obtain some declaration of this kind—not in a shadowy Preamble, but in the Enacting Clause—but they had wholly failed to obtain that. The Prime Minister the other day alluded to this Legislative Assembly being really subordinate, and in support of that view he stated that Mr. Parnell had accepted that character of subordination for the Home Rule Parliament to be set up here. At the time he felt uncertain whether Mr. Parnell had ever said so in this House; and not having time to refer to Hansard, he ventured to ask the Government if they would indicate the passage where any such statement could be found in Mr. Parnell's speeches. He was bound to make the statement he did because any such idea was wholly foreign to what he knew to be Mr. Parnell's opinion. He had no particular insight into that gentleman's views, but he had heard every speech Mr. Parnell made in this House since 1886, and had read every important speech Mr. Parnell ever made outside. Well, he acknowledged that, with his usual courtesy, the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. John Morley) at once referred him to a passage of the kind, and he was glad to take this opportunity of admitting that, in his speech on the Second Reading of the Home Rule Bill of 1886, Mr. Parnell did use expressions which seemed to admit and acknowledge the subordination of any Parliament that might be set up in Dublin. That being so, and the Prime Minister assenting to that, he wished to know why the Government resisted the attempts made on that side of the House to insert the word "subordinate" in the clause? If this subordination was to be a strong ground to them for allowing this clause to pass, and if the authority of Mr. Parnell was to be quoted in that behalf, then it would have been much more straightforward and businesslike to admit the word into the Enacting Clause. But, no; as usual, things might be said outside or in speeches and be recorded in Hansard and the like; but when they came to business, and asked that words be inserted in a clause in such a manner that every one, lawyer or layman, could understand them, and the Courts would be able to act upon them, then the Government hesitated, and it was this hesitation that made him and his friends so determined in their opposition to the clause. Allusion had been made in the Prime Minister's speech to Grattan's Parliament. He observed that the right hon. Gentleman at first seemed to imagine he had not so alluded to it, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) clearly showed that Grattan's Parliament had been largely in the right hon. Gentleman's mind; and as an English Member he (Sir R. Temple) might be permitted to say the example of Grattan's Parliament was one of the reasons that weighed in their minds in inducing them to resist this clause, because they thought they had seen how dangerous Grattan's Parliament was to the political safety of the United Kingdom. Grattan's Parliament could not be trusted, and still less could this that they proposed to set up be trusted, and the things done in Grattan's Parliament showed what would be done in this new Legislative Assembly. Grattan's Parliament was set up at the moment of England's difficulty and danger; positively the very zero point of British history was the moment that Parliament was set up, and undoubtedly it would never have been allowed but for the unexampled difficulties this country was in at that moment. Grattan's Parliament ran its course for 18 or 19 years, and within that time—although it was a Parliament consisting mainly of landlords and Protestants, and noble families, of men devoted to that very supremacy they could not get into this Enacting Clause—that Parliament raised some very awkward questions with the Government in London regarding the British supremacy in the Empire. When Grattan's Parliament was ended in 1880

they were then in the very thick of the great war with Napoleon, and the reason for the abolition of that Parliament was the imminent danger which threatened England from the condition of Ireland. They were involved in the great contest that followed the French Revolution, so that the end of Grattan's Parliament, which saw its birth in the midst of England's adversity, came also at the time of England's adversity, within one generation. All these examples of history made them dread the setting up of another Legislative Assembly, the rehabilitation, or the restoration, or whatever they liked to call it, of some Body in Dublin which should, in some degree, represent that Grattan's Parliament which Englishmen considered had so signally failed to satisfy those English interests they were bound to maintain in this House. As regarded Ulster, might he point out for the consideration of his English Parliamentary Colleagues that there was one argument in the case of Ulster which appeared to them to have never been answered and to be unanswerable. Whatever might be stated hereafter about Clause 9, whether they were to have the total absence of Irish Members, or the in-and-out clause, or the omnes and omnia regulation—something must happen. He called them the three horns of the dilemma. Generally speaking, there were only two horns to a dilemma, but this was a dilemma where they had three. Whichever horn of the dilemma was selected, they contended that every Ulsterman, every elector and ratepayer of Belfast, was politically concerned, for he was entitled to say he had a right, an indefensible and inalienable right, by birth, as a British subject, to continue to be represented here, and to have the full power and liberty of a British citizen, and of those privileges he could not be deprived against his will. No answer had been attempted to this question which they, as Englishmen, considered essential to the Ulster case; and until they got some answer to that, or unless their fears were satisfied, the Government might depend on their offering the most strenuous and steadfast resistance they could not only to this clause, but to all the other clauses that might follow. With regard to the Second Chamber, the Prime Minister just now taunted the Members of the great Conservative Party with inconsistency for having voted against the Second Chamber. The right hon. Gentleman considered that was inconsistent with their principles. Of course, they were as anxious as any body of politicians could be to have a Second Chamber drawn from elements different from those composing the Lower House; but they denied that this Legislative Council, composed as it was by this clause, would in any way satisfy those conditions. They affirmed and re-affirmed it was a sham council, which was worse than useless as a check, or as a protection, or as a safeguard, or in any way a bulwark to the supremacy. He entertained a strong objection to the sort of sham House of Lords that it was proposed to set up in Ireland under the guise of a Second Chamber. That it would be a sham House they could not deny. They regarded the proposal, from the point of view of affording protection to the minority, as worse than worthless. In his opinion, foreign examples which were quoted in this direction operated rather as a warning against imitating them than as an inducement to follow them. The right Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) had very properly pointed out that under the provisions of the Bill England would have to pay very heavily for the pleasure of giving Home Rule to Ireland. The expenditure would mean a vast amount to the British taxpayer. The answer which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had given to the objections of the Financial Clauses of the Bill appeared to him to be little short of being childish. It could not be said that the Financial Clauses were satisfactory. It was true that the right hon. Gentleman might attempt to whittle away the powers given to the Irish Legislature under the provisions of the Bill until he reduced that Legislature to the position of a County Council, but that was not the sort of Body which the Nationalist Members contemplated should be established in Dublin. London was ten times as rich as Ireland and just as populous; but London had to get on with a County Council. Ireland, however, did not want that. That was not the sort of Assembly Members from Ireland had in contemplation. There was something more. What they wanted was real legislative authority, and more or less Executive power; and how were they to preserve the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament if they allowed the Executive in Ireland to be supreme? The Irish Assembly proposed by the Bill would be a source of danger to England in time of war, as it would refuse to bear its share in the joint burdens of the two countries when necessity demanded that they should join forces to meet the common enemy; while in time of peace it would repudiate all obligations that might have been entered into by the British taxpayer. Such a Legislature as that would weaken the influence, the prestige, and the authority of this country.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he was going to deliver the first speech that he had deemed it right to deliver in the House on the question involved in the Bill. He did not count as addresses dealing with the point remarks made upon Amendments which might probably have nothing to do with the Bill. They were dealing now with a clause of the Bill, and he thought the discussion upon it would be one of great interest to the people of England. The speeches on the Second Reading of the Bill ranged over all the clauses of the Bill; but the clause now before them was one in which, in his opinion, the people of the country took more interest than they did in all the other clauses put together. They were told that the Assembly to be set up in Dublin was to be a subordinate Legislature. What had they got before them in this clause? They had at last got the full scope of the 1st clause of this Bill before them in all its iniquitous nakedness, and it showed that the Government Home Rule was nothing more nor less than the "Fenian Home Rule" of Mr. Parnell that had been denounced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt), who, although he had recovered from the illness under which he was suffering when the Second Reading of the Bill was being debated, did not seem inclined to come forward and defend the policy of this clause now that he was in good health. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir J. Rigby) appeared to prefer to listen to other people's speeches rather than give the Committee the benefit of his own views with regard to this clause. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister said that he had satisfactorily answered every objection that had been raised against the clause; but if his answers had satisfied the right hon. Gentleman himself, they had satisfied no one else. The right hon. Gentleman said that he did not feel himself bound by Clause 9, relating to the exclusion of the Irish Members, and, therefore, they were all in doubt at present as to what was to be the position of the present Parliament when this Bill was passed. The Irish Members objected to the Irish Parliament being described as subordinate to the Imperial Parliament. As long as the word "subordinate" was left out, it would be said that the new Legislature was a separate and independent Legislature. Who would sign a will or a document unless he knew that the words it contained would fully carry out what he intended? Although every English and Scotch Member on the Ministerial side of the House was pledged up to the hilt in favour of a subordinate Parliament for Ireland, they refused to allow to be placed in the Bill words which would make the Assembly in Dublin an Assembly purely for the management of Irish affairs. So that in setting up this mongrel Parliament they were acting in opposition to every pledge they had given to their constituents. The opponents of the measure had a right on the Second Reading of the clause to press this fact home on the constituencies. There was one advantage from the Debate on the previous day, and that was the speech of the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. J. Bryce), who told them that a Second Chamber was exceedingly useful for the purpose of checking hasty legislation and giving time for consideration. They would remember these words when the Chancellor of the Duchy had forgotten what he had said. The right hon. Gentleman said that the House of Lords would have forgotten its duty if it sent back this Bill to the constituencies. But if this new Second Chamber might check hasty legislation, surely the oldest Chamber in the world might check it too. The public had been told by Ministers what they intended by Home Rule. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that while it was the right of the Irish people to say what they demanded, it was equally the right of English Statesmen to consider what they could recommend the people of this country to accept. Was the Chancellor of the Exchequer prepared to recommend what he called "Fenian Home Rule" to the people of England? Was this House to be governed by Ministers who were themselves governed by the Irish vote? Would the Chancellor of the Duchy deny that the Irish vote was guided not by what was best for Great Britain, but by what was best for what Irish Members had in view? In 1886, within three or four months of the General Election, the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. H. H. Fowler)—a very important Member of the Government, because he was a representative Member, and spoke largely for the Nonconformist Bodies—said, in solemn tones at a Leeds meeting—he did not know its proper name, but he would call it a Schnadhorst Confederation—that the constituencies had spoken in no uncertain voice in favour of local self-government for Ireland, the unity of the Empire, and the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. The President of the Local Government Board carefully avoided speaking on this Bill. Would the right hon. Gentleman now get up and say that this was a Bill to establish a local Parliament in Ireland, and to secure the unity of the Empire and the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament? But the right hon. Gentleman went afterwards to Leicester, and there, perhaps after a warning from Mr. Schnadhorst, said that they would have a more moderate Bill than the Bill of 1886. Was this a more moderate Bill? It was a worse Bill in every respect. He would say, therefore, that these gentlemen went about the country deceiving the people. It might be said that 1886 was ancient history. Then he would come to 1892. In that year the Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith) took a journey into Scotland in company with the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), who was now in his place; and when that hon. Member stated that the Irish people demanded a Parliament which should deal with every subject affecting Ireland without any control from the Imperial Parliament, the Home Secretary said that his view was "that the Body to be established, which was to be called a Parliament, might deal with Irish questions, but that it was to be subject to the interference and control of the Imperial Parliament, which should have the same power to legislate upon Irish questions as it had at the present moment."

Would the right hon. Gentleman—if he spoke in the Debate—deny that he used those words? He (Mr. Heneage) believed that the people of England were being duped into having a worse Bill than that of 1886. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) had laid down very clearly what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had called Fenian Home Rule, and what the hon. Member claimed to be Parnellite Home Rule. If hon. Members were to believe what gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench had by their ambiguous speeches tried to impress upon the House they disagreed from the hon. Member for Waterford on several points. The Member for the City of Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), at one of his meetings, stated that it was in the power of the Irish Members to turn out the Ministry at any moment if they did not carry out their compact with them. But the hon. Member did not say what the compact was. He (Mr. Heneage) did not think many Members on the Ministerial Benches knew what it was.

MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E), Heywood), rising to Order, asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was not wandering from the clause?

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman has been speaking to the clause.

MR. HENEAGE said, it must be a new Member who was interrupting him. He thought it would be very difficult to rule anybody out of Order so long as he was referring in any degree to the speech of the Prime Minister. If that speech had been made by one of the Unionist Members, not one Member of the Irish Party, but the whole phalanx of them would have risen to call him to Order. He did not believe that the Government had any mandate given them in favour of this clause at the last Election. He challenged them on this point. Why did they not create a vacancy? It was well-known that there was at this moment a vacancy for a County Court Judge. Why did they not appoint one of their legal Members to the position? If they would appoint the hon. Member for the Brigg Division of Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy) he would guarantee that the division should be contested. He desired to show that English votes and English opinion had not the slightest power, either in the Cabinet or in the House, at the present time. No statesman representing English opinions ever rose from the Treasury Bench. The Members of the Cabinet who represented the English view of Home Rule preserved an impenetrable silence. The Irish Secretary, of course, was more Irish than the Irish themselves. A Scotch Member occasionally got up to defend the Bill; but no English Member of the Government was ever allowed to speak. He would not further detain the Committee, although he thought that, as this was the first time he had spoken on the main question of this Bill or upon any other Bill respecting Home Rule in Ireland since he resigned office in 1886, he had not unduly occupied the time of the Committee.

*MR. DARLING (Deptford) wished to give a few reasons why he thought an English Member must vote against the 1st clause. Even if it were conceded that some sort of Home Rule Bill should be passed, he could hardly imagine that the 1st clause could be accepted. English Members were, after all, entitled to some consideration in the House, because they expressed their opinions articulately, whilst the Irish Members did not. He could not imagine that any clause could be treated in a manner more hostile to the English Members than this clause had been by the Government. Various Amendments had been proposed respecting the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament; but the Government had sternly refused to insert in the clause any declaration that the Imperial Parliament was to be supreme. On the other hand, any kind of objection taken by the Irish Members to the use of such a word as "subordination" in regard to what ought to be a strictly subordinate Assembly had been at once yielded to by the Government. The Committee was told that Irish susceptibilities must be considered. The English people, however, had their susceptibilities as well as the Irish. The English people had not parted with their pride, and they had their point of honour as well as the Irish, and were more entitled to have it. [Nationalist laughter.] At all events, they knew they had it. Why, if this were a mere prejudice on the part of the English, was it not admitted in the same way as a similar prejudice on the part of the Irish Members was admitted? The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Scotland (Sir George Trevelyan) said long ago that, in the opinion of his Party, the game of law and order was up. It was evidently the right hon. Gentleman's opinion that we ought not to try to govern any more, but should yield everything that was asked without making the bargain too plain, in case the public should understand the foul disgrace of it and revolt against it. This he took to be the principle, as far as there was a principle, on which this Bill was based. He had really heard no reason whatever that could remove from his mind the suspicion that the Cabinet knew very well that the moment this Bill was passed the Irish Parliament would declare that the policy of the deceased Irish Leader had not been abandoned; that everything he ever claimed for Ireland must be realised by law; and that if the English Parliament denied it, the Irish Members would come to Westminster, point to their power to turn out an English Ministry, and declare that the Irish Parliament must be as independent as Mr. Parnell said it should be, and they themselves had never said it should not be. Every Amendment which had been moved by an Irish Member on this Bill had been in favour of enlarging the power which the Bill gave. How could the right hon. Gentleman opposite profess to believe that Ireland was content with this measure when the only arguments used by the Irish Members had been for the enlargement of the powers of the Bill? They had had fair notice from the Irish Members that they were not satisfied. The Irish Members would have to take what they could get and go away; but, in the meantime, they had given the Government notice that they desired a Parliament — a Senate and a House of Commons. The Government had refused this; but, knowing what they did of their Irish friends, did they expect that they had heard the last of these things? How long would it be before the Irish Members came back and renewed their application? Why, they would do so before the termination of the official lives of the present Ministry, and he could hardly name a shorter period. Remembering that Mr. Parnell had declared on oath that he had made a false statement in the House of Commons with the object of entrapping and deceiving the House, and remembering that there were still some Irish Members who did not repudiate either Mr. Parnell's leadership or his morals, it was very probable that any statement which came from the Irish Benches would be received with the utmost incredulity. [Cries of "Divide!"] Until someone had got up from the Irish Benches, and had entirely disavowed the political methods of Mr. Parnell, and had said that he did not approve of Mr. Parnell's method of treating the House of Commons, it would be useless for Irish Members to give the House any kind of assurance. He did not wish to depreciate the Irish Representatives, but this he would say: that there was not one of those Members who stood higher in the estimation of the House than Mr. Parnell stood. Was there a Gladstonian who would say that he ranked any Irish Member higher than Mr. Parnell? [Cries of "Divide!" and "Question!"] And what was the value of Mr. Parnell's assurances to the House? Nothing! For that hon. Members had Mr. Parnell's own word on oath; and he certainly did not put the assurances of the Nationalist Members higher. The Irish Members had, therefore, shown not only profound political discretion, but a nice sense of what was due to hon. Members opposite, by not attempting to delude the House with any assurances whatever.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland) said, the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had concluded by making a violent attack upon a dead great man.

An hon. MEMBER: No, he did not.

*MR. DARLING: I made no attack upon Mr. Parnell. I praised him at the expense of those who have survived him.

MR. STOREY said, that if the hon. Gentleman had made the attack honestly and openly he should have thought more of him. He would remind the hon. Member that he had said that Mr. Parnell stated one thing in one place and another thing in another place.

An hon. MEMBER: Do you deny it?

MR. STOREY: Surely that was an attack on Mr. Parnell? He had known Mr. Parnell well, and he respectfully said to the House that it would minister to their sense of propriety, and would be more in consonance with propriety and with Conservative traditions, if those who were dead were left alone. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that the policy of the Government seemed to be to yield everything that was asked.

MR. DARLING: No, no!

MR. STOREY said, the hon. Member had used those words. He had taken them down at the time.

*MR. DARLING said, he had drawn particular attention to several things that had been asked but which had not been granted, and as to which the Government had given no reply.

MR. STOREY said, that if the hon. and learned Member thought he did not make use of the words he (Mr. Storey) had taken down he would not press the matter. The reason he interposed was because complaint had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham that the supporters of the Government did not speak and did not move Amendments. Well, he admitted that they did not speak; but he put it to the right hon. Gentleman, who was a very frank man, whether, if he had been sitting on the Treasury Bench as a Minister of the Crown—and Heaven knew he wished the right hon. Gentleman had been—if, instead of opposing the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman had been defending and supporting it—which was a possible supposition, what would have been his counsel to himself (Mr. Storey) and other independent Members of his Party? It would have been to "hold your tongues as much as you can vote square, and leave the Amendments to your opponents." Knowing the right hon. Gentleman's internal convictions on this matter he did not listen to his public speeches, which were drawn from him by the exigencies of his present unfortunate position; but he respected his inner consciousness, and obeyed what he knew was the right hon. Gentleman's interior thought. The right hon. Gentleman said that the supporters of the Government did not propose Amendments to the Bill. He was quite wrong. They had not proposed any Amendments on Clause 1, and why?—because, again guided by that reverence for the right hon. Gentleman's ancient authority which they all had in their hearts—[laughter—yes, ancient respect though present sorrow for a good man gone wrong—they agreed with every word in the clause. While the right hon. Gentleman was making his speech he had counted up the Liberal Amendments to the Bill, and he found there were 104 of them. He might tell his right hon. Friend—for he was sure it would comfort him—that some of the Amendments, at any rate, would be persisted in. With regard to the clause he was going to vote for it, because he believed it was a proper and righteous thing to do. What was the whole of the right hon. Gentleman's argument? It was that before he voted for the clause under consideration he must be told what the Government were going to do as to the supremacy, the retention of the Irish Members, and finance. And then the right hon. Gentleman challenged hon. Members to say frankly what they thought on those points. He would give the right hon. Gentleman two answers. He would tell the right hon. Gentleman what he thought about the supremacy when they came to Clause 6, what he had to say about the retention when they came to Clause 9, and he would tell him what he thought about finance when they came to Clause 10. That did not satisfy the right hon. Gentleman. He wanted a present answer. Very well; he (Mr. Storey) would give a present answer. He had no authority to speak for a single Member besides himself; but he would speak what he knew to be the opinion of a considerable number of hon. Members, and what he was sure was the opinion of the honest, intelligent Radicals in the North of England—he would say what they meant by supremacy for the Irish Parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not a Parliament.

MR. STOREY: Yes, it was a Parliament. A Parliament was a speaking House, and no one would deny that the House on College Green would be that. It was to be an Assembly of Irishmen, elected by the Irish people upon the broadest franchise that they could get, to carry on the business of Ireland in Ireland for the benefit of the Irish people, and within that scope it was to do as it pleased without any meddling interference from hon. Members here. There were many hon. Members opposite willing to take sensible views; and though he was an old Home Ruler and anxious to get Home Rule as soon as possible, he believed that by the arrangements of Providence it would probably be a Tory Government that would pass Home Rule. They were sure to have Home Rule at some time or other passed by someone. If an Irish Parliament was not to manage Irish affairs according to its judgment there was only one alternative. The measures of the Irish Parliament must be reviewed and decided upon here. Did hon. Members opposite contemplate with satisfaction such an idea as that? It was bad enough now to have Irish matters here; but if those matters were first debated in Dublin and then reviewed here; what would become of those British measures which hon. Members opposite wanted so much to get passed? If they did not have that, it followed that they must leave substantial control in Irish matters to the Irish Parliament—and that was what he meant by supremacy. Now, as to retention, he would tell hon. Members opposite what he meant by it. He would say what he was going to do. He was in favour of the Irish Members being left at Westminster, for he contemplated the time—though the right hon. Gentleman rather giped some of them for contemplating it—when there would be an Assembly in England for English affairs, in Scotland for Scotch affairs, in Wales for Welsh affairs, and in Ireland for Irish affairs.

Several hon. MEMBERS: "And for Durham," "And the Isle of Wight," "And Sunderland."

MR. STOREY said, he called this too bad. Hon. Members opposite asked for a frank expression of opinion; he gave them his, and then they interrupted with all sorts of jocular observations. It was not kind—it was not fair. He contemplated that, and contemplating that he was in favour of keeping the Irish Members here, because everyone could see, if that condition of things were achieved, the Imperial question settled itself. There would be nothing but Imperial questions to be settled by this Imperial House. And now he came to finance. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. He did not care how they did it, but he maintained that England was not going to give this Assembly to Ireland unless they gave it in such a financial position that it would have a reasonable chance of successfully conducting the affairs of the country. It was said the plan in the Bill did not suit—that the figures did not fit. That was quite probable. If the right hon. Gentleman himself (Mr. Chamberlain) had been in the Ministry it would have been probable.

An hon. MEMBER: He said he would "square the books."

MR. STOREY said, he came from a part of the country where the people were very careful of their bawbees—almost as careful as the Scotch, and that was saying a good deal. They were not disposed to waste money, but his view was that Ireland, when it started on this business, should start on a satisfactory footing. If there was to be a settlement they should remember the old history of Ireland and England. They should remember that they had done Ireland wrong in the past, and should settle the contribution of Ireland by her possibilities. If he had to strike a balance he should give something in, and make such a settlement as a man made with a gentleman he had wronged. Did the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham think he had spoken frankly?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Hear, hear!

MR. STOREY said, if the right hon. Gentleman thought so he was satisfied. In conclusion, would the right hon. Gentleman permit him, as an old friend, to say this: the right hon. Gentleman had frequently been kind to him, and he did not think he had been unkind to the right hon. Gentleman. He would venture to say to the right hon. Gentleman that he thought it would be well if he would remember his ancient relations with the Liberal Party. Knowing the right hon. Gentleman's capacity and the bent of his mind, and his sound convictions upon many democratic questions, he thought it would be well for him not to waste his strength in the House in being the swash-buckler of the Tory Party, but would contemplate the time when in happier circumstances—

An hon. MEMBER: Never.

MR. STOREY: An hon. Member said "Never." He hoped he was a new Member. He (Mr. Storey) had been long enough in the House to know that political animosities died out. He did not refuse to acknowledge the prominent services the right hon. Gentleman had rendered to Radicalism in the past; and he, for one, still hoped when in happier circumstances, this wretched business being settled, the right hon. Gentleman and himself, and many other Radicals there, might be spared to act together for the relief of the toilers, and to act together to take ransom from those who did not toil or spin. He had made a speech. He had spoken exactly what he thought, and what a great many more were thinking, and if they did not speak again and again it was because they were practically common-sense men. They wanted this Bill to pass, and every speech they made only postponed that happy consummation.

MR. E. STANHOPE (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The hon. Member who has just sat down has claimed for himself that he has made a frank explanation. Well, it certainly has been very frank.

He has sketched out to us a Bill for giving Home Rule to Ireland very different from the Bill now on the Table, and he also indicated to us a programme by means of which, when this wretched Bill is out of the way—

MR. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman quite misunderstood me. I did not say "wretched Bill."

Several hon. MEMBERS: Yes, you did. [Cries of "No!"]

MR. STOREY: I said, "this wretched business," meaning the cleavage between the Radical Party and some of their former friends.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Of course, I accept the hon. Member's statement. The hon. Member then pointed to a time when, this wretched business being out of the way, the Gladstonian Party might be expected to return within the fold of the old Liberal Party from which they departed seven years ago. I must say I think that his explanation was not only singularly frank, but was one that was very welcome to us on this side of the House, because we are perfectly persuaded that any body or Party who puts forward such a programme would not have the slightest chance of securing its acceptance at the hands of the people of the country. But I desire to turn for a few moments to another speech—to that of the Prime Minister. I do not for a moment desire to make a complaint as to his absence from the House. We can all understand it; but I should like to say that after having elaborated the objections he had to answer, and having expressed a desire to answer all of them, he sat down without having answered a single one. He made a statement which filled me with surprise. He said that he had previously given explanations of all the points raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham at an earlier period of the evening. A more astounding statement was never made in Parliament. If the right hon. Gentleman made such explanations he has not made them clear to this House, which is still in as much doubt as it ever was as to the intentions of the Government upon some of the most important provisions in the Bill. No doubt the reason he is unable to make his explanations clear to us is because he lives upon a different planet to us. The right hon. Gentleman sits down feeling certain of having demolished the arguments we have brought forward, and feeling certain that nothing remains to be answered; and yet we feel that, somehow or other, the fog which surrounds this subject has not been lifted, but has been made more dense than it was before. I cannot help referring to a statement made to me a good many years ago by a witness absolutely unimpeachable. I was often told by my father that in 1845, when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) retired from the Government then in power, Sir James Graham wrote a letter to Sir Robert Peel in which he referred to the impending resignation of the right hon. Gentleman; and he said in the conclusion of his letter it was no doubt a misfortune that Mr. Gladstone had failed to seal a letter he had sent, but that in his case, perhaps, it did not matter, as he (Sir James Graham) would defy any postmaster in the Kingdom, having read it from beginning to end and many times over, to arrive at the faintest glimpse of the right hon. Gentleman's meaning. If the right hon. Gentleman has made an explanation he certainly has not made it to the House. No doubt he has made it to hon. Members below the Gangway. That we can well understand. They know a great deal of his intentions—a great deal more than hon. Members sitting behind him can know, or pretend to know. The Opposition have been kept wilfully in the dark with regard to the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman and his Government with regard to this Bill. As a matter of fact, he has made no explanation at all. I would ask any candid man, for instance, whether any satisfactory explanation has been given as to the position which Ulster will occupy under the Bill? It is true that in 1886 the right hon. Gentleman said that if hon. Members representing Ulster were to express a strong desire to be excluded from the operations of the Bill the Government would be perfectly prepared to reconsider the matter; but he now says that he has never been able to extract from the discussions in this House any opinion from the Ulster Representatives to that effect.

Then take the Financial Clauses. Is it conceivable that the right hon. Gentleman can contend that any explanation has been given to the House with regard to the future position of the Financial Clauses? Why, he has met all our criticisms and objections by simply saying that the Financial Clauses are going to be postponed until the end of the Bill. We, of course, know that that means that he intends to postpone them until he has made a compact with hon. Members below the Gangway. When he tells us he has informed us fully of the cost of the Home Rule proposal to this country, he is stating—without, I am sure, a desire to deceive us—something that is not the fact. We do not know the cost. All that we have yet been told is that the calculations on which the original proposal was made were wrong.

DR. CLARK : I rise to Order. The right hon. Gentleman has been talking for five minutes about the Financial Clauses; but I understand that the Question is that Clause 1 stand part of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN : That is so, but, as I have already pointed out, it is impossible to prevent hon. Members referring to questions such as these. But, at the same time, it is out of Order to discuss the details of other clauses.

*MR. E. STANHOPE : I submit to your ruling, Sir. All I am pointing out is that the Prime Minister, although he said that he had given an explanation as to the questions put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, has, as a matter of fact, offered no explanation at all. I find another matter which has arisen on the Second Reading of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Brodrick) raised objections to the Financial Clauses. Nobody can deny that the speech of my hon. Friend was cogent, keen, and powerful. No reply has ever been attempted to those objections. If my hon. Friend was right, instead of the Irish Government starting with a surplus, they will begin with a deficit. I should have thought that to any such allegation, supported as it was by figures, an attempt, at least, at an answer would be made by the Government against whom it was directed; but it has not been answered, or attempted to be answered, by the Government. Again, the Prime Minister also said that he had given an explanation with regard to the retention of the Irish Members in the House of Commons. Is it possible that any such statement can deceive any man in this House? Why, he has also told us that he is waiting for Clause 9 to make a statement on the subject, and that if we want to get a complete view of the intentions of the Government in this respect, we must wait until Clause 9 comes under discussion. The right hon. Gentleman then went on to say that upon the First Reading he spoke for three-quarters of an hour about the retention of the Irish Members. That is perfectly true, but he spent all that three-quarters of an hour arguing against the proposal in his own Bill. Then the right hon. Gentleman asks us not to shut our minds against any arguments that may be adduced hereafter. Now, we have never shut our minds to any arguments that may be adduced on this subject; but while every faculty of which the right hon. Gentleman is possessed is directed to gain any indication of opinion from Irish Members, his mind is shut to every argument of his opponents. The right hon. Gentleman then went on to say that the explanations he had previously given were the best the Government had to offer. I can very well understand that, for as in the course of the previous discussion on the Bill practically no answer whatever was given to the main arguments we adduced, so now, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham repeats a question to which hitherto he has received no answer, the Prime Minister might very well take refuge in saying that the explanation he has already given is all the answer that he has to give. The right hon. Gentleman told us, indeed, that there was a happy time coming—what he called a “proper time”—when he will give us a proper answer. In my opinion that time will never arrive. When, upon the 1st clause, we asked for the intentions of the Government, the right hon. Gentleman put us off to a later clause, so, at a later stage, if we attempt to raise a discussion, the right hon. Gentleman will tell us that it is too late, and that we have missed our opportunity, as the clause on which an explanation might be given was passed. I believe the proper opportunity to propose an Amendment, or to ask any question, to meet with the approval of the right hon. Gentleman passes the wit of man to determine. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Opposition desire to prolong the controversy. I can assure the Committee that we do not want to prolong it beyond the point when a plain issue is submitted to the people of this country. The people of this country are no longer to be hoodwinked by having put before them all sorts of inducements to vote for Home Rule, except the explanation of what Home Rule means. We desire that a plain issue shall be placed before the country at the earliest possible opportunity; and we desire that that issue should be decided, not by what the right hon. Gentleman calls the cream of all classes, but by the free voices of all the people of this country, educated as they have been by seven years' experience, and still more by the education they are receiving by the discussions on the Bill. We have no fear of the result, and are perfectly sure that, in the words of the Prime Minister, the Bill, which is a hash to-day, will be a cold fragment to-morrow. The right hon. Gentleman also says that he will choose the moments which, in his judgment, are most suitable for giving information on the provisions of this Bill. We cannot help that. The right hon. Gentleman, of course, is entitled to use his own discretion. But we, on our part, are entitled to use every opportunity that is given us to express our opinions upon the provisions of this Bill; and we are entitled to say, as I want to say now, that there are many reasons why we should think that the Bill at the present time is a worse Bill than when it was introduced. On the 1st clause we tried to obtain information, to introduce Amendments, and to secure safeguards; but we failed in all those endeavours. We endeavoured to discover whether the interpretation placed upon the Bill by the Government was the same as that placed upon it by their Irish allies below the Gangway; but the right hon.

Mr. E. Stanhope

Gentleman was determined that we should not find that out, and so, he, in the plainest terms, told those Irish allies not to speak at all. When the Nationalist Members were challenged by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham whether they adhered to the statements which they made to their constituents in respect to this Bill, and whether they would venture to repeat those statements in this House, the Prime Minister advised them not to utter a single word. The fact is that the greater part of this Bill is still unsettled. A considerable part of this Bill is going to be thrown into the arena of discussion in the House of Commons. We are without definite knowledge of the intentions of the Government as to what they will insist upon. But we know they will not be guided mainly by the discussions that take place; they will mainly be guided by the attitude assumed by hon. Members below the Gangway. Therefore, I venture to say that I have proved the proposition with which I set out—that we are entitled to regard this Bill, if possible, with greater dislike than we looked upon it at the beginning of the discussion. We are asked to establish in Ireland a separate Legislative Body, constituted we do not know how, and whose relations with the Imperial Parliament are, at the present moment, altogether undefined. We are entitled to reason as to the effects and results of an Irish Parliament from the character, the antecedents, and the recorded utterances of those who are going to administer that Parliament; and, if we are to judge from the utterances of Irish Members, there can be no doubt as to the objects and intentions with which they are going to accept an Irish Parliament. The Prime Minister said he accepted their Parliamentary declarations as complete as to the manner in which they would administer the Parliament; but the right hon. Gentleman said the same thing in 1886. And surely he ought to be enlightened by the proceedings of No. 15 Committee Room, when the Irish Members repudiated the interpretation which had been placed on their views, and showed very plainly that the objects for which they desired a separate Parliament and the manner in which they would administer it were altogether different from their professions in this House. Of course, it will be said that our fears as to the action of the Irish Parliament will not be realised. I am not concerned to argue that at all. The question is whether it is possible, and if it be possible for the fears which the Opposition entertain to be realised we have a right to examine the provisions of the Bill with every care to see whether there is anything in it that will afford security. I attach no value to any of the safeguards proposed; you may put in 50 more, or take all out, and the result will be just the same. If they are of any value, the mere insertion of them in the Bill will lead to an agitation for their removal the moment the separate Parliament is established. The Government themselves attach no value to these safeguards. The Secretary for War told us on the First Reading of the Bill that they were put in to assuage the fears of innocent persons. We are not so innocent, as we believe the Parliament to be established will practically be an independent one. Some Ministerial Members dislike the Bill as much as we do; but they solace themselves with certain crumbs of comfort. One of these is our experience of Legislatures in the Colonies. They tell us that there are many Parliaments in the Colonies, and that the addition of another one in Ireland cannot, after all, endanger our Imperial supremacy. I will give only one objection, but it is an objection which, I think, goes to the very root of the matter. When we gave Legislatures to the Colonies we abandoned all ideas of forcing our wishes upon them. A Colony might cut off the salary of a Governor, or enter into a Treaty against the wishes of the Imperial Government with a Foreign Power, and we could not send troops to compel that Colony to respect our wishes. The fact is, our relations with the Colonies rest entirely upon the goodwill of both parties to the contract. They have got the power of separation. They could leave us to-morrow if they wished. But they are attached to us by friendly feelings—by feelings of attachment towards the Mother Country. Will anyone venture to say that the case is the same as regards Ireland? There we are going to retain a supreme, a coercive power—a power that we can use, and that we intend to use, and, as I believe, we will have to use if Ireland gets this independent Parliament, with the chance of separation at an early date. It has been said over and over again that there is no danger, because we have an Army and a Navy to enforce our decrees. Very shortly the Committee will have to argue that question in detail; and I believe it will be shown that the position of the Imperial troops in Ireland, dangerous as it may be in time of peace, will be even more dangerous in time of war. If the Irish Parliament thinks fit, not necessarily by legislation, to carry out acts calculated to undermine the position of isolated individuals, such as the landowner, or to take away his property, how is it possible for the Army of Great Britain to afford him any protection at all. I deny, also, that the presence of the Army can be of any value to isolated individuals if it is going to be used against the Civil Authority in Ireland, unless you are prepared to face the terrible calamity of civil war. I have only one further objection to raise. It is the favourite argument of the Chief Secretary that increased responsibilities placed upon Irish Representatives will be a guarantee that they will use their powers rightly and well, and will do their best to have their legal obligations respected. I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman strongly entertains that view; but we do not agree with him in his estimate of the Irish people. Even if the Irish Leaders have these intentions, I believe the power has gone from them to act upon them. For years they have been leading the Irish people to believe that their obligations need not be respected. They have advocated the Plan of No Rent. They have supported, and supported even by violence, the Plan of Campaign. They have supported all resistance to legal obligations, until it is perfectly notorious that at the present time many of the people of Ireland are looking forward to Home Rule because they believe they are going to get everything for nothing. If the Irish Leaders get the power they will be called upon to make good their promises. I, therefore, object to this clause, because it is dangerous in principle and practice, because it would place those into whose hands the government of Ireland would fall in such a position that they would be unable to act except in accordance with the pledges they had given to the Irish people, and because it must inevitably lead to further breaking up of the Imperial Parliament. We know that the Prime Minister no longer entertains the opinions which, judging from his past speeches, we thought he did entertain. But that is not the case with many of the right hon. Gentleman's Colleagues, who look at the grant of a separate Parliament to Ireland as a first step to the creation of separate Parliaments for Scotland, Wales, and England also. Well, I object to this separate Parliament because it is a step in that direction. If these right hon. Gentlemen put their views upon paper and endeavour to work out separate Legislatures for the different parts of the United Kingdom in the shape of Bills, the first thing that will happen will be that their scheme will be laughed out of the House of Commons. The Parliament of the United Kingdom fulfils all the objects for which it exists; and any changes which have been effected in Ireland, so far from diminishing, have increased the responsibility of the Imperial Parliament, and their obligations to protect all the minorities of the Irish people. We, Sir, at any rate can have no doubt. We must oppose the grant of a separate Parliament to Ireland, under whatever guise or whatever form that separate Parliament may be proposed.

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir JOHN RIGBY, Forfar): I will not interpose long between the Committee and the Division. I will not waste time by following hon. and right hon. Members into a discussion which the right hon. Member for Birmingham, at the beginning of his speech, said was in the nature of a Second Reading discussion. My task is comparatively a humble one. I hope to address myself to that part of the Debate upon this 1st clause which has to do with the question of Constitutional Law. I have been amused—I have been surprised at some of the claims, real or affected, which have been put forward by hon. Members on the other side. I acknowledge that there may be truth in a way in what the right hon. Member for Cambridge University has said, that a Law Officer is obliged to give his opinion to the House. So it may be. I hope I shall never shrink from my responsibility on that head. But to put forward a suggestion that it is the right of any hon. Member of the Opposition to demand that at any time he asked for it the Law Officer should give an opinion upon a question which that Law Officer might think futile or silly—it might be an important question, but, in his humble judgment, ill-timed—to put forward a suggestion of that kind is a thing I have never heard of, and until it is shown to me to be the recognised rule of Parliamentary life I should never submit to it. The kind attentions which have been paid to me confirmed me the more in thinking that I was right in abstaining from speaking on this Bill. I wished to know what were the points upon which the House, or any section of the House, really wished that an opinion should be given; I wished, as the Debate went on, to know precisely the extent of the claims which are supposed to be valid as against a man in my position, and at last I heard a complaint made to the effect that I listened for a longer time than I spoke. That I hope will always be the case. Only two points of Constitutional Law, as I understand, have been raised since the Bill has been in Committee. One was by the hon. and learned Member for Deptford as to the right to name Her Majesty the Queen as a branch of Parliament. If a Law Officer is to answer questions of that kind, his time would be fully occupied indeed. If the hon. and learned Gentleman who raised the question had taken the trouble to look at the nearest text-book at hand, he would ascertain, without doubt, what the law is. Questions of that kind are idle and futile, whether they are put forward by learned or unlearned gentlemen. Members of this House who do not profess to be learned in the law might well put forward such a question, and might well ask for a fair answer; but when it is put forward by a learned Gentleman, it is, I say, idle and futile. The Constitutional view as to the supremacy of the Parliament of the United Kingdom now, or after a Bill of the general character of that before the Committee has been passed, is a question on which I have not been silent before. I have nothing new to say on the point. What I said on the Second Reading of the Bill I will say again—that, supposing this Bill becomes an Act of Parliament, the United Kingdom will still be the United Kingdom, and Ireland will be a part of it. This Parliament of the United Kingdom will remain, to all intents and purposes, the Parliament of the United Kingdom, including Ireland. Not one jot or tittle of the authority of this Parliament will be taken away by such a Bill as this; and further than that, I affirm that it is Constitutionally impossible that this Parliament, by any Bill it could pass into law, could deprive itself of that authority. This has been proved by numerous instances, and by none more than by the cases that arose under the Act of Union with Scotland and the Act of Union with Ireland. Under both of those Acts the Parliament for the time being—in the first case, the Parliament of Great Britain, and afterwards the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland—efforts were made to establish a Constitution which should last for ever, which, in other words, should bind future Parliaments; but it was held that those efforts were altogether unavailing, because the Parliament for the time being had no right or authority to limit or restrict in any way the authority of its successors. With regard to both the Act of Union with Scotland and the Act of Union with Ireland, most important parts affecting the very essence of the Acts have been repealed, although the arguments which are now advanced were then insisted upon. Those Parliaments of the 18th, and the beginning of the 19th, centuries could only make the law for their time, and the supreme power and authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom remained to undo that law, however plain the language might be expressed that the Parliament of the time did not intend that it should be removed. I do not hesitate to say that I prefer that the Parliamentary draftsman should say nothing in a Bill of this kind about the supreme authority of Parliament. It appears to me that the most workmanlike way is to leave the matter alone, for we have no power to interfere with that authority, and therefore it is of little avail to attempt to support and establish it by words more or less plain. But if it can be shown that some advantage would be gained by departing from this plain rule of what I shall call proper Parliamentary drafting, we might perhaps give way. If it be thought that consciences would be quieted or that some doubtful opinions would be converted into certainty by a declaration of the supremacy of Parliament, then it may be worth while to print that declaration. But if it is to be done, it certainly ought not to be done in a proviso upon a particular clause of the Bill. That course is more likely to raise doubts than to allay doubts. If anything is to be done with the object of recognising the continued supremacy of Parliament, it ought to be something that will affect the whole measure. Let it be as simple as possible; let it be as general as possible, bearing always in mind that too limited a declaration would probably do harm by raising additional doubts, while the declaration cannot be too extensive, because it is impossible to increase that which is already supreme and unlimited. Of the proposals which I have heard none of them meet this objection. The Committee knows from what has been already stated by the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary, that if an independent clause, which ought to be placed at the beginning or the end of the Bill and not in the middle, is brought forward for the purpose of recognising the superiority of the Imperial Parliament, it will be considered. Care, however, must be taken not to create doubt where none really exists by the use of doubtful phrases. The right hon. Member for Bodmin asked whether the authority of Parliament was to be vital or whether it was to be sterile. This House cannot say what it is to be. It is beyond the jurisdiction of this House. If we were to enact in the plainest language that that authority should determine to-morrow, in the next Session of Parliament an Act might be passed reviving it in full force. It is useless to attempt to lay down what shall be the extent of the authority, for the subject by its nature evades us. If the Bill passes into law the Irish Legislature will be under great obligations—I do not say more than obligations of self-interest, self-justification and common sense—to take the greatest pains not to exceed the limits that will have been imposed upon it and accepted by it, and it must also take the greatest pains not to do anything within those limits which would be plainly subversive of natural justice, for such action would rouse the indignation of this country and the world; and if it should be indulged in the supreme authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, would be felt at once as a vital authority. But if the Irish Legislature should not be guilty of such acts—which we believe will be the exact result—it need not fear any meddling on the part of the Imperial Parliament. An authority may be vital without being meddlesome; it need not be sterile because it is dormant and has to wait for the occasion when it arises.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): Mr. Mellor, I rise to move that you do report Progress. The clause under discussion is one of great interest, and more time is required for its discussion. Some of the speeches that have been made still remain unanswered. I wish also to point out that, so far as I am aware, not a single hon. Gentleman from Ulster has had an opportunity of expressing his views. I therefore move that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. J. MORLEY: I am sorry to say, Sir, I cannot accept this Motion. It is quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, that we have been debating this Motion five hours. But what have we been debating? The 1st clause contains the assertion that there shall be established a Legislature in Ireland. Surely that proposition was accepted by the House on the vote for the Second Reading. Then there are two Committee points. The first is, that there shall be two Houses of that Legislature. That has been established after debate by the vote of the Committee. The second Committee point in the clause is the names of these two Bodies of the Legislature. These questions have been decided after debate and by a Division. I submit, Sir, with all respect, that most of what we have heard to-night, including the powerful speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, has been Second Reading debate, and not debate upon the clause at all. All I can say is that, so far as I understand, this kind of debate upon a clause is an immense innovation in Parliamentary practice; and if upon every clause of this Bill you are to raise, and you may raise, the principle you are trying to establish to-night, all these Second Reading questions which have been raised and discussed to-night, this Bill will not be out of Committee in 12 months. [Opposition cheers.] I quite understand why you cheer; but let this be understood—that we shall do all we can in accordance with the Forms of the House, as rightly understood and interpreted in conformity with the traditions of the House—we shall do all we can to resist your tactics. We shall oppose this Motion and take care, if it should be attempted to carry out the same tactics that you have attempted to-night—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR; No tactics. [Cries of "Withdraw!"]

MR. J. MORLEY: Surely, Mr. Mellor, to say that the word "tactics" is out of Order is a most childish contention. I beg to move that the Question be now put.

THE CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 260; Noes 304.—(Division List, No. 79.)

MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I beg to move that the Question be now put.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

House resumed.

It being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the Clock.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the manner in which the Railway Companies have exercised the powers conferred upon them by the Railway Rates and Charges Order Confirmation Acts, 1891 and 1892, and to consider whether it is desirable to adopt any other than the existing means of settling differences arising between the companies and the public with respect to the rates and conditions of charge for the conveyance of goods, and to report what means they recommend.

That the Committee do consist of Seventeen Members."—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)

Objection taken to the Motion.

MR. MARJORIBANKS : I understand it was arranged that the Reference should be moved to-night, and that the names of the Committee should be nominated on Monday.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : Will it be taken as the first Business on Monday ?

MR. MARJORIBANKS : No, Sir.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

APPLICATION OF THE CLOSURE—PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

MR. WHITBREAD (Bedford) : On this Motion, Mr. Speaker, I desire with your permission to offer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Sir John Gorst) an opportunity of making some explanation upon an incident which took place before, Sir, you came back again to the Chair. The facts, as far as I am concerned, are briefly these : I was standing at the back of the Chair with others, and there was a debate amongst some friends as to whether it was possible to move the Closure after the hour of 12 o'clock to-night and after the Division on the Motion to report Progress. I was of opinion that it was possible to move the Closure, and, passing out in the Division, I lent across the Table, and, addressing the Clerk at the Table—not the Chairman—I used these words to him :—"We are entitled, are we not, to claim to move the Closure after this Division ?" Upon which the right hon. Gentleman and his friends who were standing near him in a loud tone—in tones calculated to be offensive—shouted out across the Table, "Shame, shame !" I then said, "What is that you say ?" not being sure that I heard aright, and the expression was repeated. I submit, Mr. Speaker, to your judgment that this is not a Parliamentary word—that it is a word that cannot be used by one Member to another in this House ; and that if such conduct is pursued it will render life in this House, I think, perfectly intolerable. When the right hon. Gentleman shouted "Shame" I went to him and asked him would he give an explanation of his conduct when either the Chairman or the Speaker was in the Chair, and he said he would. He has not done so up to the present time, and I now desire to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of offering any explanation he may feel inclined to give. After that is done, Mr. Speaker, I will submit to your judgment whether the conduct I have described is Parliamentary or ought to be tolerated in this House.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) : I did, Sir, among other Members, make use, just before the last Division, of the expression which has been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I was led to do so by my zeal for the independence and authority of the Chair. What actually happened was this, Sir : There was a very delicate and a very important question under consideration by the Chairman of the Committee—namely, whether he could or could not allow the Closure to be moved after the Division upon the Motion to report Progress, which had not terminated till considerably after 12 o'clock. Instead of leaving the Chairman of Committees, with the assistance of his proper advisers at the Table, to determine that point for himself, he was surrounded by a group consisting, in the first place, of the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—

SIR J. GORST : And the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bedford. There was a considerable group, who seemed to surround and almost overpower the Chairman of Committees. I confess that, moved by my desire to support the independence and authority of the Chair, I made use as I passed by in going into the Division Lobby of the expression to which the right hon. Member has made reference. I accept perfectly, of course, his explanation as to his presence in that group. If I had known that the right hon. Gentleman was in the group merely for the purpose which he has now explained to the House, I certainly should not have made use of such an expression ; and so far as he is concerned I have no hesitation, after his explanation to the House, in withdrawing the expression and apologising to him for having made it. I believe the expression as applied to any hon. Member of the House is unparliamentary, and I must therefore express my regret for having used an unparliamentary expression, which was forced from me by the indignation which I felt at the attempt which I thought, and which I thought on fairly reasonable grounds, was being made to tamper with the independence of the Chair.

*MR. SPEAKER : After what has passed there is very little for me to say. The word "shame" is an expression I have always endeavoured, with the sanction of the House, to restrain ; but after what has passed, and as the right hon. Gentleman has so frankly acknowledged the unparliamentary character of the expression, I do not think there is anything more to say. I could have wished that the Chairman of Committees had been present, so that the House might have heard his version of what passed ; but as he is not present, I am scarcely in a position to judge, and I hope the House will not think that it will be necessary for me to hear anything more of the matter.

RAILWAY RATES.

DR. CLARK thought it was a matter of urgent importance that if there was a Committee to be appointed this year on railway rates and charges it should be appointed at once. When did the Government intend moving in the matter ?

MR. MARJORIBANKS desired to move the appointment of the Committee as soon as possible. He had moved it again and again, but he had always met with opposition. He should put down the Motion for Monday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

LORD KNUTSFORD: My Lords, it would probably be convenient to many of your Lordships if my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) would state what are the arrangements for the Whitsuntide Holidays?

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of Kimberley): It is proposed that the House should adjourn from next Thursday to the Tuesday week following.

LICENSING BOARDS BILL [H.L.]—(No. 49.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON, in moving the Second Reading, reminded their Lordships that, in presenting the Bill to the House shortly before Easter, he had made a statement of its scope, and stated that he had received a number of Petitions in support of it from various branches of the Church of England Temperance Society throughout the country, as well as from the Knights of Temperance. The purpose of the Bill was to deal at once with the great temperance question, and in such a way as to be permanently effectual, while, at the same time, it should begin to operate immediately. As far as he could see, it did not interfere with other proposals before their Lordships, or the other House of Parliament. The Bishop of Chester's Bill, which was put down for Second Reading on Monday next, was not in the slightest degree interfered with by this measure, to which, if this were carried, there was nothing to prevent its being adapted. The first proposal of the Bill was the substitution of Licensing Boards for the present Licensing Justices. The reason for that proposal was partly the peculiar nature of the work of granting licences, and partly the general public demand that everything of the kind should be in the control of the public. Whether a particular house should be licensed or not was not a question of right as between one man and another individually, but of what was best for the interests of a locality. Now, he had no doubt that in past times it was a good thing that the question whether or not a licence should be granted to a house in a particular locality should be left to persons of superior education, such as Magistrates; but all that kind of paternal government became more and more unsuitable as people began to feel that they were able to discern what was best for their own interests, and to claim that they should themselves have the decision of all such questions. It was better a great deal that the power of dealing with licences should be put into the hands of those who were elected directly by the people, than that it should be left to others who, if they decided rightly, yet did not carry the people along with them in the same degree. He did not mean to say the Magistrates had discharged their duties wrongly, though he thought, to a great degree, they had shown themselves not quite aware of the real state of the case in regard to the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The Magistrates were originally entrusted with the power of granting licences distinctly on the understanding that the granting of licences should be governed by considerations of the good of the community at large; and, going back as far as 1633, it had been then distinctly declared that the Magistrates in particular cases had not been sufficiently alive to their duty, having licensed a great many more public-houses than were necessary. The people knew what was good for them much better than any other class could decide. Men in their Lordships' position in life had very little idea of the strong feeling existing among the people with regard to the matter of temperance. He did not think their Lordships were aware how very many there were who were struggling, and struggling in vain, against the propensity to drink, and who would welcome any means of diminishing their temptation. It was very easy to say to a man that he could keep out of public-houses; but that was, practically, only telling him to overcome the most terrible temptation to which he could be exposed. He had seen men throw themselves upon their knees in earnest petition that something should be done to relieve them from such a terrible curse. Their Lordships could not understand such things, and it was only the people who were themselves the victims of the temptations who were fair judges of what ought to be done in removing them. A large number of drunkards would be glad to elect Boards who would diminish very much the number of public-houses in their immediate neighbourhood. It would be for the good of the whole community if such control as he asked for should be given to the people, and sooner or later it must be given. He believed their Lordships would find that the proposal now made was free from any real danger. He proposed that these Licensing Boards should have precisely the same licensing powers as the Magistrates had now, and be subject to the same restrictions as would be put upon Magistrates by such a Bill if the Magistrates still remained the licensing power. He proposed that those who were to elect the Boards should be the ordinary electors who voted for Members of Parliament. If these electors were trusted to choose a Legislature for the whole country, it was not very much to entrust them with the election of these Boards. He did not propose to interfere with the Sessional Divisions existing at present. The Boards were to be elected for three years. They would have precisely the same powers and duties as the Licensing Justices had now, and would have their regular Sessions, at which they would have to decide the questions that came before them, and see that the business was kept on a proper footing. All licences would be granted by them alone. The licences now granted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue would not be granted in future, except after they had been sanctioned by the Licensing Board. The Licensing Board would decide whether the licence should be granted or not, and then the Excise licence would be grantable if the Commissioners of Inland Revenue saw fit to grant it. It was proposed that five years after the passing of the Act a new state of things should begin. It was proposed to restrict the kinds of licences to five—first, ordinary publicans' licences to sell by retail both off and on the premises; secondly, refreshment-house licences to sell wine and beer to be consumed in those houses by persons taking meals there; thirdly, off-licences to sell wine and beer not to be consumed on the premises; fourthly, hotel licences to be granted in regard to persons lodging or taking meals therein; and, lastly, special licences for railway refreshment rooms. The Licensing Boards would be empowered to receive evidence, and would be subject in all these matters to the same provisions as the Licensing Justices were under the Ale House Act of 1828 and subsequent Acts. At the end of five years there would be a reduction in the number of public-houses. That was the second most important article in the Bill. It was proposed that at the end of five years places, exclusive of hotels and railway refreshment-rooms, should be limited to one for every 1,000 of the urban population, and one for 600 of the rural population. Between the passing of the Act and the end of five years the Licensing Boards would be required to refuse the renewal of so many licences in each succeeding year as to bring down the whole number to what he had stated. In the first year a fifth of the number of houses to be closed would be suppressed, in the second year another fifth, in the third year a third fifth, in the fourth year a fourth fifth, and in the fifth year the remainder. It was proposed that in each case there should be given to the holders of licences so suppressed compensation calculated upon three years' net profit of the house. That compensation was to be paid by those who still retained their licences, and who would thus, in effect, buy out their competitors in the trade. Compensation was to be paid in all cases of suppression, except when the licences were suppressed on the ground that the house was disorderly or in any way misconducted. It was not contended that this was the only mode of compensation, or that it was of necessity the right amount of compensation. There might be considerable difference of opinion on these points; but the promoters of the Bill were agreed that the compensation, whatever it might be, should come out of the pockets of those whose licences were renewed—that the trade should be compelled to purchase out those who were to leave the trade. In order that justice might be done between those who would have to give up the trade and those who would remain in it, it was proposed that the compensation should be provided in this way—that every holder of a licence should be compelled to make a statement of his net profits of the preceding three years, so that if a man put himself down at too little, and his house was suppressed, that would be the measure of his claim; whilst if his house was not suppressed and he had put himself down at too much, that would be the measure of his taxation towards the suppression of the other houses. He believed that this arrangement would work very effectively, and that it would be found to be a just basis to proceed upon. There might be special cases in which some hardship, some possible injustice, might be done, and the Bill provided that such cases should be dealt with by arbitration—that an arbitrator should be appointed to decide whether a man had or had not sent in a claim for too much or too little. In his opinion this was a just and adequate amount of compensation; but if the members of the trade thought there was a better mode they could propose it. Provided that the compensation was paid by those whose houses were not suppressed, the point did not much concern the country at large. He knew that a great deal might be said on this matter of compensation. When he introduced the Bill he said that he thought the licence-holders were entitled to some compensation, because they were carrying on a trade which was and had been long sanctioned by the law, but that they had no claim to high compensation. This claim to compensation was very seriously interfered with by the fact that it could not be said that the members of the trade really observed the law. The law required that intoxicating drink should not be supplied to a man who, to all appearances, had already had enough; and it would undoubtedly be a strong objection to the renewal of a man's licence if it was known and proved that, time after time, persons left his house in an intoxicated state. The law put upon the licence-holder the duty of seeing that his trade was not doing the dreadful mischief which it was in fact now doing. He was ready at once to admit that it was a difficult duty to discharge. He was told it was often hard to tell when a man was nearly tipsy, for a regular toper acquired a certain power of appearing perfectly sober, but on leaving the public-house would fall down in the street and be unable to get up again; and publicans complained it was very hard that they should be looked upon as not observing the law because these people would make themselves drunk. No doubt, it was often difficult to perceive when a man had had enough to drink; but if the licence-holder knew for certain that, whenever it was proved that three men had left his house in an intoxicated condition he would at once forfeit his licence, he would soon be able to find out when a man had had enough or was intoxicated. Moreover, the trade was a very profitable one; the granting of a licence at once enhanced the value of a house, and they had all the more right, therefore, to insist that the licence-holder should discharge the duties the law imposed upon him. They wanted places for the sale of intoxicating liquors which would not manufacture drunkards by the hundred thousand. If they could only get such places there would be no reason why they should interfere with the liquor trade any longer; but, as things stood, there was this perpetual sequel to the granting of licences, that a large proportion of drunkards followed. It should be borne in mind, in reference to compensation, that the trade made its large profits by really running counter to the spirit of the law, and doing that which the law had endeavoured by every possible means to prevent. The reduction in the number of public-houses under the Bill would be complete at the end of five years. He supposed there was no point on which those who had studied the matter were more completely unanimous than on the need there was for the reduction in the number of public-houses. For his own part, he did not believe that the reduction in the number of houses would be a panacea—that it would altogether stop drunkenness, or that, in certain places, it would very much interfere with it. But he was sure of this—that, taking the country as a whole, a diminution of the temptation would very much reduce the number of those who were victims to it. The present state of things seemed to him to be scandalous. The labouring man could not take a walk into the country without being brought face to face with the temptation on every hand. He felt the strongest sympathy with the women who so often told him they would be able to keep their husbands sober if it were not for the number of public-houses in their way. If a man was fighting the battle against the temptation to drink, it was very hard and cruel that his victory over himself should be made impossible by the temptation being perpetually placed in his way. He believed, therefore, that if they could largely reduce the temptations to drink they would largely reduce the amount of intoxication. It was proposed that at the end of five years licences should not be granted except to the holders of houses of a certain value. The small houses were responsible for a great proportion of the mischief that was now done. Many of them were in back streets, and less under the observation of the police than the larger establishments. They manufactured drunkards by the score, and it would be well if their numbers were reduced. Clause 14 proposed to put an end to the system of granting licences to people who carried on another business besides that in respect of which the licence was asked for. The sale of tobacco would, however, be excepted from the operation of the clause. The existing system enabled a great many people to obtain intoxicating liquor under the pretence of going to a shop for quite another purpose. The promoters of the Bill did not feel that they could separate the sale of tobacco from the sale of intoxicating liquors, and he did not think much would be gained were the separation effected. But they certainly thought it would be a great gain to get rid of the union of two businesses, one of which was the sale of intoxicating liquors, which people were enabled to obtain when apparently transacting other business conducted on the premises. It was a well-known fact that the number of women convicted of drunkenness had certainly been increasing for some time past.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Where are the statistics? I never saw them.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, they were published some little time ago.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: What are they founded upon?

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, they were founded upon Reports of the Magistrates. He could procure them for the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I should like to see them.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that women, it was well known, were largely tempted to drink by the facilities which existed for obtaining liquor without any publicity. The Licensing Boards would have full power to make all such orders as were now made by the Magistrates with respect to the hours during which public-houses should remain closed. The Boards would be allowed to sanction the opening of public-houses on Sunday; but unless such sanction were given the premises would remain shut. It was difficult to over-estimate the mischief that was now done by the Sunday trade, Sunday being the holiday of the working man, when he was specially tempted to drink. Occasional licences and special exemptions would also be in the hands of the Licensing Boards. He did not think that Magistrates had always done the right thing when they had granted occasional exemptions. He remembered an occasion when he consecrated a church at 11 o'clock in the morning, and, by the permission of the Magistrates, the public-houses remained open on that occasion until 11 o'clock at night. That, he thought, was a strange sort of sequel to the consecration of a church. Dancing, singing, and music licences would be under the control of the same Licensing Boards; and they were not to grant such licences, except on special occasions, to the holders of licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors. It was proposed that Inspectors should be appointed by the Licensing Boards, to whom would be entrusted the supervision of licensed premises. As long as the duty of supervision was imposed upon the police it could not be thoroughly performed, for they had too many other things to do. He could not say that the law was at present enforced by the police, nor could it be really expected. In reference to whether a house was misconducted or not, the police standard was the ordinary character of the public-houses of the place, and if one was worse than the rest they reported it as a badly-conducted house. In short, they picked out the worst cases; and it seemed natural that should be their view of the matter—not to bring the houses up to the level of the law, but only up to the level of the average condition of the public-houses in the place. The Inspectors, on the other hand, having nothing else to do, would be able to pay surprise visits, and to look in at all times, and thus the law would be much better enforced than at present. The third part of the Bill dealt with the registration of clubs. Clubs which were nothing else than drinking clubs were very numerous in London. He knew one such club which numbered 1,000 members or more, and which called itself a Radical club, although, in reality, it was not political at all. These clubs were very difficult to deal with; yet more drink was consumed in them than in public-houses. They were not under the jurisdiction of the Magistrates; they had no licences to lose; their hours were not restricted; and they were in no peril if they were conducted in a disorderly manner, unless the disorder amounted to an undoubted breach of the peace. The proposal in the Bill was that all clubs, those in Pall Mall as well as those in less fashionable neighbourhoods, should be registered, and should pay fees for their registration. Power would be given to the police to enter any club which they had reason to believe was carried on simply as a drinking club, and to charge the members found on the premises and the owner of the house before a Magistrate. That was a question strictly of law, and the promoters of the Bill did not propose to leave it to the Licensing Boards to decide whether or not in a particular case one person or any number of persons had broken the law. Those matters must go to the Magistrates, like all other breaches of the law. Judging from what had come to his knowledge since he had begun to study this subject 20 years ago, he felt confident that this Bill, although, of course, it could not prevent drunkenness altogether, would largely diminish it. He believed that it would save many a home from terrible sufferings, many a wife from brutal treatment, and many an unfortunate husband and children where the wife was herself addicted to drink. The Bill would save many children from being brought up without proper food and clothing, and not only without proper education, but with an education of the very worst kind. It would not stop drunkenness; that could not be done by any legislation; but much could be done to diminish the temptations to drunkenness; and it was quite certain that, as they diminished the temptation, so would they also diminish intoxication and all the consequences that flowed from it. He moved that the Bill be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Bishop of London.)

THE EARL OF MEATH hoped that their Lordships would grant a Second Reading to the Bill. He had been brought into close contact with a good many of the working classes; and while in the Diplomatic Service in early life it had been his duty to make inquiries with reference to the condition of the working classes in France and also in Germany. The remark which a person was always disposed to make on returning to this country from abroad was in reference to the degraded condition in which many of the working classes of this country were to be found. He had a great respect for the working classes of this country; he knew them well, and he maintained that they displayed virtues superior to those of a similar class in other countries. There was about them a judicial temper, a perseverance, a patience and fortitude under trials and difficulties, a calmness of temper which were not always to be seen among the working classes of other countries. There were, however, a certain number of working men who were very subject to this temptation of drink, and the result was that the public saw among them these degraded specimens of humanity in larger numbers than they ought to be seen. There was, therefore, a necessity for doing something to diminish drunkenness, and he did not think that a more moderate or a better Bill could be introduced than the present measure. He believed that many Justices would be only too thankful if the disagreeable duty of licensing public-houses were taken out of their hands. According to the Bill, Boards would be elected on democratic principles, and it would be left to them to decide what should be done in this difficult matter of licensing. He did not think much fault could be found with the reduction of public-houses, nor to the gradual way in which the reduction was to be accomplished. He also thought that publicans had a right to some compensation, and he was glad to see that the question of arbitration had been provided for. One of the most important parts of the Bill was the clause dealing with drinking clubs. In the factories in the Metropolis an enormous number of girls belonged to what they called drinking clubs. These were clubs without premises, but the girls strove out of their miserable pittance to meet periodically for drinking purposes. Subscriptions were collected weekly, and at stated intervals in the course of a year they met in a public-house, having, at the same time, the privilege of inviting some male friends to join them. The consequences, of course, were terrible to contemplate. If anything could be done to put an end to the existence of such clubs, he, for one, would be very pleased. On these grounds he hoped their Lordships would give serious consideration to the Bill introduced by the right rev. Prelate.

LORD ROOKWOOD said, he opposed the Second Reading with considerable diffidence, as a recent Member of their Lordships' House. From his not slight experience in this particular question in past years, he did not believe that their Lordships could accomplish the objects aimed at by a measure of this kind. The more he had seen of these attempts to make people sober by Act of Parliament, the more convinced he was that they ought to look for a remedy rather to increased education among the community than to such a proposal as this.

The Earl of Meath

As education spread, he believed that a better feeling would be engendered among the working classes upon the question of temperance, and they would be enabled to gradually win the people away from vicious habits in this direction. The right rev. Prelate proposed to abolish the present Licensing Authority, because he believed that the Magistrates in the past had not exercised their discretion wisely or well. He could speak from some experience on this subject. He had sat on Licensing Boards of Magistrates, and he had seen the question dealt with for many years; and whatever laxity there might have been in the administration by the Magistrates in licensing questions in former days, at all events since the recent legislation on this subject, and certainly since 1872, their action had been infinitely more strict and absolutely fair. In his own county (Essex) the number of licences had hardly been, if even at all, increased during the past seven or eight years. The Magistrates had availed themselves of the section in the Act of 1872 or 1874 (he was not sure which) enabling them to remove licences from a crowded district to a district where licences were wanted to meet the growth of the population. One of the principal objections to this Bill was that it entailed an enormous cost of administration, because the elections of the Licensing Boards were to be carried out with all the expense and formality of a Parliamentary election; while another evil would be that the elections would be made the battleground of the temperance and publican parties, and the results would not be, perhaps, altogether satisfactory to the former. Again, if by this system uncertainty was to be allowed to attach to public-houses the condition and status of the public-houses would be deteriorated. They had also to consider not only the immense cost of the election, but the payment of clerks and officials of the Boards; and he believed that the ratepayers would suffer considerably. In the case of a rural district with three public-houses in it, the Licensing Board might do away with two of them, leaving the whole local trade to one house; and of course the profits must be excessive if the person keeping it had to bear the burden of extinguishing the other two. The present law made adequate provision for the precautions necessary in the granting of occasional licences; but the delay that would be involved in adopting the machinery of the Bill was incompatible with the suddenness with which these licences were often required. Nor did he believe there would be any more efficiency in the proposed appointment of Inspectors than there was in the present inspection by the police. The right rev. Prelate had stated that he believed the police acted upon some general principle without visits or examination of the houses; but that was certainly not the case. In his own division the visits of policemen in plain clothes had just secured convictions in several cases where houses were improperly conducted. He saw enormous difficulties in the working of the Bill, and did not believe it would accomplish the objects the right rev. Prelate had in view. Whilst all their Lordships, he was sure, were as anxious as the right rev. Prelate for the progress of temperance, and to see the licensed victuallers' trade carried on legitimately and properly, he did not believe that the kind of tinkering, grandmotherly legislation so much in vogue at the present time could be so effectual for good as the influences to which he had already alluded.

LORD NORTON must support what had been said by Lord Rookwood. Sorry as he was to oppose a measure introduced by the right rev. Prelate, he could not see his way to support the Bill. He objected, in the first place, to dealing with this subject by a sort of rule of three. The Bill embodied a most arbitrary plan for the reduction of the number of public-houses by fifths in successive years, irrespective of the legitimate demand, or changes that might go on in population. That was not a proper method of adjusting supply to useful demand and maintaining their due relation. What would be thought if it were proposed to fix the number of bakers' or butchers' shops in any district for a definite period? If a plan could be devised that would be self-acting, and which would, in working, correct its own errors, such a plan might enable them to attain the object in view. The way seemed to be to decree the forfeiture of licences on a certain number of convictions for permitting disorder, riot, and drunkenness on the premises, or for the adulteration of liquor. In that way abuses could be checked and supply brought down to the proper demand. That was the right way to treat the subject, in his opinion, having had a good many years' experience in dealing with it. One chief source of difficulty was the influential position occupied by the owners of many of these houses. It was not the little houses that were the difficulty so much as the tied houses belonging to great brewers. As a Licensing Authority, the Magistrates, who were independent and had regard only to the public interests, were superior to an elected Board, which would be exposed to a greater diversity of influences, including that of the competition between the vested interests in different public-houses. The plan proposed had been tried at Liverpool some years ago under a Private Act, and many of the principal Magistrates there considered it a misfortune that that Act was not made more effective. If, on the other hand, any particular body were to have the power of saying how many public-houses were wanted in a particular place, surely the Magistrates were best fitted to form a judgment. It seemed to some as if they must do everything nowadays by popular election; but he thought there could not be a worse mode of creating a Licensing Authority. It was a sort of Local Option submitting a large minority to arbitrary restriction. The ballot was to decide how much drunkenness there was to be in any place. It would be far better to retain the present machinery, and make it absolutely certain that the renewal of a licence depended upon a house being well-conducted. The very worst mode of dealing with the subject was by an elective body with all its caprice, and its useless attendant expense. As Mr. Bright used to say—

"We have gone too far in this elective system. He could never go to Birmingham without seeing 'Vote for' so-and-so placarded all over the walls, in reference to some election or other."

Another difficulty in the Bill was the proposed compensation. A more extraordinary proposal he had never heard than that those persons who had conducted their houses well should be taxed to compensate others who had managed theirs badly. He was sorry to vote against any measure with so good an object, and more especially one introduced by the right rev. Prelate ; but he must support his noble Friend (Lord Rookwood) in opposing the Second Reading of this Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : My Lords, I cannot say that I am specially enamoured of this Bill as proposed by the right rev. Prelate, though I find in it one principle which does meet with my approval—namely, the principle of popular control. The noble Lord who has just spoken has, I think, a little confounded this Bill with another measure. He spoke of local option being given by it. I have a notion that that is a property belonging to this side of the House, and that my noble Friend is not quite justified in transferring it to the Bill now under consideration. The Bill, of course, introduces a certain kind of popular control by the election of Licensing Boards, who are to have the powers which the Magistrates now have. But what I would point out is this. I do not know whether the right rev. Prelate is a partizan of what is called local option ; but if he has any objection to that system, I would suggest whether as great evils might not arise under the Bill in connection with this system in the opinion of those opposed to local option as under any other system. And my reason is that the Bill would provide every three years a contest probably in every district in the country on the subject of the election of the Commissioners. Now, the scheme of local option would probably only be taken advantage of in localities where there happened to be a very strong feeling on the subject ; but in this case there would be an election throughout the country every three years. Her Majesty's Government are in favour of some form of popular control ; but this Bill would not avoid all the evils connected with popular control, as well as securing the advantages which may be supposed by the right rev. Prelate. Of course, there are disadvantages as well as advantages connected more or less with any system. There is another portion of the Bill to which I could not give my assent—namely, the principle of compensation. Independently of the principle of compensation, the noble Lord who spoke last but one—and who understands the question as well as any noble Lord in this House (Lord Rookwood)—pointed out very clearly how very inequitably the system of compensation would work. Public-houses whose licences are to be retained are to be taxed with a Licence Duty in order to provide compensation for those houses whose licences are abolished. Well, just consider what might happen. There might be a public-house ; whose licence was retained five or six miles away from any other public-house ; and the principle upon which the Bill proceeds is that, inasmuch as the value of the houses which remain would be largely increased by the diminution of the number, it is fair they should pay in proportion ; but it seems to me there would be instances in which diminution in a particular district would not at all increase the value of those which remained. I mention this to show how the principle of compensation, which seems at first sight to have something attractive in it, would be found extremely difficult to work when it had to be put in force. Then another part of the Bill embodies a principle which is very dear to those who wish to diminish the consumption of intoxicating liquor. It is a violent onslaught on grocers' licences. Of course, one quite expected to hear from the right rev. Prelate that there are statistics to prove that there is a large increase of drunkenness among women, and that this is due to grocers' licences in particular ; but I doubt whether it would be possible to prove such assertions before a Select Committee of your Lordships any more than it was proved before the last Committee upon the subject, of which I had the honour to be a Member. I remember the evidence well, and how completely it broke down in fixing upon this particular kind of licences the alleged increase of drunkenness among women. I have no doubt there is drunkenness connected with that form of licence, but I doubt whether these licences promote drunkenness more than the others. Your Lordships will remember it was stated in their favour that it was most undesirable that a person requiring, perhaps, a bottle of brandy for cooking purposes, or with any other harmless object, should be compelled to go to a public-house for it, which it was thought likely to lead to habits of drinking, and that it would be much better to afford facilities for procuring such articles elsewhere. I mention that, because I know it is assumed that these grocers' licences are the worst form of licences. I may also point out, as a matter of detail, that, under the provision that a publican is to sell nothing but "liquor and tobacco," he would be unable to sell soda water or a so-called temperance beverage which I one tasted called ginger ale. All these things publicans would be prohibited from selling under this Bill. Then I would ask the right rev. Prelate, supposing in any district there was a strong feeling in favour of the abolition of all licences, and supposing a Board elected, on which there was a majority in favour of granting no further licences whatever, how, in that case, the system of compensation would work, because there would be no public-houses left on which compensation could be levied? On that and other points the Bill would certainly require careful consideration and considerable amendment and alteration. If it is to be persevered in, I should feel myself compelled to give my vote for the Second Reading, because I am, as I have said, in favour of the principle of popular control embodied in it; but I do not desire to be considered as otherwise approving of it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The last observation of the noble Earl forces me to say a few words. I am more consistent in my principles than the noble Earl. I object very strongly to the Bill, and I mean to vote against it. Among other reasons is one which I confess it seems to me ought to have forced itself upon the attention of the noble Earl. It does not seem to me when on a great question of public policy the Government have announced and introduced a Bill of their own, covering the whole field of the subject, that a private Member in the other House of Parliament should introduce a Bill on a totally different plan to that of the measure which the Government have introduced. That alone, if there were no other reason, would induce me to vote against this Bill. But I object to the whole of this legislation. I believe it is adopting a wrong remedy for an evil we all deplore, and that it is ignoring the natural remedy which the progress of education and civilisation is producing. The right rev. Prelate dwelt in eloquent language—and repeatedly—over and over again—upon the different position of our classes and that of the working classes in this matter. He pointed out to us repeatedly that we were not exposed to any of the temptations which the working classes had to undergo, and, therefore, could not judge of their feelings. I wonder it did not occur to the right rev. Prelate, while discoursing in this manner, that three or four generations back every man who heard him, if he had then been speaking in this House, would have been exposed to those temptations and would probably have yielded to them. I do not say that matters are so far better now that the vice of drunkenness does not exist in the middle and upper classes; but I say the change has been enormous. The reformation has been so great and so rapid that we have a right to conclude that it will go forward, even with an accelerated pace, and we have a right to believe that the other members of the community who are like to us in everything else, except that they have not had the same opportunities of education and enlightenment which by accident the upper and middle classes have had, but which under the changed circumstances of the age they are rapidly gaining—we have a right to believe that on them the same beneficent influences will operate in the same way as they have operated upon the upper and middle classes, and that the natural, wholesome, and only real remedy for this great evil will accomplish itself in the days of our children, if not in our own, and that education and enlightenment will drive away this which is really a barbaric vice. I think, therefore, the right rev. Prelate is attacking the evil in the wrong way. The Bill itself, in its details, could be riddled again and again by criticism. I should not think it worth while to go much into those details. I think the form of compensation is a deplorable device to be introduced into a proposed Act of Parliament. If all public-houses were in the same street there would be some reason for saying that one must benefit by the suppression of another; but if they are scattered, as they are in country districts at distances of two or three miles from each other, the proposal verges on the ludicrous. We all know what the result would be. No compensation could be obtained out of the wretched remnants which would be spared, but that the luckless ratepayers would have to pay it all. There is one part of the Bill to which much allusion has not been made—the part which deals with clubs. I do not know whether it occurred to the right rev. Prelate, when he was dealing with clubs, that there are other clubs in the world besides these drinking clubs to which he objects so much. If he walks down Pall Mall his conscience will smite him, I think, with the havoc he is going to cause. All those clubs will be subjected to a perfectly prohibitory tax, and, as far as I can make out, they will have a series of rules imposed upon them which most of them will utterly reject. One curious provision to which the noble Lord (the Earl of Meath) referred I think deserves the attention of the House. It appears there are young ladies, engaged in the very honourable pursuit of providing for their own living by their industry, who like to meet occasionally, and to indulge in the consumption of what the right rev. Prelate calls intoxicating liquors. He appears to look upon this as a fearful crime. I am inclined to ask—Why should not they? I understand that what we object to is excess in drinking intoxicating liquors. I do not understand that anybody has yet had the boldness frankly to get up in this House, and say he thinks it right to exterminate the consumption of what I have heard described in this House by the most rev. Prelate the Archbishop, and very properly, as a food. But what does the right rev. Prelate propose to do? He proposes to enact that any association, the principal or only object of which is to supply intoxicating liquors to its members, shall be an illegal association; and any Justice of the Peace who thinks that one of these men thus associating has intoxicating liquor in his cellar may issue a search warrant, cause his house to be broken into, and if the liquor is discovered subject him to a penalty. I think I have heard of one gentleman combining sometimes with another to purchase a pipe of port or a butt of sherry. That would be an illegal association, and the moment the butt of sherry arrives the search warrant may issue, the doors of the cellar may be broken open, and the butt of sherry may be taken out and sold. I really think that is going too far; and I would point out that this is not merely an absurd provision, but it is the introduction of a very dangerous principle—it is an invasion of personal freedom of a very dangerous character. When the right rev. Prelate comes before us and tells us he is trying to prevent excess in the consumption of intoxicating liquors, though we may think his methods injudicious, we all sympathise deeply with his motive and intention; but when he comes before us and tells us he objects to the consumption of alcoholic liquors altogether, and wishes in certain cases to absolutely prevent that consumption, he is then guilty of nothing else than ethical persecution. Many centuries ago excellent men in the position of the right rev. Prelate thought that the holding of certain dogmas was pernicious in the most deadly degree to the interests of those who held them, and they held that with a belief quite as intense as that which the right rev. Prelate applies to the consumption of intoxicating liquors. That we all now denounce as dogmatic persecution, and we believe ourselves to have so far gone forward in the progress of the world that it is utterly impossible we should ever be afflicted with that tendency again. But this seems to me the same human weakness coming out in another form. The right rev. Prelate must be aware, however strongly he may feel that the consumption of any intoxicating liquors is bad, that that view is peculiar to a small section of the community; that it is not the belief of the community or of any large part of the community; and to attempt to impose it by legislative machinery, by the action of penalties upon those who differ with him, seems to me to belong in class to the same action as that which in past time tried to impose dogmatic theology by force. I hope that, at all events, we shall avoid straying into that field. If we can devise means of stopping the excessive consumption of liquor, by all means let us do it. I do not believe that the way is to be found in the enactment of Acts of Parliament. But I heartily sympathise with all who try to grapple with the evil, and wish them God-speed. But I would say to those who try to force views of their own upon the community as a matter of indispensable necessity in the public interest that they are introducing a dangerous principle to the Statute Book

—a principle which will go much farther and do great harm to the community. I cannot agree with the noble Earl opposite in wishing to bring in popular control in these matters, and for this reason, among others: that if you once raise the question of freedom against the question of temperance—I am quoting the celebrated aphorism of the late Bishop of Peterborough—you will do temperance a far greater injury than the efforts of all the temperance reformers for many generations will be able to undo. If we once get to having elections in our parishes upon the question whether public-houses are to remain open or not, I think you will find the opposition to restriction much stronger than you suppose; that the Act will nowhere be brought into force; that a very powerful obstruction to the progress of temperance will have been erected, and that, in many instances, a great and deep gulf will have been dug between the sympathies of the laity and the sympathies of their spiritual guides.

*THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he would not put the House to the trouble of dividing upon the Second Reading, for it would simply mean their Lordships walking out of the House and in again. After what had been said, it was perfectly clear on which side the majority of opinion lay, and he would, therefore, simply allow the Motion to be negatived.

Resolved in the negative.

COUNTY SURVEYORS (IRELAND) BILL

[H.L.].—(No. 86.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD MONTEAGLE moved the Second Reading of this Bill in the absence of Lord Emly. It was a measure of a very simple character, and he need not detain their Lordships many moments in explaining it. By the County Surveyors Act, 1861, the counties in Ireland were scheduled for the purpose of appointing county surveyors. Some were scheduled in two or more divisions. Where counties were scheduled as a whole, power was given to the Lord Lieutenant to appoint one or more surveyors in those counties; but where the counties were scheduled in two or more divisions, there was no corresponding power given to the Lord Lieutenant to unite them. It was obvious that circumstances might arise which would render it necessary that counties which were divided under the Act of 1861 should be united. As a matter of fact, circumstances had arisen in the County of Limerick, with which he was connected, which had induced the Grand Jury to memorialise the Lord Lieutenant to have that county united under one surveyor; but they had been told that that could not be done without legislative sanction by a fresh Act of Parliament. This Bill, therefore, was intended to get over the difficulty. That was its sole object, and he hoped their Lordships would have no hesitation in voting for the Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Monteagle.)

LORD ACTON said, the Bill was very limited in its scope, and was, in the view of the Government, very reasonable in its aims. They would, therefore, agree to the Second Reading. He would not pledge himself as regarded Amendments in Committee, and would, therefore, be glad if the noble Lord would be good enough to postpone the further stage of the Bill for a short time.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday, the 30th instant.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES ACT (1892) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 25.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Viscount Cross.)

THE EARL OF WEMYSS moved that the Bill be read a third time that day six months. His reason for doing so was that, though the Bill contained a really important principle, it had passed through the other House without a word, and, so far, through their Lordships' House almost without a word; but he thought that principle should not go unchallenged. Some discussion took place the other day as to what was the fundamental principle of a Bill which the occupants of the Treasury Bench were going to support in another place, and they had great difficulty in getting at that fundamental principle, though it appeared to most of their Lordships that it was the enunciation of a no rent policy. Here, however, there was no difficulty in getting at the fundamental principle of this Bill before them. It was of the simplest—namely, to transfer the power in these matters from the ratepayers to the Urban Authority. Hitherto, through the whole course of legislation on the question this principle had run: that the ratepayers were to have a voice in setting up Public Libraries. But now it was proposed to take the decision of this question out of their hands, and to place the responsibility upon the Urban Authority, who, it was alleged, would represent the ratepayers. And this was done at a time when books were so cheap. Scott's novels could be now bought for 3d. Thackeray's, Kingsley's, Dickens', and Lytton's for 4½d.; and Shakespeare's plays for 1d. each. That was the cost of literature at the present time; but Parliament had thought it right that these Public Libraries should be promoted at the expense of the poor ratepayers, and that suitable buildings for that purpose should be erected for, as it was supposed, the recreation of the mass of the people. The attendance in these libraries was only 1 per cent. of the population of the towns where they were established; and as to the class frequenting them to a large extent, the Librarian at Birmingham said that—

"No considerations of delicacy seemed to deter the poor tramp from using not only the news-room, but the seats in the Reference Library; the building is also used for betting purposes and by travelling bagmen, who discussed their bargains and showed their samples there."

As regarded cost again, at Newcastle £23,000 debt had been incurred, and the expenditure was £5,000 a year. Clearly, therefore, they weighed heavily on the ratepayers. It was urged that the present process of obtaining the ratepayers' votes was cumbrous and costly. No doubt, it was not so simple as the fiat of a Municipal Authority, which simply said—"Let there be a library," and the library was there. As to the representation argument, that might apply, perhaps, after the next election, and meanwhile the Urban Authorities would be able to establish libraries wherever they pleased. There were many towns in which the ratepayers had decided, in some cases by large majorities, that no Public Library should be erected—among others, Marylebone, West Cowes, Gloucester, Taunton, Weymouth, Paddington, and Islington. If the Bill became law, it would be possible for the Urban Authority to decide in favour of the erection of a Public Library when the majority of the ratepayers were opposed to it and had no power to interfere. He thought a tendency prevailed to throw too much power into the hands of Municipal Bodies. He opposed the Bill in the interests of the ratepayers. All he wanted was that, as heretofore, the ratepayers should have a voice in the expenditure of their own money in this provision of a luxury at the best for literary men. He hoped the ratepayers would rise and protest against the burden it was sought to impose upon them. They were told it was only a matter of a penny, but these pennies were rapidly accumulating, and were becoming the last straws on the back of that patient beast of burden—the ratepayer. A time might come when that poor over-burdened beast would put out his fore-feet firmly, refuse to travel one inch further on this weary rating road along which he was being driven, and throw off entirely the load sought to be placed upon him. If we did not take care, we should become in this country one of the most State and Municipality-ridden people in existence.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now,") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months").—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

VISCOUNT CROSS: I am sorry to see the noble Earl revelling and glorying in the number of places which have refused to adopt the Public Libraries Act. I think that, quite apart from this Bill, it is agreed by everyone that the establishment of Public Libraries where they are wanted is a good and useful thing. The noble Earl would have known, if he had had any wide experience of Public Libraries, that not only literary persons attend them, but working men in large numbers, and that these men highly appreciate the advantages afforded by them. It is too late to raise the question whether there should be Public Libraries or not; that has been settled, and it is admitted on all hands that the libraries are most useful institutions, and are of great benefit to the working classes, who in their work-day clothes attend them regularly and derive great enjoyment from reading—

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Novels.

VISCOUNT CROSS: The noble Earl will hardly deny that these libraries are admitted to be of great public benefit. The number of people who go to them is much greater in proportion to the population than the noble Earl thinks. The noble Earl objects to the Bill because it proposes to take the power of deciding on the erection of a library from the ratepayers directly, and to place it on the ratepayers' representatives. The present mode of starting a Public Library is very cumbrous and expensive. The Bill will effect an improvement in these respects; and if the representatives of the ratepayers are not to be trusted in such a matter as this, they are not to be trusted at all. The names of men of all Parties are on the back of the Bill, and your Lordships will, I am sure, agree that it ought to be passed for the benefit of the people. I think hardly ever has a Bill been brought in with such general consent, and I hope your Lordships will now give it a Third Reading.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS asked the noble Viscount whether he would have any objection to insert a proviso to the effect that the Bill should not come into operation until after the next election of the Urban Authorities?

VISCOUNT CROSS: I should have the very strongest objection to putting that in. The ratepayers have chosen their representatives, and surely they can be trusted in such a matter as this.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Not at the present moment.

VISCOUNT CROSS: I may remind the noble Lord that it was laid down by the Lord Chancellor three or four days ago that it is extremely inconvenient and unusual on the Third Reading of Bills to propose Amendments notice of which have not been given.

On Question, whether ("now") stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 3^a accordingly, with the Amendments; a further Amendment made.

Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

BARBED WIRE FENCES BILL. COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD regretted he was not present on the Second Reading, or he would have pointed out that the Bill applied to Ireland, and in the Interpretation Clause there was no provision in regard to the Local Authorities there. The phraseology of that clause and of the section following it applied entirely to England and Scotland as regarded the different Local Authorities and Courts of Summary Jurisdiction, while in Ireland the Local Authority would be the Grand Jury, the County Inspector, and the Urban Sanitary Authority. The only Body, therefore, mentioned in the Bill which could possibly deal with the question in Ireland would be the Urban Sanitary Authority. He proposed to bring forward an Amendment at the Report stage to make the Bill workable in Ireland.

LORD MONKSWELL had been informed by his noble Friend Lord Thring that the words referring to Courts of Summary Jurisdiction applied to Ireland. As to the expression "Local Authority" not so applying, he would see that that matter was set right. As the Bill would not come before the Standing Committee until after the Whitsuntide holidays there would be plenty of time for the noble Marquess to move in the matter.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2.

LORD MONKSWELL moved an Amendment, in page 1, line 8, after ("in this Act") to insert—("‘Highway’ means any road, lane, bridleway, footpath, or any other way over which the public have rights of user").

He had drafted this Amendment in consultation with Lord Thring. It differed somewhat from the Interpretation Clause in the Highways Act of 1835, but his noble Friend thought this definition better, on the whole, for the purposes of this Bill.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 8, after ("in this Act") to insert ("‘Highway’ means any road, lane, bridleway, footpath, or any other way over which the public have rights of user").—(The Lord Monkswell.)

LORD BELPER asked whether it was desirable, where a definite technical meaning was given in one Act, to introduce a different definition in another? In Clause 4 "highways" were referred to in the ordinary meaning. He did not know what the actual difference would be, but thought some difficulty would arise if diverse meanings were given in that way.

LORD THRING explained that the reason of the Amendment was that, as a general rule, people did not understand "highways" as including footpaths. The fact that a definition was also given in the Act of 1835 was immaterial.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN suggested that it would be better to introduce the word "footpath" separately after "highway."

*LORD MONKSWELL pointed out that the Act of 1835 defined "highway" as including all roads and bridges not being county bridges. He did not see why county bridges should not be included.

LORD BALFOUR asked the noble Lord to state what other places there were in the nature of highways over which the public had rights of user besides roads, lanes, bridleways, and footpaths? It went on "or any other way."

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Is it very desirable to put in "footpaths" without defining them? A footpath might have become so by ordinary user and yet not be a way over which the public had actual rights, and it might in many cases be exceedingly inconvenient for farmers to be prevented putting this wire across them if necessary for the purpose of keeping in their cattle.

*LORD MONKSWELL said, if the noble Marquess preferred "footway" he would not object, but he did not think it would make any difference. He did not think there was really anything in the point.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: This only refers to footpaths over which the public have rights, and I do not think there can possibly be any mistake—a "footpath" over which the public have rights seems to me to cover the ground.

A noble LORD said, the only difference between the meaning of "highway" in this and in the older Act was that in the latter county bridges were excluded; and they might naturally be excluded here, because they had a solid fence on either side of them. It was, therefore, unnecessary to bring them in.

LORD THRING said, county bridges were the very places they wanted to include. They certainly did not intend that county bridges should have these barbed wires put up along both sides of them.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN did not understand that answer. If the noble and learned Lord wished to include bridges they already came within the ordinary definition.

*LORD MONKSWELL pointed out that the Act said "not being county bridges." That was the difficulty.

*LORD ASHBOURNE: It is obvious there may be great confusion caused here by making the Amendment without a thorough consideration of what the Bill is doing. The whole machinery of the Bill has reference to highways proper with a legal and statutable definition. You are saying that the Body which is to have the control under this Act is the Local Authority which at present has control over the highways. Therefore, "highways" is throughout a term of art, and if you introduce something else which has become dedicated by public user, but is not within the definition of a highway, what right has the Local Authority to meddle with it under this measure which has been called into existence suddenly? I do not say this may not be done by Amendment after due consideration; but I think it is very unwise to do it per saltum, for if you do, you will be handing over to the poor people who will hereafter have to work out this Bill a frightful labyrinth to make their way through.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Perhaps it would be better to postpone this matter for the present. I do not profess to have much legal knowledge in these things, and I think noble Lords who are at the same disadvantage will agree that this might be left over for Standing Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : What should induce any human being to wish to put a barbed wire on a county bridge ?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I am sure I do not know. I should not like to do it.

LORD MONKSWELL would for the present withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD BELPER moved, in Clause 2, page 1, line 12, to leave out ("any surveyor of highways"). He said those words appeared to be not only absolutely unnecessary, but in certain cases extremely objectionable. Every possible Authority that could have to deal with the matter was included in the other words of the clause, which ran—

"The expression 'local authority' means any county council, any urban sanitary authority, any sanitary authority in London, any highway board, any surveyor of highways, and any other local authorities existing, or that may be hereafter created by Parliament having control over highways."

There was no possible Authority, therefore, which was not included, and the only result would be to convert the surveyor of highways into an authority himself, which he certainly was not. He was only the servant of the Authority, the executive for carrying out their orders ; and he had no right to be put in a position where he could act without their authority. They had, of course, to give him his authority ; but under this Bill he would be able to act without it.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 12, to leave out ("any surveyor of highways").—(The Lord Belper.)

LORD MONKSWELL believed that leaving out those words would make no difference, as there were others having the same effect as the words "surveyor of highways." Under the circumstances, he thought the Amendment had better be accepted.

*LORD ASHBOURNE : It is quite manifest this particular sub-section will want to be re-cast in Standing Committee. My noble Friend the Marquess of Waterford has drawn attention to the fact that, although the Bill is intended to extend to Ireland, and there are general words there big enough possibly to grasp all conceivable Local Authorities, still we want to have in words referring to the Grand Jury. That goes to show that the whole section wants re-casting when we get to Standing Committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN moved, in Clause 3, page 1, line 23, after ("is") to insert ("deemed by such local authority to be"). Those words he thought necessary for the working of the Bill. As it stood, it ran "where barbed wire was dangerous"; but what was wanted was where it was deemed by the Local Authority to be so. It was difficult, otherwise, to see how the barbed wire could be ascertained to be actually dangerous.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 23, after ("is") to insert ("deemed by such local authority to be").—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

LORD HALSBURY : I cannot help thinking it is very desirable that this Bill, if amended, should be amended with full consideration in Standing Committee. For my own part, I should object to the introduction of those words. I do not think that the Local Authority should have the power of determining absolutely whether the barbed wire is dangerous or not.

*LORD MONKSWELL did not understand that that would be the effect of it. The Local Authority could not enforce the Act without the sanction of the Magistrates, and they were the last resort.

LORD HALSBURY : I understand the Amendment is to leave it simply to be determined by the Local Authority ?

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD : At present they are unable to say that.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, the object of his Amendment was very plain. The clause provided that where the barbed wire was dangerous to animals the Local Authority might serve notice, and if it were not stated "where deemed by them to be dangerous" they would have no authority to interfere, no ground for acting. They must deem it dangerous before they take action.

LORD HALSBURY: Surely this is the proper principle. The Local Authority will make the accusation against the wire, so to speak, that it is dangerous; and then when the matter comes before the Magistrate, if he is of opinion that it is not dangerous, he will so decide.

A noble LORD said, the intention seemed to be to prevent barbed wire being put up along the roadsides, so as to be dangerous to passers-by, particularly children. When complaint was made to the owner, if he did not clear away the obstacle, the matter would be referred to the Court of Summary Jurisdiction. Surely that would meet any objection?

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I will withdraw that Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD THRING moved, in Clause 3, page 1, line 23, after ("is") insert ("liable to come in contact with"); and in page 2, line 6, after ("is") to insert ("liable to come in contact with.") He said that "dangerous" might mean dangerous to life, and that would, in many cases, have no effect at all. What it really meant, of course, was causing injury, and the insertion of those words would show the meaning of "dangerous." The most severe injuries might be inflicted by this barbed wire, and yet it might not be dangerous to life or limb.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 23, after ("is") to insert ("liable to come in contact with"); and in page 2, line 6, after ("is") to insert ("liable to come in contact with").—(The Lord Thring.)

LORD HALSBURY: I think I suggested to the noble Lord on the Second Reading of the Bill that some words should be introduced to get rid of the difficulty. I suggested to him to add "so as to constitute a nuisance." Surely the noble Lord does not mean simply "should come in contact with." That will not do. It must be something which will wrongly constitute a nuisance to the public who are rightly using the path, and leaving out "dangerous" is leaving out the whole point of the Bill. The whole theory and justification of the Bill is that the barbed wire is dangerous; otherwise it might be the most harmless barbed wire possible.

A noble LORD said, the Amendment would transfer the action from the animals or persons to the wire. The animal or person would now be made the actual operator by coming in contact with the wire.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: There is, I think, some doubt whether "dangerous" may not be too strong, and "liable to come in contact" is, perhaps, too wide the other way. It will have to be considered whether, on the whole, "dangerous" is the right word. What is intended is if it is likely to inflict injury on a person or animal. That is the meaning of it. How to define it exactly is a thing I will not attempt offhand to say. I think this is a matter which requires a little more consideration, and it had much better be considered in Standing Committee.

Amendments (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN moved, in Clause 5, page 2, line 12, after ("apply") to insert ("to gates"). His object was to except gates from the operation of the Bill. Of course people naturally wished to protect them.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 12, after ("apply") to insert ("to gates").—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

A noble LORD hoped their Lordships would not accept this Amendment.

LORD THRING did not know anything much more cruel than for anybody who might want to get over a gate at night to have to run the risk of these barbed wires running into them.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am afraid the noble and learned Lord is constituting himself the representative of a class of the community which I trust is not a large one—namely, those who wish to get over gates at night.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: But really gates are places where people would be very likely indeed to come in contact with barbed wires.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I will withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD THRING, in moving the next Amendment, said, he thought some limitation was necessary here. If no height were stated for these fences the Bill would apply to an oak fence a foot high.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 12, after ("fences") to insert ("being not less than six feet in height"); in line 13 to leave out ("on or"); and in line 14, to add at end of Clause ("in such manner that the barbs of the wire do not extend beyond the outward surface of the fence").—(The Lord Thring.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: That would be an exception in favour of people who happened to own deer-parks, and of nobody else.

*LORD MONKS WELL said, the promoters of the Bill would have no objection to this clause of the Bill being omitted altogether.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I would venture to suggest again that these things are much better considered in Standing Committee. I am quite sure they cannot be done properly here.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I quite agree with the noble Marquess. They cannot be dealt with conveniently by the House, and Standing Committee is much more suitable for their consideration.

LORD THRING: Then I will withdraw all my Amendments and move them in Standing Committee.

Amendments (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported to the House with Amendments; and Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee.

BURGH POLICE (SCOTLAND) ACT (1892) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 95.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD PLAYFAIR said, he could explain in a few words the object of this Bill. Last year an enormously bulky Act was passed containing 518 clauses, one or two of which were of a very extraordinary nature, and this Bill was to amend them. Under that Act any seven householders could go to the Sheriff where there were more than 2,000 inhabitants and require him to declare the place a police burgh. The other householders were not consulted at all in the matter, and the place would then be taken out of the county. If the population was between 700 and 2,000 the Sheriff "might," on the application of seven householders, declare the place to be a burgh; but if it was above 2,000 the Sheriff, it was provided, "shall" so declare it. This latter provision had caused great consternation, and it was desired that it should be amended, so that when requisition was made by seven householders the Sheriff should be enabled to consult the householders generally, and obtain their consent before he declared the place a police burgh.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Playfair.)

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN entirely agreed that this was a very desirable measure, but he thought it was not quite clear what the effect would be in reference to places of under 2,000 inhabitants. Would they be in the same position as before?

LORD PLAYFAIR said, they also would come under the provision for consulting the inhabitants. As the Bill would come into operation immediately, he would put it down for the Committee stage on Monday.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 12th May 1893.

QUESTIONS.

The House met at Two of the clock.

FREE EDUCATION IN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that at Ainsdale, a suburb of Southdale, where a demand has been made for free education, the Education Department has answered that there are free places in the Roman Catholic school, and that the children must go there; and whether he sees any way by which the conscientious objections of Protestant parents to send their children to Roman Catholic schools could be obviated?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): With reference to this case, I have already stated twice in the House, on the 17th March, in reply to the hon. Member for Leicester, and again on the 21st March, in reply to the hon. Member for North Islington, that the Education Acts make no distinction between Roman Catholic and other schools so long as they are Public Elementary Schools, and that it is not possible, under the law as it stands, to compel the provision of further school accommodation in a district where the provision made by existing Public Elementary Schools is already sufficient.

GLASS ARTICLES AND THE PARCEL POST.

SIR J. SAVORY (Westmoreland, Appleby) (for Sir SEYMOUR KING, Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Postmaster General why it is a regulation of the Post Office that glass articles, such as bottles, cannot be forwarded abroad by pattern post; and whether such articles are sent by foreign traders from abroad to the United Kingdom by sample post; and, if so, whether he will take steps to afford to British manufacturers and traders the same facilities which are enjoyed by their foreign competitors?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The postal regulations of this country exclude from transmission by ordinary post any article likely to injure the contents of the mails or the officers of the Post Office. Glass bottles come within the prohibition, because, if broken in transit, as they are liable to be, they would be likely to cause injury to letters, &c., contained in the mails, and to the officers handling the mails. I would refer the hon. Member to an answer given by Mr. Raikes on the 3rd of July, 1890, in which he states the reasons, and mentions a letter which he had written on the subject, a copy of which I will send to the hon. Member if he would care to see it.

KILMAINHAM PRISON WARDERS.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he state on what grounds the regulation is maintained that the Kilmainham Prison warders are not allowed to wear their own private clothes when off duty?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I am informed that no difference whatever exists between the case of Kilmainham Prison warders and that of warders employed in other prisons in regard to their being required to wear their uniforms. Warders are permitted to wear their plain clothes when off duty provided reasonable grounds are shown for seeking the permission.

SPECIFICATIONS FOR PATENTS.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any fresh volumes of the abridgements of specifications for which patents have been granted are now ready or will soon be ready for distribution; when approximately these specifications will be completely abridged and indexed; and will the abridgements and indices be of such an accurate character as will enable the Patent Office to make a reliable search into the novelty of an invention, so far as prior patents are concerned, should such research into the novelty of an invention become, at some time, the duty of the Patent Office?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BURT, Morpeth): About 20 fresh volumes of abridgements of specifications for patents relating to the period 1877 to 1883 are now ready. The remaining volumes to complete the period (probably about 100) may be expected by October next. I trust that these volumes will facilitate a reliable search into the novelty of an invention; but whether such search will become the duty of the Patent Office is another question.

COMPLAINTS FROM THE INDIAN PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether Her Majesty's Government have received complaints from members of the Indian Public Works Department of the non-fulfilment of promises made to them by former Secretaries of State; and whether any replies have been sent to such complaints?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North Beds.): Memorials from members of the Indian Public Works Department have been received, and the Secretary of State is in communication with the Government of India on the subjects to which they refer. In the meantime no formal reply has been sent to the memorialists.

THE GARVE AND ULLAPOOL RAILWAY.

MR. WILLIAM WHITELOW (Perth): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, in view of the fact that the Garve and Ullapool Railway Scheme is the only scheme at present suggested for the development of the fishing industry on the North-West Coast of Scotland, the Scotch Office will ask the Treasury for such an annual grant as is necessary for the making and working of that line?

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers, may I ask whether he is aware that this is not the only scheme intended to develop the fisheries of the North-West Coast of Scotland, but that, on the contrary, a new line has been projected from Banavie to Mallaig by the West Highland Railway Company, the First Reading of which has been actually taken in this House?

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): I am aware that this is not the only line, though it is possible the hon. Member had in his mind that other lines were not in the North-West. In reply to the question on the Paper, it is not correct to state that the Garve and Ullapool Railway Scheme is the only scheme suggested for the development of the fishing industry on the North-West of Scotland. It is one of four. I am not at present prepared to ask the Treasury for an annual grant for the Garve and Ullapool Railway.

THE CLOGHER (PORTADOWN) POST OFFICE ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the postmistress at Clogher (Portadown) has been instructed that the senior assistant is no longer to be allowed to take part in the work of the office; whether he is aware that on several occasions the senior assistant, at the instance of people using the office, has complained of carelessness and irregularity at the superior offices at Enniskillen and Portadown; what are the specific charges made against the senior assistant; have any complaints been made against her by persons who use the office largely; and if he will suspend the instruction to discontinue her services until a further inquiry has been held into the complaints made by her at the instance of the public as to the incompetence and carelessness at other superior offices?

MR. A. MORLEY: The postmistress has been instructed no longer to permit her daughter, who acted as her assistant, to take any part in the work of the office, and has been called on to provide a competent person in her place. This decision has been arrived at because the daughter who, owing to her mother's age and infirmity, has assumed almost exclusive charge of the office, not only neglected the duties, but habitually acted in an insubordinate and unbecoming manner, and made use of offensive language on the telegraph wires. The case has been very carefully considered, and there appears to be no reason to alter the decision.

MR. MACARTNEY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had seen any of the communications which had passed from the Chief Office at Portadown in answer to complaints made by persons who largely used that office of gross irregularity and the impertinent answers made by the clerks at the Portadown Office; and whether he would suspend for the present the instruction to the postmistress at Clogher until he had had an opportunity of considering the complaints which had been made of incivility on the part of the clerks at Portadown and Enniskillen?

An hon. MEMBER asked if the Postmaster General would ascertain whether the messages in question were sent by the daughter of the postmistress at Clogher?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, that, as Clogher was in his constituency, he desired to ask if the right hon. Gentleman would suspend his decision in regard to the senior assistant at the Clogher Post Office until he had fully inquired into the matter?

MR. A. MORLEY said, he was unable to suspend action, as the decision had been given.

MR. MACARTNEY asked whether he was to understand that the right hon. Gentleman had not seen any of the communications in which the office at Portadown had instructed the postmistress at Clogher to suspend the senior assistant, who for 12 years had carried on the work to the entire satisfaction of everyone using the office. Was he prepared to suspend all instructions until he had made further inquiries?

MR. A. MORLEY said, that instructions had been sent to the postmistress to suspend the senior assistant, who was her daughter. The order had been put into effect. He would ascertain whether there was any necessity for further inquiry.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL pointed out that this suspension of the senior assistant amounted to the dismissal of the postmistress, for she could not afford to keep an assistant. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. MACARTNEY asked if the right hon. Gentleman would call for a copy of the correspondence between the Clogher and Portadown Offices, which would show that the whole of this difficulty had arisen through attention being drawn to irregularities at Portadown?

*MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.) asked if there was any truth in the charges as to irregularities at the Enniskillen Post Office?

MR. A. MORLEY said, he was not aware of any irregularities? If the hon. Gentleman would bring any specific case under his notice he would inquire into it.

MR. MACARTNEY asked if the right hon. Gentleman would inquire whether complaint had not been made to the office at Portadown that clerks at the Enniskillen Office had guessed at telegrams, with the result that persons sending goods by train had been put to unnecessary expense?

MR. A. MORLEY said, that as he had stated, if hon. Members would supply him with information as to irregularities, he would have them inquired into.

ARMY MEDICAL STAFF EXAMINATIONS.

DR. KENNY (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the principle long in practice at examinations of the Irish Medical Licensing Bodies of having at their examinations assessors who are watchful equally of the interests of the candidates and of medical education has received the approval of the General Medical Council; whether he is aware that that body, which is the highest authority on medical education, and the recognised guardian of medical interests, has recommended its general adoption at medical examinations; whether he will recommend the Army Medical Authorities to adopt the principle at the examinations of the Army Medical Board; and whether, to give it practical effect, and at the same time to remove the feelings of apprehension, now existing in Irish and Scotch medical educational circles, of danger to the interests of their respective schools, aroused by the recent change in the system of conducting the examinations of the Army Medical Board, whereby the said examinations are entrusted entirely to four representatives of the English Colleges, he will appoint four medical assessors to assist in future at those examinations, two of whom shall be representatives of the Irish Colleges, and two of the Scotch Colleges?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): I am aware both of the practice in Ireland and of the recommendation of the General Medical Council that, at the final examination for admission to the medical profession, assessors should be present, and should satisfy themselves that the education of candidates has been up to the proper standard. There is no necessity for such assessors in the examination for admission to the Army Medical Staff; for the examination is merely a competition for admission to that Service between candidates who have already fully qualified as medical men.

DR. KENNY said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the last part of the question, as to the feeling of apprehension in Ireland and Scotland.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the question turned on the appointment of assessors, and he had stated that their services were not necessary in the case of admission to the Army, though they were availed of when candidates were originally admitted to the medical profession.

DR. KENNY said, that the Army examination was a competitive one, and asked whether it was not desirable to have medical assessors to prevent injustice being done?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that assessors were employed to see that examinations did not sink beneath a proper level—not to see that they were honest.

*DR. KENNY: I beg pardon, but that is not so.

MORTALITY IN INDIA.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Secretary of State has been called to the excessive mortality in recent years in the North-West Provinces and Oudh, and in the Punjab, as compared with other parts of India; and whether, and, if so, what, steps have been taken to prevent the continuance of such a high mortality?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: The figures show that, while there was a high mortality in 1890 and 1892, the death-rate in 1891 was below the average. The mortality of 1890 was officially attributed to climatic causes. The Sanitary Reports for 1892 have not yet been received. Sanitary improvements are being pushed on throughout India as fast as the circumstances permit. It is not to be expected that any steps which may be taken will prevent a specially unhealthy season from increasing the death-rate.

THE DUBLIN INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will state the constitution of the Committee which recommended the recent reorganisation of the Inland Revenue Department at Dublin; whether said reorganisation is in effect simply reverting to the arrangements which existed up to 1885; and whether he can give an assurance that Mr. MacDowell's appointment will not be made permanent, but that ultimately the Comptrollership of Stamps at Dublin will be given to some Irishman in the Service there, qualified for the post?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The recent reorganisation was made by the Treasury on the recommendation of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. The answer to the second paragraph is in the affirmative. It would be contrary to precedent to give any such assurance as is asked for in the last paragraph, but the suggestion will be borne in mind.

THE CASE OF MR. R. DURNFORD.

MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire if he is aware that Mr. R. Durnford, an Assistant Commissioner in the service of the Charity Commission, who recently presided at an inquiry concerning the alienation of 19 out of 30 acres of land situate at Shawell, in the county of Leicester, awarded by the Court of Chancery to the use and benefit of the poor of the parish, is represented to have written to the Rector of Shawell, congratulating him on having laid "the ghost of this agitation," and trusting that it will not rise up again to cause disturbance; whether such letter was written before the Assistant Commissioner had made his Report, on which the Charity Commissioners would probably base their decision; and if the Charity Commissioners intend to take any notice of the conduct of this official? I wish to supplement my question by asking if the hon. Member is aware that the so-called "agitation" was the efforts of the parishioners of Shawell to recover the land and restore it to the use of the people as directed by the Chancery decree of 1668?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire): The passage quoted in the question did occur in a letter from the Assistant Commissioner to the Rector, who has for many years taken much interest in the matter on behalf of the parishioners. The letter was written before the Report of the Assistant Commissioner was made, but after Mr. Coppack, the accredited representative of the parishioners, had expressed the view that the 19 acres in question were lost to the Charity. The publication of a sentence from a private letter and its distribution in a pamphlet in the parish was, he thought, unwarrantable. Regret was expressed if the words had caused any offence.

THE DUNSHAUGHLIN BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it has come to the knowledge of the Local Government Board that Mr. Thomas Kelly, a Poor Law Guardian for the Kilmore Division of the Dunshaughlin Union for the past 15 years, is not a ratepayer within the Union; and whether Mr. Kelly is legally entitled to sit on the Board and vote on its proceedings; and, if not, whether the Local Government Board propose to take any, and, if so, what, steps to deal with Mr. Kelly's illegal votes, and to afford the ratepayers of Kilmore Division an opportunity for electing a Guardian who would be legally qualified to represent them on the Dun-statements to be true, Mr. Kelly would appear to possess the necessary rating qualification for the office of Guardian in the Union.

BOWLING SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that the hall at Bowling, built as a school and hall in 1860 by private subscribers, held by trustees for the subscribers till 1874, and then handed over by them to the School Board of the parish for educational purposes, subject to the condition that it should be available on week-day evenings for public meetings and other suitable purposes, has been for some years disused as a school and is no longer required for that purpose; whether he is aware that in 1891 a meeting of the subscribers asked the School Board to re-convey the hall to the original trustees for purposes of public meetings, and that shortly afterwards a self-convened meeting, professing to be a meeting of the inhabitants, asked the Board to convey the hall to certain other persons nominated by the meeting; will he explain why, after it had been ordered by the Education Department, as the result of an inquiry held on the spot and at which all parties were heard, that the School Board should put up the school for sale, subject to covenants to preserve its use for public meetings, within two or three days of the date fixed for the sale that order was countermanded, with the intention that the hall should be handed over to persons representing the meeting of inhabitants; and on what grounds it is proposed to pass over the trustees of the original subscribers in favour of the nominees of an irresponsible meeting?

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: I am aware of the fact stated in the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question. I am also aware of the different claims put forward with reference to the re-conveyance of the hall. The Department endeavoured to bring about a compromise between the different bodies who claimed that the hall should be re-conveyed to them, but without success. As it appeared that a small sum might be realised by the sale of the school, the Department at first sanctioned the sale of the school according to the ordinary course. But it was represented to me that the circumstances of the case were special; that the hall might be more effectively secured for public uses by being conveyed to a public body specially elected by the community for the purpose; and, further, that this was the view adopted by the School Board. I have, therefore, thought it right to withdraw the sanction to the sale, and, in view of the special trusts attaching to these premises, to sanction their re-conveyance to representatives whom the Board may hold to be duly elected by a public meeting, adequate security being taken for the maintenance of the public rights. I cannot admit that the original trustees (who, 20 years ago, divested themselves entirely of the trust), or a certain number of them, have any claim now to be considered the representatives of the community.

SEWER GAS AT HAMPSTEAD.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that there is a serious upflow of sewer air at Hampstead and other of the Northern heights of London; and whether, in view of the possible visitation of cholera to this country, steps will be taken to inquire into and deal with the matter?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The question has received, and is still receiving, the attention of the authorities. My hon. Friend will be glad to hear that the death rate at North Hampstead of the last 10 years has been lower than in nearly every part of the parish.

PLACEMEN AND PENSIONERS IN PARLIAMENT.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when he will be able to lay upon the Table of the House the Return of placemen and pensioners now sitting and serving in the two Houses of Parliament?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (SIR J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): Returns have to be collected from various Departments, and though many have come in they are not yet complete. I will endeavour to expedite their preparation.

THE LEE-METFORD RIFLE.

MR. WEIR : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War will he state the results of any experiments which have been made, with a view of testing the relative effects on the barrel of the Lee-Metford magazine rifle, of the cordite powder cartridge and the black powder cartridge with nickel covered bullets?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I am not aware that any experiments have been made with the direct object of comparing the results upon the barrel of the Lee-Metford rifle of firing cartridges made up with the cordite and black powder respectively.

MR. WEIR : Will the right hon. Gentleman order some experiments to be made?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I do not think it is desirable.

MEAT RATIONS FOR SOLDIERS.

MR. HANBURY : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in the supply of meat to troops at Home stations, separate contracts are not made for refrigerated meat and home-killed meat respectively; and, if so, why not; if he can state whether the proportion of refrigerated beef or frozen mutton issued to the troops at home stations from 1st October to 1st June is nearly 60 per cent., the maximum allowed, and what is the proportion from June to October; if the ration is the same, three-quarters of a pound including bone, whether it consists of home-killed or refrigerated meat; how long this proportion of 60 per cent. of frozen meat has been sanctioned; and what is the amount of the saving in cost so effected?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. WOODALL, Hanley) : Separate contracts are not made for home-killed and for refrigerated meat. In calling for tenders it is intimated that from October to June 60 per cent. of the meat supplied may be refrigerated beef or, within prescribed limits, frozen mutton, and the prices tendered are regulated accordingly. It rests with the contractor to decide in what proportion to supply home-killed meat, provided that it may not at any time be less than 40 per cent. of the whole supply, and that the whole supply, whether home-killed or not, is up to the stipulated standard of quality.

The proportion of refrigerated or frozen meat actually supplied is not, therefore, recorded. From June to September no refrigerated beef may be issued; but the mutton issued, which may never exceed one-seventh of the whole issue, may be frozen mutton. No difference is made in the amount of the ration. The 60 per cent. of refrigerated and frozen meat has been the rule since 1890. The saving in cost must have been considerable; but various circumstances in connection with the supply render it difficult to apportion any particular amount of saving to the use of refrigerated meat.

RULES IN GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

MR. HANBURY : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the attention of the Government has been called to the fact that, while clerks of the Second Division are required to sign attendance books notifying the times of arrival and departure, no such requirement is made upon clerks of the First Division; and whether, in view of the fact that the recommendation of the recent Royal Commission laid stress upon the necessity for treating both Divisions alike in this respect, and for the First Division to set the example of punctual attendance, both Divisions of the Civil Service, who are equally required to give their whole time to their duties in order to qualify for pensions, will be placed upon a similar footing in the matter of attendance?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The intention of the provisions in both the Orders in Council is the same—namely, that all officers, high or low, subject to those Orders should sign an attendance book. Heads of Departments are responsible for enforcing the regulation. It is strictly enforced in the Treasury, and I am not aware of any infraction of it in other Departments.

MR. HANBURY : As the right hon. Gentleman has admitted it is the intention of the Government that the rule should have the same effect in the case of both the First and the Second Division Clerks, may I ask him whether the Order in Council will be amended so that the wording shall be similar for both Divisions?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I admit that the words are not the same; but until it has been shown that there has been an infraction of the Order in different Departments I do not think that is necessary.

MR. HANBURY: Is it not a fact that First Division Clerks may refuse to sign the attendance book, and yet there will be no infraction of the Order in Council?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I understand that the First Division Clerks do not refuse to sign; on the contrary, the book is signed regularly.

MR. HANBURY: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire of other Departments? I am told it is not so.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am sure the hon. Gentleman would not wish me to act as a policeman in this matter in relation to other Departments.

THE FORM OF THE VOTES.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury why he has omitted from the Civil Service Estimates, Class I., Vote 8, Sub-heads K. and O. and in other Votes for Public Buildings, the information hitherto always given of the gross amount of previous Votes and Re-Votes, opposite each building in course of construction or to be constructed; and whether, before the Votes are submitted to the House, he will have statements prepared and submitted setting out the details of the Votes in the same form as in past years; and if any other changes have been made in the forms of or particulars given in the Estimates?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The column headed "Gross amount of previous Votes and Re-Votes" was omitted in this year's Revenue Department Buildings Estimates—first, in order to simplify a table which remains sufficiently complicated; and, secondly, because the figures in such column had become misleading under the present system of deducting from the total sub-head a large round sum for "possible delays in progress," or "works which may not be carried out during the year." For this reason I think it unnecessary, but I will ask the Office of Works whether they will furnish a separate Return. The summary prefixed to the Estimates has been improved, but I am not aware of any other changes of form.

MR. FORWOOD: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to have the statement prepared before the Estimates come on for discussion?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I will see if it can be done.

MR. FORWOOD: Will it be necessary for me to repeat the question?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Certainly not.

THE DEPRESSION IN AGRICULTURE.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture, in view of the fact that, in 1886, a Royal Commission reported on the depression then prevailing in certain trades and industries, including agriculture, dealing fully with no less than 15 possible causes of agricultural depression, and that other inquiries have since been held into various subjects connected with agriculture, will he explain what fresh matter it is intended to refer to the Select Committee which he proposes to appoint; and whether, in view of the strong desire in most quarters of the House that the present Session should not pass away without anything definite being attempted for the relief of agriculture, he will communicate with the late President of the Board as to the proposed terms of Reference, and the possibility of narrowing the scope?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): I have examined the Report of the Royal Commission to which the hon. Member refers; but I am bound to say that I have not obtained much assistance therefrom. The Commission had but few definite recommendations to make, and they express the opinion that the depression in agriculture is not likely to exhibit any material improvement until the competition of soils superior to our own has worked itself out, a conclusion at which I think we should all arrive with considerable reluctance. In my opinion there is now ample room for the further inquiry we propose to institute, and I would especially refer to the desirability of obtaining more extended information as to the working of the Agricultural Holdings Acts of 1883, which have never, I believe, been made the subject of any detailed investigation. With regard to the second part of the question, I can only say that if, as a result of any communication which may take place between hon. Members opposite, the opposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford should be withdrawn, I shall be happy to consider any suggestions as to the precise terms of the Reference which may be proposed to me.

THE LEITRIM MAGISTRACY.

MR. P. A. M'HUGH (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, although in the Petty Sessions District of Kinlough, in the County of Leitrim, 95 per cent. of the Parliamentary electors are Nationalists, not one Catholic or Nationalist holding the Commission of the Peace for the County of Leitrim resides in that district; is he aware that more than six months ago the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was requested, by memorial and otherwise, to appoint to the Commission of the Peace for the County of Leitrim, amongst others, Mr. Patrick Fergus, P.L.G., a Nationalist residing in Kinlough Petty Sessions District; has Mr. Fergus been yet appointed; and, if not, will he be appointed; has the Lord Chancellor of Ireland communicated with the Lord Lieutenant of the County of Leitrim in regard to the appointment of Mr. Fergus; and, if so, with what result; did the Lord Chancellor before or since the 5th instant make any appointments to the County Magisterial Bench in Ireland without the recommendation or approval of Lords Lieutenant of counties; and, if so, how many such appointments were made, and when; and does he propose to make his statement, promised on the 1st instant, as to the whole system of the appointment of County Magistrates in Ireland, and the action which the Lord Chancellor will be prepared to take?

MR. J. MORLEY: I answered this question on a previous occasion; I suppose the hon. Member is not aware of that. There are 71 Magistrates for Leitrim, nine of whom are Roman Catholics. The Lord Lieutenant did decline to appoint Mr. Patrick Fergus, and the Lord Chancellor has not yet made up his mind whether or not to appoint him without the Lord Lieutenant's recommendation. The Lord Chancellor has made 11 appointments to Irish County Benches without recommendations from Lords Lieutenant, and he has several recommendations from other sources still under consideration.

Mr. H. Gardner

MR. P. A. M'HUGH: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last paragraph of the question.

MR. J. MORLEY: If the hon. Member will postpone that till after Whitsuntide I shall then have had an opportunity of conversing with the Lord Lieutenant on the subject.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Fergus has no other qualification for being made a Magistrate except that he is a Nationalist residing on the Kinlough Petty Sessional District? Can he read and write?

*MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Patrick Fergus is the gentleman who, at Ballyshannon Petty Sessions, in March, 1887, was three times convicted of assaults, two of which were on police constables whilst engaged in the discharge of their duty?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! These are reflections on individuals, and the question had better be put when an immediate answer can be given.

MR. J. MORLEY: This, of course, is not an appointment with which I am concerned. It rests with the Lord Chancellor, who, no doubt, will make full inquiries.

THE HULL DOCK STRIKE. ↑

MR. CHARLES DARLING (Deptford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has been informed that a fire was discovered at Hull in the early hours of Thursday, on the premises of the Shipwright and Boat Building Company; whether there is reason to believe that such fire was purposely caused; and whether any arrests have been made in consequence of the several incendiary fires which have occurred in Hull during the continuance of the dock strike?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I have no official information on the subject of the question. So far as I am aware, no arrests have been made; but I have no reason to think that there has been any lack of vigilance or energy on the part of the Local Authorities.

TARGET PRACTICE SEAWARDS.

MR. MILDMAY (Devon, Totnes): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is now able to say what steps he intends to take to carry out the recommendations embodied in the Report on Target Practice Seawards?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The recommendations affecting the several military districts have been referred for careful examination and report to the General Officers commanding those districts. Until their Reports are received and considered I cannot say what steps will be taken.

IRISH RESIDENT MAGISTRATES.

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Resident Magistrates are included in the provision for Civil Servants under the Government of Ireland Bill?

MR. J. MORLEY: Yes, Sir; Irish Resident Magistrates are included in the provision referred to.

PAPERS ON NATAL.

MR. WODEHOUSE (Bath): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies when the Papers relating to Responsible Government in Natal, moved for on 10th February last, will be circulated?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The Papers have gone to press, and will be circulated very shortly.

MR. WODEHOUSE: May I ask if the delay is due to the documents being of exceptional bulk?

MR. S. BUXTON: No; it is not. I very much regret the delay.

THE GOVERNMENT AMENDMENTS TO THE EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is prepared to give to the House the exact text of the Amendments which he proposes to introduce into the 3rd clause of the Employers' Liability Bill?

MR. ASQUITH: The text will be put down on the Paper this afternoon, and be circulated to-morrow morning.

WELSH PROBATE REGISTRIES.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint, &c.): I beg to ask the Attorney General if he will explain by what authority it is that in Probate Registries in Wales a charge is made of 3d. per folio for copying wills in the Welsh language, over and above the usual charge for copying wills written in English?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): I should be glad if my hon. Friend would postpone this question for a few days. Perhaps if he will communicate with me personally I shall be in a better position to answer his inquiry.

THE NORTH SEA FISHERIES BILL.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will put down the North Sea Fisheries Bill among the first Orders of the Day for an early date, and before 12 o'clock, in order to complete the discussion on it?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): The Government will take this Order on the first opportunity that they can take it without the sacrifice of still more important business. Our present intention is to place this Order as the very next to the Order for the Government of Ireland Bill, in order that some opportunity may be found at an early date for bringing on the discussion.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton): May I ask whether, when the Government moves to report Progress in Committee on the Government of Ireland Bill in order to take the North Sea Fisheries Bill, due notice will be given, in order that hon. Members interested in the question may be in their places?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is not in my power to say that. The Government will do everything in their power to meet the convenience of the House on a subject on which there is such a general concurrence of opinion; but they must necessarily take the first opportunity that offers.

THE SOMERSET HOUSE CHEMISTS.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Inland Revenue chemists, or any of them, employed in the Laboratory at Somerset House, are allowed to undertake private practice as consulting or analytical chemists?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The staff employed in the laboratory attached to the Inland Revenue Department have the same liberty of action with regard to the employment of their leisure as the rest of the Civil Service. They would not, of course, be allowed to enter into engagements which the Board of Inland Revenue considered inconsistent with or prejudicial to a proper performance of their official duties.

THE IRISH REPUBLICAN FLAG.

MR. DARLING: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has any information as to the statement in to-day's papers to the effect that a ship purporting to fly the Republican flag of Ireland was saluted yesterday in New York Harbour by the American ships there assembled?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Will the hon. and learned Member kindly place the question upon the Paper so that I may make inquiry? I am entirely in ignorance upon the matter.

MR. DARLING: I will put the question down for Monday.

THE AMERICAN MAILS.

MR. MACARTNEY: I wish to put to the Postmaster General a question which he may probably be able to answer without notice. It is whether the Campania, which has just arrived at Queenstown, made the fastest passage—namely, 5 days 18 hours 40 minutes, and whether in consequence American letters specially marked to be sent by her will be delivered in Dublin this evening, and in London and elsewhere to-morrow; also when the Post Office expects the mails arriving from America by the Southampton route, which will not reach here till to-morrow, will be delivered?

MR. A. MORLEY: I should like to have notice of that question.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.E.): Do the Post Office keep a record of the times made on both the Southampton and Queenstown routes?

MR. A. MORLEY: Yes, Sir; a careful record is kept.

Mr. Hanbury

AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that agricultural prices are now lower, and prospects are more hopeless than they were at the time of the Queen's Speech, he will re-consider his determination not to move for a Committee to inquire into the causes of agricultural depression, even though a day might be occupied by a Debate on agriculture?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am not able to re-consider that determination; at the same time, I am unwilling to meet the question of the hon. Gentleman, with whose objects I entirely sympathise, with a direct negative. I hope, however, that hon. Gentlemen opposite will use their influence with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford (Mr. Chaplin) to remove his objection; and when the main obstacle has been removed, the Government will be happy to meet hon. Members in any way they can.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I wish to put a question arising out of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman. Has it been brought to the right hon. Gentleman's notice that there is a very general disinclination on the part of representative persons connected with the agricultural community to have anything to do with this inquiry?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It has not been brought under my notice, and is not in accordance with my impression. There are hon. Members on the other side of the House who desire that the inquiry shall go forward, and it is to them that I have addressed my reply.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a knot of hon. Gentlemen sitting above the Gangway have declared their intention to forbid all Business after 12 o'clock.

[No answer was given.]

SUPPLY.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I wish to give notice that it is the intention of the Government to propose that Supply should be taken on Thursday and Friday next, the last two days before the Whitsuntide Recess.

THE CLOSURE.

LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing): I wish, Mr. Speaker, to ask your ruling as to the proceedings which occurred in Committee on the Government of Ireland Bill last night in connection with the Closure. It was the impression of all of us who took a share in the discussions by which the Closure was made part of the Standing Orders of the House that the Closure could be moved by anyone without word or comment, or, if a speech were made in making the Motion, it should not be of a controversial character. Last night, however, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary moved the Closure and prefaced his Motion with a speech of a very remarkable character. He began by finding fault with the Opposition with regard to their conduct during the evening, and then the right hon. Gentleman turned to the Chairman and addressed him in the following words:—"I submit, Mr. Mellor, with all respect, that most of what we have heard to-night, including the powerful speech——"

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I rise to Order. Is this in conformity with your repeated rulings when attempts have been made to constitute you a Court of Review upon questions of Order arising in Committee?

MR. SPEAKER: I was about to intervene on the same ground. The noble Lord told me that he was going to ask this question, and I hoped that the noble Lord would have dissociated himself from anything that took place last night. Having been asked the question, however, I think that it is my duty to interpret the Standing Order without any intention to reflect on anything or on any hon. Member with regard to the discussion of last night.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I wish, Sir, to ask your opinion as to the manner in which the Closure can be moved not only in Committee, but when the Speaker is in the Chair, and I wish to ask whether it is in conformity with the spirit of the Standing Order for any Minister to preface his Motion for the Closure by a speech of a highly controversial character, and stating, with all the skill of an advocate, the reasons why the Closure should be applied?

MR. SPEAKER: I take it that the question of the noble Lord is whether the Closure can be moved after a speech has been made on a general subject or after reasons given for moving it. As far as I recollect, a similar question was raised in August, 1887, when a right hon. Gentleman made a long and necessarily controversial speech, and at the end of it moved the Closure. The hon. and learned Member for Louth raised the point, and I then told the hon. and learned Member that the question had been settled by former precedents, and that it was competent for an hon. Member at the close of a speech to move the Closure. But, after an experience of many years, I am bound to say that for an hon. Member to make a controversial speech, and then to move the Closure, is scarcely in conformity with the spirit of the Rule, because such a course shuts out an answer to his speech being given. With reference to the Motion of the Closure, it would be improper and contrary to the spirit of the Rule to move the Closure and then to give reasons; and, therefore, I think it would be improper to give reasons for moving the Closure and then to move it. The question of accepting the Closure is within the discretion of the Speaker or the Chairman, and they would be guided by the circumstances under which the Closure has been moved.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): May I ask whether, after the Closure has been moved by a Minister and accepted by the Chair, it is in Order for hon. Members of the House, especially for right hon. Members on the Front Bench, to meet the action of the Speaker or of the Chairman by cries of "Shame, shame!" or "Scandalous, scandalous!"?

MR. SPEAKER: I had hoped that the question would not have been revived. When I resumed the Chair at midnight last night, I stated my opinion with regard to the use of the word "shame." I think that any question which arises in Committee ought to be decided then and there. I hope that I shall not be appealed to in future with regard to what takes place in Committee.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I was not referring to the incident of last night.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I wish to ask whether, when a Motion is put to report Progress or to adjourn the Debate, and a Division takes place and is finished after 12 o'clock, it is open after the Division for anyone to move the Closure upon the Main Question?

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): Is not this entirely a question for the discretion of the Chair?

*MR. SPEAKER: It is entirely a question for the Chairman whether he accepts the Motion. With reference to the question of the hon. Member for Northampton—if a Division on a Motion for reporting Progress or any other question is taking place before the hour for the interruption of Opposed Business, the time for the interruption of business is, so to speak, projected forward, and after the Division on the Motion under decision at the usual hour for the interruption of business it would be competent for an hon. Member to move the Closure.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not the case that in the last Parliament a precedent was repeatedly set in this matter?

*MR. SPEAKER: It has been done repeatedly.

WELSH TITHE DISTURBANCES.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in The Daily News of 6th May, reporting a serious and riotous attack at Penbryn, Cardiganshire, upon bailiffs engaged in the collection of tithe rent-charge; and what steps are being taken to bring the rioters to punishment, and to prevent the repetition of such occurrences?

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): Is it not a fact that proceedings are still pending in relation to this matter?

MR. BURNIE (Swansea): Will the right hon. Gentleman, when making inquiries into this matter, also inquire into the arbitrary manner in which the clerical tithe-owners are collecting their tithes?

MR. E. H. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) also put a question, which was inaudible in the Gallery.

MR. ASQUITH: Yes. Two men have been arrested and brought before the Magistrates and remanded until tomorrow. Police protection will be given to the bailiff whenever he requires it, and I have every reason to hope that it will prove adequate to prevent the recurrence of such an event. As to the supplementary question, I have no power to make the inquiries suggested, as they do not relate to matters with which I can interfere.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 209.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 11th May.]

[FIFTH NIGHT.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Question again proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): I am glad that the Debate did not close last night, as I am enabled to make a few observations on the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General. That speech partook of the character of all the speeches we have heard from the Government on this occasion. It did not attempt to answer the arguments which had been raised from this side of the House, and upon which a considerable number of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen in common with myself honestly and sincerely asked the advice of the hon. and learned Gentleman. As a profession of faith in sound Constitutional doctrines the speech was admirable, but it did not tell us anything we did not know before, and it did not throw the least light in the world on the point we had raised. The whole argument of the Solicitor General was based on the assumption that this House has, irrespective of Statute, complete jurisdiction to legislate for Ireland, and that that jurisdiction can neither be interfered with nor taken away by any operation of Statute. This is exactly the point upon which doubts have been raised, and upon which the hon. and learned Gentleman was asked to state his views. I will, with the permission of the Committee, state as shortly, distinctly, and clearly as I can what it is that I wish the hon. and learned Gentleman to answer. Up to the year 1719 doubts had been raised on numerous occasions in Parliament and before the Courts as to whether the Parliament of Great Britain was competent to legislate for Ireland, the affirmative being asserted in Great Britain, while in Ireland it was asserted with equal determination that this Parliament was not competent. So grave were these doubts that in 1719 a Declaratory Statute was passed (6 Geo. I., c. 6), the enacting part of which was as follows :—

“Be it declared, &c.—That the said Kingdom of Ireland hath been and is and of right ought to be subordinate unto and dependent upon the Imperial Crown of Great Britain . . . and that the King's Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and the Commons of Great Britain in Parliament assembled, had, hath, and of right ought to have, full power and authority to make laws and statutes of sufficient force and validity to bind the Kingdom of Ireland.”

I think it will be conceded by the Solicitor General that a Declaratory Statute does not and cannot of itself give jurisdiction if none before existed, and therefore this simply amounted to a declaration of the opinion of the Parliament of Great Britain. Still, it was a very valuable piece of evidence that in the opinion of that Parliament jurisdiction had existed prior to 1719, and from that date onwards those who alleged jurisdiction had at least that Statute in their favour. But the position was entirely reversed by what took place in 1782, because in that year an Act (22 Geo. III., c. 53) was passed by the British Parliament to repeal the Statute of 1719, and, in repealing it, doing away with the whole of the argument which that Act furnished in favour of the jurisdiction of Great Britain, and putting those who asserted it in even a worse position than that which had been occupied before 1719, inasmuch as it was a sort of confession of error on the part of Parliament. But that is not all. In 1783 a further Act was passed by which the British Parliament absolutely repudiated all claim to jurisdiction over Ireland, and enacted a Declaratory Act in precisely a contrary direction. The Preamble sets forth that doubts had arisen under the Act of the preceding year, and enacted (23 Geo. III., c. 28)—

“That the said right claimed by the people of Ireland to be bound only by laws enacted by His Majesty and the Parliament of that Kingdom in all cases whatever . . . shall be, and it is hereby declared to be established, and ascertained for ever, and shall at no time hereafter be questioned or questionable.”

The question really is, whether this right existed before 1719? If it did, all those Statutes are mere moonshine, and cannot take it away. I can assure the Committee that we sincerely and honestly put forward these arguments, although I know that it is the fashion among hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to believe that every speech made by the Opposition is animated by some sinister motive. Undoubtedly after 1783, it was questionable whether the Parliament of Great Britain had power to legislate over Ireland; for by the Act of that year it had expressly disclaimed its right to do so, and from a moral, historical, or legal point of view had done everything it could to estop itself from ever raising a contention that it had a right prior to 1719 to legislate for Ireland. Under these circumstances, the Act of Union was passed, and the only authority we now have is based on that Act. If that is so, our right is based on Statute, and what Parliament has given Parliament can take away. I will ask the Solicitor General this definite question—Cannot this Parliament now pass an Act repealing the Act of Union and annihilating the whole right which the Imperial Parliament now possesses to legislate for Ireland? The hon. and learned Gentleman's argument was based on the idea that such a right could be taken away. He said, “Don't mention supremacy in this Bill at all, because a Statute cannot take it away.” But if the contentions I have now been submitting to the Committee are sound, it is obvious that the greatest possible care ought to be exercised in order that the present Bill may not take away that right which the Government intends to preserve. That point was clearly put some days ago, and the Solicitor General got up to answer it, but was pulled down by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I have the greatest respect for the abilities and power of the right hon. Gentleman, but upon a question like this he is no more an authority than I am. What we should like to know is, what the Solicitor General has to say on that point? The Solicitor General will admit that in his excellent speech yesterday he omitted all notice of that point. There must have been some sinister motive in the hon. and learned Gentleman's mind which prevented him from answering that question, and I believe it is the same motive which colours every speech made on the Treasury Bench. Why are we not to be allowed on a very important question of this kind to show the Government the difficulties under which we labour? If the Bill is one which the Government can really recommend to the country, and which they hope will be carried into law, why should they decline upon every occasion to satisfy the reasonable curiosity of Members on this side of the House who are desirous of criticising the Bill in a friendly way?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir JOHN RIGBY, Forfar): Mr. Mellor, I desire to correct my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge on several points of fact. It must be imagination which led him to suppose that he saw me getting up to answer him when he made the appeal to me. I had not the slightest idea of getting up, because, as I said before, I do not think he has the slightest right to attempt to force me against my inclination. I am also surprised that the suggestion of a sinister motive could have occurred to him possible. At any rate, no sinister motive actuated me. I will now say in a few words all I have to say. Shortly before the right hon. Gentleman spoke I listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Mid Armagh, which was nothing more nor less than an abstract of one or two of the well-known chapters of Dr. Ball's book. The right hon. Member for Cambridge University did not appear to be aware of that fact, and to him that point, which is well-known to students of that portion of history, was quite novel. There was nothing fresh about it at all; but as might be expected from a writer of Dr. Ball's accuracy, the speech, which was a mere exposition of Dr. Ball's chapters, was in itself accurate. I agree that in the last century it was one of the most vexed questions whether or not the British Parliament had an inherent right to legislate for Ireland. I also agree with what appears to be a perfectly evident proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, that no Act of the British Parliament, either in affirm-ance or repudiation of the jurisdiction which it possesses, can have any binding effect. It appears to me, therefore, that in the question so raised there really is nothing relevant to the present measure, because when we go to the action of the Legislatures of Ireland and Great Britain which led to the Act of Union all doubts and difficulties are removed, and we have it under the undoubted authority of that Act that the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland has jurisdiction and authority. I am told that it is a mere Act of Parliament. But can there be a better title than an Act of Parliament? Under what title is Her Majesty's Throne held but by an Act of Parliament? There is not, and cannot be, a higher, a more perfect, and a more indisputable title than that which is given by an Act of Parliament. This is what I mean when I talk of the supremacy of Parliament—that there is no authority in existence that can question it, and that the only limit upon it is this: that it cannot by any Act of its own take away from itself that supreme authority. The right hon. Gentleman suggests that there may be a repeal of the Act of Union; but admitting it to be the case, that is not in any way contemplated by the Bill. The Constitutional question might arise whether the Parliament of the United Kingdom can destroy and annul itself; but that question is not raised now, and I prefer to leave it until the occasion arises for discussing it. That it can limit the authority of future Parliaments is denied by a concurrence of authority, which is, so far as I know, without a single exception, among jurists and writers of reputation and position.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, the Chief Secretary referred the previous night to what he described as the tactics of the Opposition. Now, whatever the right hon. Gentleman might have referred to, he must have exempted the Ulster Members, because no Ulster Member had spoken during the entire Debate on the Amendment before the Chair, although five or six of them had risen repeatedly with that view. The right hon. Gentleman also complained that the Debate upon Clause 1 had in reality been a Second Reading Debate. He should like to know what else the Debate could be? What was the principle of the Bill? The main principle of the Bill was to establish an Irish Legislature, and the 1st clause was the very clause that would set up that Legislature. How could they debate the clause, therefore, without debating the principle of the Bill? The clause before the Committee was applicable to the whole of Ireland, and was applicable to a Province of Ireland against the direct vote of the majority of the Constitutional Representatives of that Province. The Committee, so far as it was able, had practically imposed a yoke upon the neck of the people of Ulster which was hateful to them, and which was imposed in face of the solemn warnings of that Province. They had imposed that yoke upon the necks of the people of Ulster against the votes of their Constitutionally-elected Representatives—not Representatives chosen by the priest, not Representatives chosen by clerical influence in any shape or form, and they had imposed it in face of the solemn protests and warnings of that Province conveyed in every Constitutional way they were capable of being conveyed. That Province had declared, in language perfectly direct and perfectly plain, that if such a Legislature were forced upon them they would not pay the taxes which the Legislature imposed, and they had, in language which could not be misunderstood, said that they would resist its authority. They knew, and he knew, that many hon. Members on the Ministerial Benches, who pretended to be so easy about the matter, knew, that if it were sought to force the Bill down the throats of the people of Ulster, they would have to enforce it by British bayonets. He asked the Committee to consider what that really meant. They had scouted the voice of the Representatives of Ulster, and they must now force this hated Legislature upon them by coercion. What was Great Britain to gain by the exchange of one form of coercion for another? For six years the Gladstonian Party had been denouncing coercion in every part of the country. That coercion he held to have been the coercion of crime and the coercion of lawlessness. But what kind of coercion will they have in Ulster? They would not have to coerce crime, or to coerce lawlessness; but they would have to coerce the majority of a Province simply because of their passionate loyalty to the Empire, and because of their determination not to be thrust outside its pale. [Irish laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laughed, but they did not represent a majority of the people of Ulster in this Parliament as they did in the last, and their representation would be worse instead of better in the next Parliament. The Prime Minister professed to be always ready to consider this question of Ulster. The right hon. Gentleman stated, in reply to a question he had addressed to him, that in 1886 the Government were ready to consider any proposition in regard to the question of North-East Ulster, as he was pleased to call it. The Prime Minister had been good enough to give him the reference to the statements on which he based that assertion; and on consulting those references, he (Mr. T. W. Russell) found that the statement which the Prime Minister made in 1886 amounted to no more than this: that whenever the representation of the North-Eastern portion of Ireland submitted a proposal to the Government it would receive the fairest consideration that the Government could give it. The right hon. Gentleman also said that in making that proposal he had the general concurrence of Mr. Parnell and the Irish Nationalist Party. On the day when the Mines (Eight Hours) Bill was discussed the right hon. Gentleman said the offer was still open, although he did not say whether this received the concurrence of the Nationalist Party. At least one prominent Member of that Party had expressly repudiated the proposal. The Government said they were ready to consider any proposal made by the Ulster Members. It was not the business of the Ulster Members to approach the Prime Minister on this matter. They did not want the Bill at all. They had told the Government so in the plainest language that men could use; and, therefore, the Government had no right to ask the Representatives of Ulster to make any proposal to exempt Ulster from the 1st clause of the Bill. Their business was to destroy the measure. It was the business of the Government to make their Bill just and safe. It was the business of the Opposition to destroy it. They had made no secret of that. They had declared plainly that that was their business.

The Government were prepared to "consider" anything. It seemed to him that their position all along the line was—the smallest contribution thankfully received. Speaking for the Ulster Members, he would say that they should make no proposals in relation to that Province. When the Government made them they should be considered. They should give their proposals the fairest consideration. He thought they had much better right to ask the Government to make this proposal than the Government had to ask them to make it. The Government had introduced the Bill, and they were seeking to pass it. It was not the duty of the Ulster Members to make its passage easy, and they were not going to make it easy. He said again that they would not make any proposal with regard to the promise of Ulster in this Bill. When the British people had been consulted, and when they declared in favour of Home Rule, then it would be time for the Ulster Members to act; then it would be time for them to consider whether they should dismember Ireland as well as the Empire. They had heard during the discussion a great deal about the supremacy of Parliament, and about the Irish Assembly being subordinate to the Imperial Parliament. He had been making a very interesting collection of Gladstonian candidates' speeches in Great Britain. He did not mean their election addresses, but speeches and replies to questions. They were most interesting reading, not for their merits, because they are very poor literary performances in almost every case.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Question, question!

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I rise to a point of Order, Mr. Mellor. I desire to call your attention to the constant and disorderly interruption of the hon. Member for South Donegal behind me.

THE CHAIRMAN: I can only appeal to hon. Members to assist me in keeping order. I must appeal to every hon. Member, of whatever Party he may belong, to assist me in the preservation of order.

MR. MAC NEILL: As I have been expressly referred to, I rise now to a point of Order. All I said was "Question, question!" and I said that because the hon. Member was speaking assumedly on this clause, and in reality he said he was making a collection of Gladstonian speeches—which have nothing whatever to do with the clause.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he would do his best to keep in Order, but he really thought hon. Members opposite ought not to be so thin-skinned. Nothing amused him more than the stickling for points of Order from Nationalist Members. As he had said, he was making a collection of the speeches made by Gladstonian candidates on the supremacy of Parliament and on the Irish Assembly being subordinate to the Imperial Parliament. Reading the speeches, it was exceedingly difficult to understand how these hon. Members had resisted the insertion in the clause of words directly bearing on the supremacy of this Parliament. The object of the Amendment, to have the word "subordinate" inserted in the clause, was to make the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament effective. He admitted that with the Bill as it stood, it mattered little whether "supremacy" was put in the Preamble or in a clause. [An hon. Member on the Irish Benches interjected a remark which did not reach the Reporters' Gallery.] He had caught the expression of his hon. Friend, and he did not think those words ought to be used in the House. He thought those who were responsible on the Treasury Bench for the order of the House ought not to allow them to be used.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans): I beg to move, Mr. Mellor, that the words just used by the hon. and learned Member for South Donegal be taken down.

MR. MAC NEILL: What words?

MR. VICARY GIBBS: He said, addressing the hon. Member for South Tyrone, "What the devil are you talking about?"

THE CHAIRMAN: What hon. Member used that expression?

MR. VICARY GIBBS: The hon. Member for South Donegal.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: "What the devil are you talking about?" It was the Member for South Donegal.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must appeal to the hon. Member for South Donegal to say whether he used the words imputed to him.

MR. MAC NEILL : What words ?

MR. VICARY GIBBS : "What the devil are you talking about ?"

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) : There is no doubt about it. We all heard them—"What the devil are you talking about ?"

MR. MAC NEILL : I assert, on my honour, that I never used one word of the expression imputed to me or anything like it.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL : I heard you.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) : I was sitting by the side of the hon. Member for South Donegal, and I can state from my own knowledge that he made use of no such expression whatever.

MR. MACARTNEY : I quite agree with what the hon. Member has said, but I called your attention, Sir, to the fact that the hon. Member for North Kerry used the words.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : Mr. Mellor, the statement is untrue. I made use of no such words or expression of any kind whatever.

MR. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour) : I am sitting behind the hon. Member for North Kerry, and I did not hear him use the expression.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby) : I rise, Mr. Mellor, to call attention to the fact that not only to-day, but yesterday, hon. Gentlemen have risen up to charge particular hon. Gentlemen with making particular statements, and asked for them to be taken down after those hon. Gentlemen have stated, and after those around them have stated, that no such words were used. I ask you whether hon. Gentlemen opposite should not be more cautious in getting up, as the noble Lord has just done, to make statements which an hon. Member has said upon his honour he never uttered ? Hon. Gentlemen sitting around the hon. Member confirmed what he said.

MR. MAC NEILL : Mr. Mellor, I call upon the hon. Gentleman who made the statement against me for a distinct and humble and an absolute apology.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) : In reference to the observation which has fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) I do not wish to follow his example, and add any bitterness to the controversy. Though it may be true, and no doubt is true, that a particular gentleman accused of using those words may not have uttered them, what unfortunately, Mr. Mellor, is equally certain, is that the words were used by some gentleman sitting below the Gangway, and that they were uttered in so loud a tone of voice that they were heard distinctly across the floor of the House. I would venture to suggest that the incident might close ; but I hope it will result in hon. Gentlemen restraining their emotions, and not indulging in expressions unparliamentary in themselves, and which certainly do not conduce to the harmony of the proceedings or the decency of Debate.

MR. VICARY GIBBS : The Chancellor of the Exchequer has attacked me for having charged an hon. Member with having used the expression after that hon. Member had stated on his honour that he had not done so. I beg to deny that any such an attack on me was justified.

SIR W. HARCOURT : I did not say "after," but that a gentleman had made a statement with reference to an hon. Member which he declared on his honour was incorrect.

MR. VICARY GIBBS : I wish to make a personal explanation, and I do not think I should be interrupted in the middle of it. With regard to the hon. and learned Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill), I beg to make an apology to him for having charged him with using language that was certainly blackguardly, and which I now fully believe he did not use. I am extremely sorry I was misled into denouncing him as the culprit in this matter, whereas someone in his immediate vicinity did use that blackguardly language.

THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. Member who has just sat down has taken what I think is the proper course, and the only course that it was open for him to take. He has made a charge by misapprehension and mistake against an hon. and learned Member of this House, and, finding that he was wrong, he has apologised to the hon. Member and to the Committee. Now, with regard to that matter the incident must now terminate. But if language of this kind is to be used—and some language of this sort must have been used, because it has been heard in different parts of the House—I can only say that such an interruption and such an observation is most indecent, is contrary to the Rules and practice of this House, and I must express my sincere hope that every hon. Member will assist the Chair in keeping order in what, sometimes, are somewhat difficult circumstances. If hon. Members will do that, they will refrain from using language that is not only of an improper character, but is calculated seriously to disturb the proceedings of this House.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) : I have to say, so far as I am concerned, the incident cannot terminate here. I must ask the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) what statement he has to make with regard to his unfounded charge against me?

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) : I endeavoured to rise several times, and I did rise immediately after the statement of the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton), to express my regret that I should have attributed to him words he declared he had not used. I rose on the first occasion to add my testimony to that of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon) that the hon. Member for South Donegal had not been guilty, on this occasion, of uttering the expression used. I then, misled by the extraordinary similarity of two voices of hon. Members behind me, attributed to one of the two hon. Members words which I certainly believed he had been guilty of uttering. He denied it, and I accept his denial and express my sincere regret that I should have attributed to him the use of the words ; I rose immediately for the purpose of saying so.

THE CHAIRMAN : I express my regret that I did not catch the words used with regard to the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton). I think the hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) has taken the proper and only course open to him. That being the case, this matter must terminate, and I call upon Mr. Russell.

MR. HARRINGTON : On a point of Order, I should like to ask—[Cries of "Order!"] I rise to a point of Order

THE CHAIRMAN : The hon. Member for South Tyrone is in possession of the Committee.

MR. HARRINGTON : I rise to a point of Order. I want to ask whether, in taking down words used in the House, they should be words heard by you in the Chair, and not by Members in different parts of the House ; and whether it is competent for you to take the report of a Member who has indistinctly heard the words ?

The Chairman

MR. VICARY GIBBS : I heard the words distinctly.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : So did I.

THE CHAIRMAN : In answer to the question put to me on the point of Order, I have to say that any hon. Member can draw my attention to disorderly words, although they do not reach my ear. Any hon. Member may then move that the words be taken down. My duty then is to take the sense of the Committee whether they be taken down ; and if it is the sense of the Committee that they be taken down, I should have to order them to be taken down, and leave the Chair to report to the Speaker.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL, resuming his speech, said, it was not very easy carrying on a Debate under these circumstances. When he was interrupted he was stating that had the Amendment moved by his hon. and learned Friend been adopted, that Amendment would have been succeeded by other Amendments designed to make it effective. As the Bill stood, it seemed to him it really did not much matter what was in the Preamble of the Bill, and for this reason: He had a strong opinion, not founded on law at all, but upon the facts, that the moment they parted with the Executive power in Ireland they parted with the supremacy of Parliament. If the first Amendment had been carried, they would have taken care to see that the Executive power was retained ; but inasmuch as it was not, and the Committee had declined to insert the supremacy of Parliament in distinct terms, he did not see that a statement in the Preamble was of the slightest use in face of the fact that they had parted with the power to enforce that supremacy. Let them consider what might take place in this Irish Assembly. Consider the possibility of Irish legislation being passed, say, on the Land Question that this House might consider to be oppressive and unjust to a class in Ireland. That was not a large assumption at all, and was a thing likely to come about. Supposing this Parliament to interfere, in that case they would have to interfere against the will of the Irish Parliament; they would have to enforce their decision against the Irish Executive with no Executive of their own, because the Bill did not provide for a single Executive officer to carry out the will and decree of the Imperial Parliament. Therefore, if they gave away the Executive power, that moment they did away with the supremacy of this Parliament. He ventured to tell the Chief Secretary for Ireland again what he knew he was aware of, that in the Province of Ulster, whilst there was every desire during these proceedings to restrain the indignation of the people, whilst every effort was being made to do that by the law-abiding people of this Province, and the right hon. Gentleman was aware of it as well as any man; but while there was this desire, there was the utmost feeling of indignation in that Province against this House seeking to fasten a most hateful yoke upon the neck of her people.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, that his right hon. Friend last night pointed out the fact that no Ulster Conservative Member had spoken on this clause; therefore he was sure his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland would admit that before the Debate closed upon a clause of such importance, not only to the country at large, but to that section of the Irish people with whom he acted, the right hon. Gentleman would admit he had a right to occupy the attention of the Committee for a few moments, and he would be very brief, as he could compass his remarks within a very small boundary. Their opinion was that upon the First and Second Reading of this Bill they adduced various arguments against establishing a separate Legislature and Executive in Ireland, and how were they met on those occasions? They were told that all the detailed objections which they ventured to bring forward would be encountered when they came into Committee, and now, when they came into Committee, not one objection they had offered had even been touched by the Gladstonian Party. They pointed out, in the speeches they made, several grave objections to the establishment in Ireland of a separate Legislature; they showed that the history of the immediate past pointed to the fact that it was absolutely impossible to establish a Legislature in Ireland that would not be a Legislature of ascendancy. That argument had been treated with absolute contempt. They then pointed out that the Bill as it stood primarily destroyed the supremacy of the British Parliament. How was that met? They were referred by the Prime Minister to various speeches that had been made in this House by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway which satisfied the right hon. Gentleman, but which did not satisfy them; they did not answer one of the objections they had offered in the course of their speeches on the First and Second Readings as to any real Parliamentary supremacy. The hon. and learned Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) had made many speeches, and had written on the subject, and, according to that hon. Member, the supremacy of Parliament would be endured by the Party to which he belonged so long as it was absolutely inoperative and useless. Other arguments had been used on that side of the House. It was pointed out that the financial scheme of the Government was an ineffectual scheme; that to create a Parliament that would start bankrupt would not conduce to the prosperity of Ireland. That also had been treated by Her Majesty's Government, he would not say with silence, but simply with chaffing or rhetorical allusions. Other arguments had been used by the supporters of this Bill, and threats had been made. He did not know whether the House remembered those threats; but they were told, as one great argument to pass the Bill, that if they did not pass it and establish a Parliament and Executive in Ireland, that the condition of Ireland would be one from which hon. Members below the Gangway would have shrunk with horror. He did not think that was good argument. Years ago he had pointed out that Mr. Parnell had his hand on the throttle-valve of crime. He did not know who had control of the valve at present; but the argument seemed to be that if this Parliament was not terrorised into passing this Bill, the throttle-valve of crime would be turned on by somebody. The late Government, however, proved that they were able to deal with the throttle-valve of crime. Well, how had they been met in this Debate? They were as thirsty men standing in front of rows of corked bottles; they had not got the corkscrew to pull out the cork, and the only corkscrew that would do so was in the hands of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, and they would not use it. As hon. Members below the Gangway were the persons chiefly interested in passing this Bill, he should have thought they would have had some indication why they should pass this clause, around which the mill turned. How had hon. Members below the Gangway met them? They met them in a manner which they could not call argument, by inarticulate clamour, which was a matter with which the Chairman could more appropriately deal. No speech had been made by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to back up the statements made on their behalf from the Front Bench. Two remarkable speeches had been made, speeches which the House would remember for a long time—the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and the speech of the Prime Minister—both, he maintained, admirable in their way; but he thought those two speeches differentiated the attitude which the Unionist Party had assumed and that which the Separatist Party had assumed. One side they had argument, on the other they had oratory. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister yesterday treated them to 40 minutes of what certainly to him was immense enjoyment. He did not think, since he had been a hunting man, he had ever enjoyed a 40 minutes' run more than he did the 40 minutes of vigorous oratory with which the wonderful Prime Minister—for he was a most wonderful man—entertained the Committee. But he thought that speech was eminently characteristic of the right hon. Gentleman. How did he meet the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain)? He met them first by calling him a siren; he took some 15 minutes to describe the right hon. Gentleman as a siren. Now, if he remembered anything about sirens, as a rule they did not fascinate people by argument, but by their mellifluous accents; and, therefore, the word "siren" more especially applied to the right hon. Gentleman himself. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) brought forward argument after argument, fact after fact, and the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister absolutely refused to contend with one of them. He heard the Prime Minister's speech last night, and he read that speech this morning; and he challenged any hon. Member in the House, from the beginning of the speech to the end of it, to discover one single instance in which the right hon. Gentleman dealt with a single argument brought forward by his right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham. He would simply allude to the question of finance. His right hon. Friend very justly pointed out that if the financial scheme of the Bill, as it stood, were carried out, a Legislature and an Executive would be created in Ireland in a bankrupt condition. How did the Prime Minister deal with that? "Oh," he said, "if it was only a matter of a deficit of £100,000 or so, that was merely a matter of manipulation;" but what they wanted to find out was who was to pay the £100,000, and he ventured to say the British electors would also ask the same question. A speech was made by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) later in the Debate. He thought it was a very straightforward and manly speech, and it might be a speech that contained the real policy of Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member voted for this establishment of a Legislature in Ireland because he was in favour of establishing similar Legislatures for England, Scotland, and Wales; and so full of generosity was he to Ireland that he was willing to shell out in order to place the Government they proposed to create in a solvent condition. But they expected that the Prime Minister, who was one of the greatest living authorities on finance, when he brought forward a financial scheme in his Home Rule Bill, would have done so in a statesmanlike and sober manner. It was a Gladstonian, statesmanlike, and sober effort to found the finances of Ireland upon Irish inebriety; and it turned out on examination, which the right hon. Gentleman did not himself deny, that the Irish people were a far more sober people than the right hon. Gentleman appeared to believe, and that a great deal of the whisky he imagined was drunk in Ireland was really drunk in Scotland. But the right hon. Gentleman pointed out this fact—that the whisky might fail, but he would not fail his Irish supporters, and that the deficit would be met some way or other, though the right hon. Gentleman did not tell them how. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to defend his Nationalist supporters, and was filled with wrath with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) because he ventured to inquire into the past speeches of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, and ventured to ask them if they were willing to retract here what they had said in Ireland and elsewhere. The Prime Minister said that the right hon. Gentleman was not the man to make such an attack as that, and if any man should wear a white sheet for what he had said in former times it was the right hon. Gentleman himself. He (Colonel Saunderson) could only say that if the right hon. Gentleman wished to wear a white sheet and to get one he would find plenty in the possession of the Prime Minister. What was this Bill before the Committee but a white sheet the Prime Minister was wearing to hide from view the memory of Kilmainham! At the end of his speech the Prime Minister made a statement which he thought clearly showed the deep hatred that he felt, at any rate, of one section of the Irish people, and perhaps that explained some of the reasons for resisting Amendments to this 1st clause. He hoped his fellow-countrymen in Ireland would remember these words of the Prime Minister—

“Those who have been associated with the oppressors are down to this moment the first in claiming for themselves an ‘unbridled licence.’ What licence did they claim in Ireland? They claimed the licence of belonging to the Empire and of living under the authority of Imperial law; but they claimed no liberty for themselves which they were not willing to confer on their neighbours.”

[Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laughed; that was one of the inarticulate arguments they brought forward; and he should be glad if one hon. Gentleman would get up and point out what they claimed as an “unbridled licence” for themselves which they were not willing to confer upon their neighbours. He really thought that the speech of the Prime Minister, so eloquent, so entertaining, might have been curtailed at most into five minutes. If the right hon. Gentleman had started by saying, “I do not intend to give any information on the points raised by the Unionist Party,” that would have disposed of the first part of the speech, and then he might have gone on, “If you will follow me from clause to clause without demanding explanations and confine yourself to the clause itself, then you will gradually be able to grasp my meaning in this Bill.” They did not intend to follow that advice. The very just latitude which the Chairman had given them in this Debate proved that he realised the fact that this Bill differed from all other Bills this generation had ever seen, and that it was of such momentous importance to this country and to the Empire as to make it necessary that each clause should be examined in the light thrown upon it by the remainder of the Bill. They (the Opposition) had employed that indulgence in trying to prove to the House that these clauses hung together to a great extent, and that it was impossible to discuss one of these clauses before they had considered the master clause which affected all. The right hon. Gentleman, towards the end of his speech, really showed the House why the speech was made. It was a speech to gag his supporters. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham had challenged hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to get up and say, for the information of the Government and for the information of the country, whether they were ready in that House distinctly to state what kind of supremacy they were willing to accept for this Parliament when they created a Parliament in Ireland; but not one of them rose in his place. The cheers that greeted the right hon. Gentleman from his Irish supporters on the previous night, he thought, emphatically proved that they were in a tight place; that they felt that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham had placed them front to front with a difficulty out of which they themselves could not escape; and when the Prime Minister, with his wonderful eloquence, came to their support, that he merited the cheers which they gave him for saving the situation. Was there any wonder that hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House had been anxious to have some light thrown upon this Bill by hon. Members below the Gangway who were to guide and govern the destinies of Ireland when they had Home Rule—and England too? When they talked of the supremacy that they proposed to reserve to the British Parliament, he ventured to say it would mainly depend whether it was worth anything or nothing on the action of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway who were to form the new Government they proposed to create in Ireland. There was not one of those gentlemen who was deficient in the powers of eloquence; why, therefore, he wondered, did they all sit silent? Because it was an answer they dared not give. They were answerable in that House, no doubt, to the leadership of the right hon. Gentleman, but they were absolutely dependent upon the men on the other side of the Channel who sent them to Parliament; and if the words they used in that House conflicted with what they had stated to their constituents in Ireland, he ventured to say they would have an extremely bad time—worse even than they had now, and that was bad enough—when they visited their constituents. He thought that accounted, at any rate, mainly for the speech of the Prime Minister—a speech which spoke to the Radicals and directed them to keep silent, and which told hon. Members below the Gangway to perform that most difficult of operations—that was to hold their tongues. There was one point he desired to make before he sat down. They had a Government now in Office under coercion. This Home Rule Bill and this Home Rule policy was an extorted Bill and an extorted policy. He could quote speech after speech by hon. Members below the Gangway which absolutely proved to demonstration what he said. There was the hon. and learned Member for North Louth, who was very clear and distinct on the subject. Looking forward, as he did at that time, to the period when the present Government would come into Office, this was what the hon. and learned Member for North Louth said—“If the Liberal Party should fail us.” This dealt directly with the Union of Hearts. The Union of Hearts was supposed to be the spontaneous action of the mutual affection between the Irish Separatists and the English Gladstonians; but he had always warned the Gladstonian Party that the Union of Hearts was a very uncertain quantity. It was a Union of conditional amorousness. This was what the hon. and learned Member for North Louth said—

“If the Liberal Party should fail us, then we shall be free and independent to deal with them as we were in dealing with the Tories in 1886. I am satisfied they will not fail us.”

Here was the conditional amorousness—

“We have a hand for the grasp of friendship and another to make them quake, and they are welcome to whichever it pleases them most to take.”

Those words clearly showed that the Union of Hearts was a conditional union, otherwise a Nationalist like the hon. and learned Member for North Louth would not say they were welcome to either one or the other. If he was really in love with hon. Gentlemen opposite it would not be welcome to him if they received his hate instead of love. There was a bargain entered into between hon. Members below the Gangway and the Government; and the condition of it was that if the Government would bring in a Bill and create a Parliament and Executive in Ireland, then the hon. Member would confer his love upon the Government. There was no doubt as to the ground the Loyalists took up. They opposed this 1st clause on the highest principle which could actuate the minds of men in opposing any clause. They believed it to be absolutely destructive of freedom and liberty. They would take no part in the Assembly in Dublin, either in the Lower House or the Upper House, and any Amendment they would have to move would be not inside but outside its walls. He ventured to say that the British people, to whom the final appeal lay, were learning more and more every day the character of what was, in his opinion, the disgraceful compact entered into between the Government and their supporters below the Gangway. They had in those hon. Gentlemen a Party elected by the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland and subsidised by foreigners. It was a new thing in the history of this country to have a Party in that House subsidised by foreigners; and if any hon. Member would take the trouble to subscribe to and read that very flourishing paper The Freeman's Journal, he would see that 12,468 dollars had been cabled over from America to the Nationalist Party. This clause they were now examining proposed to create a Legislature and Executive in Ireland, and to place it under the authority of men who were subsidised by foreigners. He did not say there was anything disgraceful to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway in receiving those subsidies, because they looked upon England as a foreign country. But he maintained that when the British public realised, as they must—and they were realising it more and more every day—that this was a compact between the British Government and a foreign subsidised Party, they would be more and more anxious at the next Election to scout the Government and its policy into the oblivion they deserved. They (the Opposition) believed that, in opposing this clause, and in opposing this Bill as they had done, they were actuated by the highest principles that could guide the minds of men, and they were opposing a policy which would destroy their freedom as well as the freedom of Great Britain. And why had this compact been made? Why was it that the Government of this country had consented to a compact so low and so base? Simply for the honour of sitting on the Treasury Bench, for which, for the first time in the history of England, they had been satisfied to sacrifice all other honour.

Sir EDWARD REED and Mr. A. J. BALFOUR rose together; but the former gave way to the latter.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I certainly shall not cut out an hon. Member who, I am sure, has a right to speak upon this question, owing to the public part which he has taken with regard to the general Home Rule policy. As far as I am concerned, at all events, I shall not do anything to unduly prolong a Debate which is now, I believe, not far from its conclusion. But, Mr. Mellor, I think that even those who have most reluctantly engaged in these Debates must have now realised that certainly no undue length of time has been taken up by this Committee in dealing with what is, after all, the central citadel of the measure. If we pass this clause, which, though brief in its terms, is pregnant in its contents, we pass the principle of the measure; and all the other 30 or 40 clauses which we shall have to discuss during the next two or three months are all designed to mitigate as far as possible and qualify the evils that this 1st clause, unqualified, will bring upon us. They are intended to make that which is fundamentally impossible possible, and to make that which is essentially intolerable tolerable. I do not think they will succeed; but, at all events, we have a right—surely even the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland will admit that we have a right—before this clause is finally put to the Committee, to say one or two words both as to the merits of the clause itself, and even more as to the treatment we have received in discussing this clause of the Bill from those who are nominally in charge of it, and who in theory, at all events, are entrusted with the duty of explaining its provisions and their policy to the House. The second speech of the Solicitor General is really by itself an adequate justification of the Debate we have had. The Solicitor General—long desired and anxiously expected—got up late last night, and we listened to him with great interest and profound respect. We gathered that he was going to give us the views of the Government and his great legal authority on the question of supremacy; and what were his views? His views were that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament was indefeasible, and that even an Act of Parliament or any proceeding to which this House could be a party would be absolutely inefficacious in divesting ourselves of powers which we must to all eternity possess. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Sir John Gorst), in a brief recital of certain controversies about supremacy in the last century, pointed out that, on the showing of the Solicitor General himself, the indefeasible authority of this Parliament over Ireland rested upon Statute, and that what Statute had established Statute could destroy. At all events, it is a paradox beyond credibility to say that we could not reverse the process by which the Union with Ireland was accomplished, and could not by a series of Statutes, and possibly by other operations, bring back the condition of things which existed in the time of Grattan's Parliament. I will put one question to the Solicitor General. If the Imperial Legislature is incapable of divesting itself of its authority, how came it that Grattan's Parliament divested itself of its authority? That was, as I understand, an Assembly of sovereign authority over Ireland; but by various Acts, in which the Irish and the English Legislatures had taken part, that sovereign authority deprived itself of its powers. Without pressing this question further, it is clear that if you went back and reversed one by one each of the steps, statutory or otherwise, by which we have reached our present condition, we should restore the condition existing before 1800—namely, a Sovereign Parliament in this country and another Sovereign Parliament in Ireland. So now we have it from the Government themselves that, so far from the authority of this Parliament being indefeasible, it can be destroyed by the same series of operations by which it was created. But it is not the Solicitor General with whom I wish to deal. After all, it is only his business to treat of the purely legal aspect of the question, and that is always the most insignificant aspect. I have to deal with the speech of the Prime Minister, whom I am sorry not to see in his place. Perhaps, if he is in the building, he will be able to return to the House, or, if not, he will not object to anything I say in his absence. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham made a brilliant and incisive speech, in which he recited, on four or five fundamental points, the arguments which we had advanced upon the 1st clause of this Bill, and pointed out the total absence of any reply given by the Prime Minister at any stage of the discussion. I will only at present take two of those points, and on those two I will test the procedure adopted by the Prime Minister. The first is the question of the retention of the Irish Members, and the attitude which the Government propose to take up some day or other, when we get to it, on Clause 9. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham said most truly that the question of the position of the Irish Members when this Bill passes has the most essential and necessary connection with the question of supremacy; that you cannot discuss supremacy until you know what that position is, and that there is not a clause in the Bill which may not require to be modified in one way or another according to the decision at which the Government may arrive. How did the Prime Minister reply? He said—

“Is it not a monstrous procedure that we should be asked to pin ourselves now, before we hear the arguments, to one particular solution of a problem which we know to be difficult? We mean to keep an open mind on the question. We have followed public opinion up to this time, and we mean to go on following it, and to ask us to declare beforehand that it is a question of life and death, a question of confidence, that the particular proposals in the Bill should be carried, is to demand a course of procedure which no Government has yet ever taken.”

Let us grant the grain of truth which lies at the bottom of the argument. I do not ask the Government to go to the length of vacating Office if Clause 9 does not pass exactly as it is. I do not ask them to dissolve if they are beaten on any Amendment. I leave that entirely to their discretion when the contingency arises. But I do ask them to have a policy, and, if they have a policy, to tell us what it is. I will explain exactly what I mean. The Prime Minister thinks there is no alternative between nailing your colours to the mast and the policy of throwing a clause down on the Table to be torn to pieces and modified at the sweet will of an irresponsible majority. There is not only a third course, but one that is almost universally adopted by every Government, and which has already been adopted by this Government in another connection. I ask them to do no more in defining their own proposals in Clause 9 than they have done with regard to the question of the two Chambers. I ask them to do no more than declare that they are going, in order to carry out their policy, to exercise the same gentle pressure which made their whole Party assent to the principle of two Chambers. I ask, then, are they going to do that? Do they think that this question is so absolutely insignificant that it is competent for a Government which professes to govern—competent for hon. Gentlemen who profess a Home Rule policy—to know so little about that policy that they will not even lay it upon the Table, and, as I say, use the ordinary machinery of legislation in this House to see that the proposals they approve of are carried into effect? No, Sir; it appears that the Government, as far as we understand their position, are going to propose a clause in this House; but, as we shrewdly conjecture, a very moderate degree of discussion, and a very gentle amount of violence, will induce them to fall; and all we want to know is—In what direction are they going to fall? It is not too much to ask them, in discussing this matter, that we should have some slight adumbration of the line they propose to take. I pass from that illustration of the reply given by the Prime Minister to one which I think is even more characteristic and important. It dealt with the declarations, made by one of the two Parties to the bargain about Home Rule, with regard to the supremacy of Parliament after Home Rule was passed. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham read a number of extracts from the utterances of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, stating the views which they held on this subject. How was this case met by the Prime Minister? He turned round, and in the most impassioned accents asked the right hon. Member for West Birmingham whether, if he was attacking the consistency of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, there was a more inconsistent gentleman in the House than himself? If I understood the right hon. Member for West Birmingham—and, unlike some other great orators in this House, his meaning, at all events, is usually clear—he was not reproaching hon. Members below the Gangway for inconsistency, but rather for consistency. If the right hon. Gentleman had wanted to deal with inconsistency, it is not to those Benches below the Gangway he would have turned, but to that (the Treasury) Bench, where we see put up, like specimens in a museum, every possible species of the genus pervert, from the Prime Minister, who has run through the whole gamut of political opinions in his life, down to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has changed his opinions much less often, but who, when he does change them, changes them with such explosive and rapid violence that we hardly know how to follow the strange career which he pursues. But the questions put to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway were not by way of criticism of their consistency or their inconsistency. They were demands for a plain answer to a plain question. And why is that plain answer not given? It was not given because the Prime Minister, with great judgment as I thought, implored his allies below the Gangway to hold their tongues. The Prime Minister and hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway have made a kind of compact in dealing with this Bill. He is to manage this Bill by way of oratory, and they are to manage the Bill by way of interruption, and the mutual support thus given appears to be eminently satisfactory to both Parties. But I notice the right hon. Gentleman, whatever else he may do to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, does not trust them to defend their own case. He reminds me of the Homeric deity who came forward when some friendly hero got into trouble and involved him with clouds—in this case in a cloud of words—and carried him from the field. In this case the right hon. Gentleman's Irish allies are permitted to escape by being involved in a cloud of words, and they are carried from the field in safety. The right hon. Gentleman, in a speech of astonishing eloquence, though, perhaps, of a somewhat flimsy description, declared that hon. Members who were suffering from oppression could not be expected to say exactly what they meant. I may, however, remind the Committee that none of the quotations given by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) last night were of an earlier date than 1891 or 1892; while one of them was from a magazine article written since the Dissolution and since the present Government came into Office, and by that time I presume that the reign of confusing oppression had come to an end. The question put to the Irish Members yesterday by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham and which the Irish Members were not allowed to answer was a plain one—namely, whether they were prepared or not to adhere to their reiterated declarations with regard to the freedom of the Irish Legislature from the control of the Imperial Parliament? If those hon. Members do adhere to those declarations, hon. Members opposite sitting behind the Government are living in a fools' paradise, because they have been led to become parties to a compact which is opposed to the principles which they profess. If, on the other hand, the only other possible alternative is to be accepted, then hon. Members below the Gangway must have given up all the declarations they made in 1891 and 1892, and their magazine articles are so much waste paper ; and in that case let them state that their views upon this question are altered. The only reply of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to this argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was that he was content with the Parliamentary utterances of hon. Members below the Gangway, and that he had heard four very excellent speeches delivered by representative Irish Members below the Gangway, and that hon. Members below the Gangway entirely accepted the proposals of the Government, and, therefore, threw over entirely their recent declarations. It is impossible for this House to proceed with the Bill in Committee with any confidence that the measure is to be a permanent settlement whilst the silence below the Gangway remains unbroken. I must admit that even if the hon. Members below the Gangway were to make bonâ fide, as I am satisfied it would be, the statement that their declarations of 1891 and 1892 were inaccurate, my own confidence in such a statement would be very little increased. It is impossible for us to say how long such fresh convictions on the part of hon. Members below the Gangway will stand. When hon. Members make declarations not only on the part of themselves, but of the Irish people and of the Irish race all over the world, and suddenly assert that their opinions on matters in respect of which those declarations have been made have undergone a change, I do not think that any deep root of permanence can be expected to result from such declarations or from such changed opinions. If the hon. and learned Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) were to come down to the House and were to say—"I have recently made declarations to the effect that I would only be satisfied by the creation of an independent Parliament for Ireland ; but I have changed my conviction and am now quite ready to be a party to a new bargain under which the Irish Legislature is to be a subordinate one," I ask what confidence could any hon. Member put in such a declaration on the part of the hon. Member ? We should be driven to the conclusion that Parliamentary pressure had been brought to bear upon the hon. Member under which he had been compelled to alter his views. The world has only to look at the general tenour of the utterances of the hon. and learned Member for the last few years to see that he has never denied the abstract right of the Irish people to have a supreme Parliament for themselves, and that he still maintained that right on their behalf. I think that I have, in no violent language, re-stated the argument of hon. Members below the Gangway, and I think that hon. Members sitting behind the Government will find it difficult in their hearts to refute or to ignore my statement. The only excuse that hon. Members opposite can put forward for supporting this proposal to set aside the authority of the British Parliament is that it will lead to a final settlement of the Irish Question ; but if they will candidly consider the list of authorities quoted by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, and which are not yet repudiated by the Irish Members, they will see that their hopes of a final settlement are founded upon a quicksand, and that the smallest storm or the slightest flood would bring those hopes in ruin to the ground. I put it to the hon. Members opposite that, in accepting the principle of this Bill as a final settlement, they are following men who, upon their own confessions, do not know their own minds. ["No !"] Well, perhaps they have not told us what their own minds are. We do know what their own minds were in 1892 ; but we do not know what they are now. They are following men who either do not know their own Bill, or, if they do, will not tell us what it is, or they are following men who do not know their own mind, or, if they do, will not tell us what that mind is. These are not conditions under which victory is possible, or under which sound legislation could be carried into effect. Therefore, I must earnestly implore hon. Members, before it is too late, to register their verdict against this fundamental and essential clause of the Bill, without which the whole of the rest of the measure must necessarily perish.

*SIR EDWARD J. REED (Cardiff) said, he thought no reasonable person who considered the nature of this clause, and the magnitude of its effect, could complain of its having occupied a good deal of the time of the House. He had himself no intention of speaking that day, but for the speeches of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) and the hon. and gallant Member for Armagh (Colonel Saunderson). It seemed to him (Sir Edward Reed) quite astounding that they should give away so much of their case because of the prospect of this clause passing; for, while on the Ministerial side they had no reason to complain, or at any rate to be surprised, at the length of the Debate, neither could the Opposition have any reason to be surprised at their maintaining that a great Debate was not necessary on the 1st clause, for the simple reason that every man in that House pledged in any way or degree to Home Rule for Ireland must approve of this 1st clause. With regard to the speech of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, he seemed to infer from the fact that they were disinclined to introduce the word "subordinate" into the clause that, therefore, they on the Ministerial side had abandoned the idea of Ireland possessing a subordinate Legislature, and he had taken pains for years to gather together the statements which hon. Members on the Ministerial side had made in this respect. Well, he need not take any trouble about his (Sir Edward Reed's) speeches, for he told him in the frankest manner that he had never advocated, never thought of advocating, and never would advocate—and in the final result would not vote for—any Bill giving a Legislature for Ireland which did not provide for the full control, properly defined, of the Imperial Parliament. But he found great difficulty at that stage of the Bill to seek to give effect to this view, because it was only when they had the Bill as finally settled before them that they could determine whether the supremacy of this Imperial Parliament had been in any way interfered with. Consequently, he sat with much complacency and listened to the Debate at that stage, because he was satisfied that the introduction of the word "subordinate" into the clause, if agreed to, would have given no kind of satisfaction or security to the opponents of the Bill; and because he was quite sure that if they were to be satisfied and were to have sufficient security, that must be brought about in the manner defined by the Prime Minister by the introduction of a special clause in the Bill, making due provision for all that was desirable. Members opposite seemed to be much disposed to cast contempt upon Members on the Ministerial side of the House, because hitherto they had been voting solidly in connection with this Bill. ["No!"] At all events, they had done their best to make the Ministerial Party vote solidly, because, in his own case, which he took as an example, no sooner did his opponents find he was engaged in a controversy with a section of his constituents than they brought out a Conservative candidate to take advantage of the situation. The effects of that transaction had been to make hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House, who wished to exercise an independent judgment on this Bill, not, he hoped, to sacrifice in any degree the independence of their judgment, but to be very careful in the exercise of that independence. Well, he was rather astonished to hear opponents of the measure laying so much stress on the fact that Nationalist Members from Ireland had not spoken in this Debate. He was at a loss to understand why they should speak. This clause provided for the establishment of an Irish Legislature. They could not say anything in objection to that. What could they have to say in support? He would admit this to the Opposition. He attached, himself, little weight to the phrases used by some high and responsible persons on the Ministerial side, touching "the Union of Hearts," and in making appeals to the loyalty and good feeling of Irish Members; and he might say he heard with considerable pain, the other night, the Prime Minister speak of all those transactions in which hon. Gentlemen opposite (the Irish Nationalist Party) were engaged in times past, and which were universally condemned. He was sorry to hear the Prime Minister minimise their past conduct by saying there were occasions when they had stepped slightly from the straight line of perfect wisdom. Wrongful acts performed years ago remained wrongful acts still; and he found it hard, not to say impossible, to reconcile any instigation of their committal with the principle of justice and morality. But that did not alter his willingness to give Home Rule to Ireland. The language he should prefer to employ was this. He should say—"In the past you were in a rebellious state of mind, carrying on after a certain fashion what you yourselves regarded as rebellion and revolution; and now by this Bill—if it passes—you will be placed in a position of the greatest responsibility. You will be charged with the interests of your country; and I should hope you, under these conditions, will turn from the methods and practices by the rebellious period and do what revolutionists have done in many ages—become excellent legislators and administrators of their country." The Ministerial Party need not be frightened by these words, though they used them. Probably the House was familiar with the lines of one of the poets, in which he spoke of rebels or rebellion, and said—

"How many a spirit born to bless Hath perished 'neath that withering name,
Whom but a day's, an hour's, success,
Had wafted to eternal fame."

He would strengthen himself in that position by a remark made by the late Mr. Parnell. He did not know whether it was just to Mr. Parnell's memory to relate this; but he could not avoid mentioning a matter bearing so intimately on the case before them. In conversing once with him, Mr. Parnell made this observation—"You must remember, when Home Rule is passed for Ireland, I and my friends will be the Conservative Party and the principal Party of Ireland, because the result of the past life of Ireland is such that there are many men in Ireland of an extremely troublesome character; and it will be my duty, when charged with the responsibility of government, to deal with them—and we shall be bound to deal with them—from a Conservative point of view." Mr. Parnell added this—"You must bear in mind that the Parliament we are to have will be but a statutory Parliament, and that the power which created it—namely, the Parliament sitting here at Westminster—can destroy it at any time; therefore it will be on its good behaviour." Perhaps he (Sir Edward Reed) might now remark on other parts of the Bill in relation to this clause. He confessed he sympathised very much with the Opposition in their desire to know more definitely and definitively what the Government intended in reference to the representation of Ireland in that House. It was no use in these matters or any others arguing in a circle. It was no use saying—"We must know before we pass the 1st clause what is to be the future of this Parliament"; any more than it was necessary to say—"We must know what are to be the financial conditions before we pass the 1st clause." But it was rumoured in the Press that one of the things contemplated by the Government was to retain in this Parliament the whole representation of Ireland, with freedom to vote on all subjects. All he could say was that it would be impossible for the human imagination to conceive a set of conditions more absolutely irreconcilable with those conditions under which Members on the Ministerial side first persuaded their constituents—as they had often to do—to become reconciled to their doctrines. And when this question was viewed in relation to the present state of the representation of the other parts of Great Britain, it gathered tenfold force. He had the privilege to represent 150,000 people in the House; and was he to be told that after the passage of this Home Rule Bill he should possess only one-eighth of the representative power in the House of hon. Members from Ireland? That they should have eight Members to represent 150,000 people, and that Cardiff should have only one? Why, a Redistribution Bill, as an antecedent condition to such a state of things, would be absolutely necessary; and, in his judgment, the Government would have to take careful account of that consideration before they came to the Third Reading of the Bill; because, while there might be many things hon. Members would do to support their Party, one thing they would not do was to participate in a wholesale manifold injustice to the people they represented. While he held that view, he was not anxious on the point at present, for the reason that the Prime Minister had stated more than once that Clause 9—he had given his pledge to that as a reason why they should pass Clause 1—he had pledged himself to the effect that Clause 9 might undergo modification by the House. He was only waiting for the decision of the House on Clause 1; and if the Prime Minister were, when the time came, to use his power and authority with the Ministry in order to force upon his supporters the expediency of a particular solution of that question, after that unlimited promise and pledge, he should regard the transaction as a breach of faith, and he should not be prepared to acquiesce in it. He did not wish to trespass on the time of the Committee. [Cries of "Go on!"] He had thought it necessary to say a few unprepared words, for the reason that he was not able to understand why hon. Members should think their case was gone when the clause was passed. They should bear in mind, as he had already said, that this clause must be supported by every man who sat there as a Home Ruler. Such a man could not possibly vote against it. There was no language in it which would justify them in voting against it. Not to vote for it, a man must give up his Home Rule views and principles altogether. He was so anxious about the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament that he should watch with the utmost care the course the Government took in respect of it; and, more than that, he knew there were many hon. Members on the Ministerial side who would be prepared to do the same, and were regarding the course of the Government in that respect with great anxiety. He was so sensitive on the point himself that the other night he would not vote against the introduction of the word "subordinate," although he could not vote for it. But he did not wish to take any step that would seem to compromise him with his constituents, or drive him from the position he had held with them. Not on the Ministerial Bench only, but on the Liberal Benches behind it, men were to be found who had given explicit engagements to their constituents that nothing but a subordinate Parliament was contemplated. But there was another side to the question—and he would ask their opponents to regard this side of it with proper consideration and respect—that those who were really in favour of Home Rule for Ireland were anxious not to give a Home Rule that would not and could not work. They had no right to charge a body of men or a nation with the responsibility of conducting their own affairs and beset them with restrictions and engagements which would deter them from performing their duty in a proper manner. He believed that feeling existed in its full strength in the minds of all Members on the Government side. At any rate, he might say this—that some of the younger Members who had recently come into Parliament, and were, not unnaturally, impatient with its slow process, should remember that they were dealing with a question which puzzled not only the Opposition, but the Government to do full justice to their own views and intentions. The speeches of the previous night by the right hon. Members for Cambridge University (Sir John Gorst) and East Manchester (Mr. A. J. Balfour) showed there were difficulties in the matter for them as well as for the supporters of the Government. The assurance he (Sir Edward Reed) gave to the Committee was that he—and he believed that there were others on the Ministerial side—was anxious, on the one hand, to give the Irish Members every possible fair chance for the due performance of the obligations this Bill would cast upon them, and, on the other hand, to do nothing which would impair the authority of the Imperial Parliament.

Sir Edward J. Reed

*MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) said, he had not had an opportunity of speaking on the Second Reading Debate; and he, therefore, asked the indulgence of the House to say a few words of a general character on the discussion of the 1st clause of the Bill. He was one of those who came within the category mentioned by the noble Lord opposite—that was to say, a moderate Gladstonian Home Ruler. He admitted that he was committed, like a good many hon. Members on that side, including the hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House, to a policy of Home Rule in dealing with Irish affairs; but he was also distinctly pledged to do nothing whatever which would impair the full authority of the Imperial Parliament in dealing with Irish affairs if necessary, as well as with English or Imperial affairs. As the hon. Member had indicated, in his own case, when the Bill had passed through Committee, it would be for him (Mr. Bolton) also to consider how far it met those conditions which he considered essential in connection with any measure of this kind; and if he found that it did not, to modify his attitude with reference to it. With regard to this particular clause, he had voted against certain Amendments that had been moved, because he thought that the Amendments with which he sympathised had better come in another form in other parts of the Bill. He fully intended that there should be only a subordinate Legislature in Ireland; but he did not desire that, associated with the description of the Legislature in this clause, there should be terms used calculated to give offence, and which would be for any practical object inoperative. Distinguished Constitutional lawyers suggested that it was necessary to strengthen the special statement in the Preamble by adding declaratory words as to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament in the main parts of the Bill. What harm could there be in setting forth in the measure that the Irish Legislature was a subordinate one if it really was intended that it should be subordinate? He (Mr. Bolton) had heard, with great satisfaction, the observations of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, in which he distinctly laid it down that he would be prepared to consider, and consider favourably, any practical proposal to give effect to these requirements. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) had put an Amendment on the Paper to Clause 2; and he hoped the Government would very seriously consider whether they could not accept that Amendment. Possibly a clear, specific, Declaratory Clause, either at the commencement of the Bill or at the end, would have been more satisfactory even than the Proviso of the right hon. Member for Bury; but if the right hon. Gentleman was satisfied—and he was a great Constitutional lawyer—he (Mr. Bolton) would be satisfied also. The right hon. Gentleman had given a very forcible reason why an Amendment of this kind should be adopted. He stated that the Act would not be construed only by distinguished Judges sitting in high places of judicial authority, but would have to be considered by comparatively small Judges and Magistrates, in remote parts of Ireland; and it was desirable that there should be, in no unmistakable way, on the face of the Statute a clause setting forth that the Legislature created was distinctly a subordinate one. He would not labour the argument. It was sufficient, as a friend and supporter of the Government, to urge them to consider the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman in a sympathetic way; and he appealed to hon. Gentlemen from Ireland to give a fair and dispassionate consideration to the proposal, because they had to satisfy not their enemies but their friends and the general British public, who were somewhat anxious about this and some other points. The veto should be clear and explicit, resting in the hands of the responsible Ministers of the Crown—not the Irish Ministers, but the Ministers having the confidence of Parliament. It should not be exercised in unimportant matters, or in domestic matters which concerned especially the Irish people, and did not outrage the sense of justice of the general community. The veto should be a practical weapon which should not be needlessly or recklessly used or flourished offensively, but which should always be effective if occasion arose. With regard to the Imperial Judiciary, it was desirable that, as in the United States, it should have a visible existence throughout Ireland. It should not be mixed up with the local Irish Judiciary.

MR. LABOUCHERE rose to Order. He asked whether the hon. Gentleman was in Order on this clause in referring to the Judiciary?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is, no doubt, going too much into detail.

MR. BOLTON said, he admitted he was going somewhat beyond the clause; but, from circumstances which were within the knowledge of the House, he had not had an opportunity of speaking on the Second Reading. He at once accepted that intimation from the Chair. As to finance, which was a subject which would come within the control of the Irish Legislature, he could not support the observations of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) that the British public were indifferent as to spending £500,000 a year to enable the Irish Legislature to carry on its business. If they supplied the Irish people with a Legislative Assembly, there was no responsibility on their part to find it, at the expense of the British public, with money to carry on its operations, and he did not believe the Irish Representatives could be so foolish as to imagine that they would get an endowment from the British people in connection with their legislative affairs. They only wanted, so they said, and he believed, to have fair treatment. He also hoped there would be some provision to adjust as between this Parliament and the Legislature to be created other questions, such as the Land Question, so that they might know before the Bill left the House whether the Imperial Parliament was to deal with that question within three years, or whether it was to be left to the Irish Legislature, and, if so, upon what terms. He should also like to refer to another matter—namely, the question of Ulster. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) that the Ulster Members had made a great mistake, as they believed that they would be injuriously affected by the Bill in not proposing that they should be excluded from its operations. It was almost impossible for Members like himself, who desired to do full justice to the claims of Ulster, to overcome the difficulty the Ulster people put them in. What they said amounted to this—“We don't want Home Rule for ourselves, and, therefore, we won't let the rest of Ireland have it.” That was almost a dog-in-the-manger policy, and placed those who desired to give fair and just consideration to the claims and representations of Ulster in a position of great difficulty. He believed they would find that by adopting a policy of that kind they would lose the sympathy of the British public. The Prime Minister had committed himself to giving Ulster separate treatment if Ulster desired it. If Ulster was not to be excluded from the Bill, having regard to recent events there, they must consider what guarantees and securities should be put in the Bill with the view of satisfying the anxieties of the people of that Province and of reconciling them to the policy of the measure. He could not conceal from himself that this measure was really a large experiment. He did not regard the Bill with the feeling of absolute confidence that prevailed in some parts of the House.

He had tried several modes of government, and, coercion having failed, he admitted that sooner or later of local self-government he given to Ireland by one Party or the other and on the lines of the present Bill—reduced in its scope and character. Certain it was that if the Party opposite came into power they would have to introduce a measure of local government for Ireland. Therefore, he asked himself—and he asked hon. Gentlemen opposite—whether it was not better, instead of ungenerously criticising the Bill as a whole, to endeavour to make it a practical measure acceptable to all parties. If they would do that he promised them they would have the support, if not of many Members, at any rate of some men on the Liberal side. This Bill was, he said, a great experiment. He knew there were Members prepared to vote for anything and everything at the bidding of their Party Leaders; but there was a certain amount of independence in certain quarters of the House, and there were Members who were prepared to say what they thought about the Bill, who were not afraid to make suggestions and state objections—not offensively, but with the determination of having them fairly and reasonably considered. This Bill, he repeated, was a large experiment, which he looked upon with hope rather than with confidence or certainty. But he believed if the Bill was brought within the practical lines and the scope of an enlarged measure of Local Government, such as the Prime Minister had, in his speech introducing the Bill, in one place referred to it, it would be acceptable to the country, and ultimately become law. He admitted that they ought to go as far as they could towards satisfying the wishes and requirements of Irishmen; but they were not bound to grant everything that was asked. While we were willing to advance towards the hopes and desires of Irishmen they, in their turn, must be willing to consider the doubts and anxieties that existed in the minds of our people in this country. There ought to be no objection to reasonable safeguards in the provisions of the Bill, and the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament ought to be placed beyond doubt. While he would give the Government a general support in dealing with the Bill, he would reserve to himself the right of voting independently upon such Amendments as would bring the Bill within the lines he had indicated.

MR. MACARTNEY rose—

Mr. John Morley rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 308 ; Noes 260.—(Division List, No. 80.)

Question put accordingly, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 309 ; Noes 267.—(Division List, No. 81.)

Clause 2 (Powers of Irish Legislature).

MR. CAVENDISH (Derbyshire, W.) said, he wished to move to omit the words, "with the exceptions, and subject to the restrictions in this Act mentioned." He must, in the first place, ask the Committee to afford him that indulgence which, he believed, was generally accorded to a Member rising for the first time to address the House, his object being to make clear the subordinate character of the Irish Legislature by defining what powers it should be permitted to exercise. The Amendment would raise a discussion upon the principle upon which the powers to be conferred upon the Irish Legislature should be given. Obviously there were two methods, and the Prime Minister had indicated the two courses when introducing the Home Rule Bill of 1886, the two courses being the endowment of the new Legislative Body with special and specific powers, or the conferring of general powers with special exceptions. The course he (Mr. Cavendish) was advocating had, therefore, the support of authority ; but it was a course open for a Government to adopt. He hoped he would not be accused of raising debate with no distinctive Amendment, because it was the first formal Amendment which would be necessary if the Committee should deem it desirable to depart from the principles embodied in the clause, that of giving general powers to a Legislative Body with the exclusion of certain subjects in favour of the principle he advocated, that of enumerating particular and specific powers which the new Legislature should exercise. Of course, it might be urged that he did not fully bear the responsibilities which attached to such a proposal, inasmuch as he did not proceed to a definition of those powers ; but an argument of that kind would have less force when he said his object was simply, in the first place, to invite a decision as between the two principles of delegation and exclusion. If this Amendment were carried, then, of course, consequential Amendments would have to be filled in ; but if the Committee refused to adopt the principle of delegation, of course enumeration of subjects would be unnecessary. Only after the acceptance of the Amendment would it be necessary to enter upon the consideration of what the specific subjects should be. It would be presumptuous in a young Member of the House to take upon himself the grave and severe duty of suggesting the course the Government should follow ; but it was for the Government to indicate—whatever principle was adopted—what in their opinion the powers of the new Legislature should be. He preferred—though he was prepared to state his views of what the delegated powers should be—to leave that part of the subject to those more qualified by experience to lead opinion. He did not shrink from the duty as an impossible one, and in the British North America Act of 1867 there was a precedent, for in Section 92 certain subjects were named which were allowed by the House to be dealt with by the local Legislatures, and by those alone. Not only was that Act a precedent for the case he was now putting before the Committee, but also in the enumeration of subjects there was a list which with slight alterations might fairly be applied to Ireland. In pointing out the reasons in favour of granting specific powers to a subordinate Parliament as preferable to the principle embodied in the Bill, there was this to be said—that the latter was vague and shadowy, and, as had been pointed out, the restrictions could, with the exercise of a little ingenuity, be evaded. As impressing his views on the Committee, he would quote the opinion of a distinguished jurist, a learned Judge of Ontario cited in Dodd's Parliamentary Government for the Colonies. It was there stated that the Sovereign power had created several Governments, one of which was made superior and all the others were subordinate, and that certain definite subjects were to be dealt with by the subordinate Governments, but that all powers which were necessary for the peace, order, and good government of Canada were reserved to the superior Government of the Dominion. That arrangement would be equally applicable in the case of Ireland. Although Her Majesty's Government had confessed that this Assembly they proposed to establish was subordinate to the Imperial Parliament, they refused to embody that in terms in their Bill, and now he asked the Government to take a step which would make that Legislative Body truly and really a subordinate one. By the reception of this proposal they would show more clearly and precisely what the relationship between the two Parliaments would be. The present proposal was indefinite, vague, and shadowy, and perhaps hon. Members had a belief in their power to override the intention of the Act; but whether that would be possible or not, certainly it would be more satisfactory to know exactly the power the subordinate Parliament would have. In all cases where the House had delegated or conferred any power on any subordinate Body he believed the House had stated precisely and exactly what those powers should be, and that they should not be enlarged. There would be this difficulty in Ireland—that an Act of the Joint Legislature, outside its powers as an Enacting Body, would not have the force of the law; and, therefore, it might happen that the humblest Magistrate, sitting at Petty Sessions, might be called upon to decide, in relation to proceedings before him, whether the Irish Legislature had exceeded its powers. From either point of view, from the point of view of those who wished to see the Act in operation, and those who did not, there must be the wish that any Act passed by the Irish Legislature should have no doubt of its validity attaching to it. By accepting the principle of naming certain powers as within the provisions of the Legislature the difficulties would be to a large extent removed; but, as the Bill now stood, it would be necessary for the highest tribunal to say whether the Acts passed were as such as were within the powers of the subordinate Legislature. He expected no support from those who did not desire a subordinate Parliament; but he turned with some confidence to those who on platforms throughout the country had declared the intention of giving Ireland a local Parliament; for the management of local affairs, and nothing more. It was to be presumed that when hon. Members made these statements they had some idea what was meant by local affairs. Indeed, he believed there were some supporters of the Government who had gone very far in definition of powers for the new Parliament. He avoided mention of names, but there was a considerable section of supporters of the Government who somewhat approved of the policy now known as the gas and water principle of Home Rule. If the Government were unable to specify the subjects with which the Irish Legislature was to deal they might embody clauses in their Bill. Much had been said of the old language being abandoned, and he was willing to accept the retractations; but still he contended it would be wiser and more statesmanlike to confer first limited powers on the new body, and then upon the result and in course of time further powers might be conferred. This was an experiment, and too much caution could not be exercised. Under the happy Constitution they enjoyed the powers of Parliament had grown slowly from small beginnings, and undoubtedly in undertaking great constitutional changes they would do wisely to proceed slowly among the stumbling blocks that often attended the attempt at a too rapid rate of progress. Undoubtedly in Ireland and in England there were grave fears as to the result of the operation of such an Act as this, and he could not say that a too rapid rate of progress, if adopted, would remove those apprehensions. At any rate, they would be somewhat allayed if the power of the Legislature were strictly and clearly defined. It was no matter for surprise that doubts were expressed of the result of conferring extensive and general powers; and though he might be accused of ungenerous mistrust, and told that he should give the Irish Parliament everything, yet still he insisted that in such matters of deep importance it was wiser to adopt the safer and surer way.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 14, to leave out all the words from the beginning of the Clause to the word "there," in line 15.—(Mr. Cavendish.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'with the exceptions' stand part of the Clause."

MR. MACARTNEY moved to report Progress, for the purpose of calling attention to the conduct of the Government in moving the Closure on the last clause. [:"Order, order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The Closure being the act of the Committee, it cannot be called in question.

MR. MACARTNEY would only then express a hope that in the future conduct of Debates on this Bill the Chief Secretary—[Loud cries of "Order!"]

MR. MACARTNEY again rose.

COMPULSORY VACCINATION.

RESOLUTION.

*MR. HOPWOOD (Lancashire, Middleton) rose to call attention to the law making vaccination compulsory, and to move—

"That the law compelling vaccination of infants and young persons is unjustifiable, and ought to be repealed."

The hon. Member said that, in proposing this Resolution, he had undertaken a duty which he knew to be an important one, and he hoped that it would not fail because of the incompetency of the advocate. He stood there as the mouth-piece, on this question, of the country, whose voice with regard to it had not for many years found due expression in that House. The House of Commons in past times had been induced by promises expressed by medical opinion which were unfulfilled, and by assertions the truth of which had never been established by proper evidence, to pass a Compulsory Vaccination Act. His first proposition was that it was monstrous to enforce upon the people of the country compliance with a medical rite which was utterly useless as a safeguard against small-pox. During the last century inoculation was just as much favoured and supported by the medical profession as vaccination was in this century. Small-pox was introduced into the system by inoculation under the notion that it prevented further attacks of small-pox. They were surprised when Irishmen made "bulls." When Irishmen said something of an ingenuous kind—something that was paradoxical—they were inclined to laugh. Just see what inoculation meant as an Irishman would put it—"Sure the boy may be liable to an attack of small-pox, and sure the surest way is for me to give it to him straight." In the last century, in order that a man might escape the chance of small-pox, they gave him small-pox. It was the same way with vaccination in this century. In order that a child might escape the chance of a disease they gave it a disease. Generation after generation they put disease into the arms of successive infants—infants that were going to be the fathers and mothers of future families; and they added to the sum and reserve of the diseases of the world an added quantity, of which they knew not the range, the effect, or the result. Vaccination was introduced by Dr. Jenner. He advised anyone who was curious to note how from small beginnings and little shams great things arose in this world to read the history of Dr. Jenner and his system. He would not dwell upon that, but would only say that when vaccination was first propounded to the House of Commons it secured for its fortunate discoverer, or so-called discoverer, £10,000, and a little later a further sum of £20,000, the pretence then being that vaccination afforded a complete and entire safety against small-pox. But why should vaccination be compulsory? He contended that all the evidence was against compulsion. Lord Henry Petty, speaking in 1806, said—

"I have not the smallest inclination to propose any compulsory measures, being well convinced that, whatever may be our view of any subject of science, this House ought to pause very long indeed, before they prescribe any law to individuals upon matters which relate to their own health, and even on which the very existence of their children may depend. These, indeed, are topics upon which private individuals in society are to be allowed to be the most competent judges."

And two years later no less a person than George Canning spoke words of weight in the same sense—

"Although I consider the discovery of vaccination to be of the very greatest importance, yet I cannot imagine any circumstances whatever that would induce me to follow up the most favourable report of its infallibility with any measure for its compulsory infliction."

He would now quote one who was still amongst them—one who was, perhaps, the greatest of all that had gone before or come since—the present First Lord of the Treasury—

"I regard compulsion and penal provisions such as those of the Vaccination Acts," said the right hon. Gentleman, "with mistrust and misgiving; and were I engaged on an inquiry, I should require very clear proof of their necessity before giving them my approval."

John Bright had also declared that the law was "monstrous," and ought to be repealed. He need not remind the House of the expressions used by Jenner himself. It might be answered with some show of plausibility that these were but the too sanguine views of an inventor—these promises which were contained in the original “Inquiry,” that—

“What renders the cow-pox so extremely singular is that the person who has been thus affected is for ever after secure from the infection of the small-pox; neither exposure to the variolous effluvia, nor the insertion of the matter into the skin, producing this distemper.” These promises were renewed five years later in Further Observations on the Cow-pox, in which Jenner wrote—

“The human frame, when once it has felt the influence of the genuine cow-pox in the way that has been described, is never afterwards, at any period of its existence, assailable by the small-pox.”

That was false. It was now admitted on all hands in the medical profession that that statement was false. Yet it was backed up until late times by the Local Government Board. The Vaccination Department of the Local Government Board was an expensive institution. In that Department they had a body of men who were bound over by their education, by their tendencies, by their interests, to maintain vaccination.

*SIR B. WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): No, no!

*MR. HOPWOOD said, the Department got £9,000 for this purpose, and they had no other purpose. He did not mean to say that their views were intentionally wicked, but he submitted that if men were to be engaged to investigate a matter of controversy, the tendency was to choose men who were not committed one way or the other; and he thought that if vaccination was to be enforced, the Medical Authority of the Local Government Board was not an authority that the House should be exclusively guided by. He should have taken but little note of these expressions of opinion he had quoted were it not that he found them echoed in the words of one who more than all others was instrumental in the enactment and maintenance of our present laws in this matter. He meant the words of Sir John Simon, when he said, in 1857—

“On the conclusion of this artificial disorder, neither renewed vaccination, nor inoculation with the small-pox, nor the closest contact nor cohabitation with small-pox patients, will cause him to betray any remnant of susceptibility to infection.”

Mr. Hopwood

That, too, had been given up. Sir John Simon was examined before a recent Commission, when he was obliged to say that a great deal of this language was rhetorical, and when he was pressed whether he still maintained his assertion, he gave it up, and every sensible man must give it up. The promise of Sir John Simon had already been anticipated in almost identical terms in the speech in which, in 1853, the Second Reading of the first compulsory Vaccination Bill was moved in that House by Lord Lyttelton, when he declared, on April 12, 1853—

“It is unnecessary for me to speak of the certainty of vaccination as a preventive of small pox, that being a point on which the whole medical profession have arrived at complete unanimity.”

Of course, he might be reminded, not without some show of justice, that these claims had now been virtually abandoned in favour of a more moderate position. That more moderate position he was prepared to consider on its merits; but he had at once two things to reply to the objection—first, that the claim could not be truly described as abandoned so long as The Times and Lancet repeatedly declared, as they declared in their leader columns, that “no one need have small-pox unless he or she pleases.” That statement was false and misleading—editors of journals, whether political or medical, ought not to propound such statements, which were indefensible. And, secondly, he should repeat with all possible emphasis that it was all very well to now withdraw the claim that vaccination gave an absolute freedom from small-pox, and say now—“It is true that primary vaccination may be of no use, but you must re-vaccinate.” There was no obligation, under the law which they were discussing, that a person should be re-vaccinated. All that they were discussing was, whether infants should continue to be destroyed by this horrible Moloch of the medical profession. He called it Moloch, because its victims could be counted by the hundreds—indeed, he was entitled to say, the thousands. This he would prove by the evidence of the Registrar General. Five hundred and odd deaths of infants from vaccination pure and simple had occurred between 1870 and 1880. What did his hon. Friend say to that?

*SIR B. WALTER FOSTER: What are you quoting from?

*MR. HOPWOOD: You can see for yourself, sir, if you do not know. I told you it was the Registrar General. I am ready to-morrow or next day to give you the distinct reference; but if it is not in the hands of your Department, your Department is more incompetent than it should be. But was that the whole total of those who were sacrificed by vaccination? He doubted it. He knew it was very difficult to get a man who had done a fellow-creature to death, either by accident or misadventure under his hands, to state the truth, and they had it from a prominent medical officer that he himself often put into a death certificate that which was not the true cause of death "in order to save vaccination from reproach." "Convulsions" was a convenient cause to assign in registering the deaths of infants who died from the effects of vaccination. Erysipelas was one of the most painful forms of death, and it was a most common sequel of vaccination. There was no disease which brought an anguish more acute. As a rule 14 days at least of this suffering had to be endured before death was merciful, and set the little patient free. It was terrible! It was a responsibility which the House took upon itself every year it insisted on compulsory vaccination. The whole world united in testimony in refutation of that dogma—that vaccination was a sure protection from small-pox. The deaths from small-pox in the confessedly vaccinated were counted by tens, by hundreds of thousands. The Lancet itself calculated, in its issue for July 15, 1871, that in England and Wales, in the course of the one epidemic then raging, more than 122,000 vaccinated persons had suffered from small-pox. In 1881 the Highgate Hospital had 96 per cent. of its patients vaccinated, and this at a time when the highest estimate of the vaccinated in London did not exceed 90 per cent. So that the proportion of vaccinated patients to total patients inside the hospital was even greater than the proportion of vaccinated population to total population outside the hospital. In an outbreak of small-pox in Sunderland, in 1884, reported in the current Lancet of that date, there were again 96 vaccinated out of a total of exactly 100 cases. In 1881 there was an outbreak at Bromley of 43 cases, and every one of them was a vaccinated case. It was stated before the Royal Commission, on the authority of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, that 41,000 cases occurred of persons admittedly vaccinated between 1870 and 1886. This applied to London alone, and there could be found no other place, either here or abroad, in regard to which the same tale could be told. In the Highgate Hospital, in 1884, there were 474 cases; 447 were vaccinated, and of these 43 died, all vaccinated cases. To quote from the Highgate Hospital again, in 1885 there were 567 cases; of this number 532 were vaccinated, and of that number 82 died. The Metropolitan Asylums Board small-pox hospital ships had in 1890 22 cases, 21 vaccinated, 2 re-vaccinated, and 5 unvaccinated. The only two that died were the two re-vaccinated. In 1891 there were 63 cases, of whom 7 died; 53 vaccinated, of whom 2 died; 8 re-vaccinated, of whom 1 died; 10 unvaccinated, of whom 3 died, and 1 death was doubtful. In Prussia, held up in 1871 to a Committee of that House as an example of how a country ought to be vaccinated, the great epidemic of that year attacked 2,240 vaccinated children under 10 years of age, and killed 736 of them. That was a sufficient answer, surely, to those who held that complete security against small-pox could be obtained by a re-vaccination at the age of 12. Dr. Gayton, of the Homerton Small-pox Hospital, who spoke with the experience of more than 10,000 cases of small-pox before the Royal Commission, said—

"I think primary vaccination is a very fleeting protection indeed. As to the time that primary vaccination lasts I do not know, but I think it is a very short time."

In another answer he said—

"Primary vaccination would not ward off an epidemic."

And, in reply to a further question, he said—

"Post-vaccinal small-pox is of constant occurrence, and brings by far the larger proportion of inmates to the small-pox hospitals."

That was the evidence of a man who was in favour of vaccination, and who described his experience as extending over 10,000—he (Mr. Hopwood) believed it extended to as many as 13,000 cases; but, not being quite sure, he took it at 10,000. An hon. Friend reminded him that in June, 1883, he had the honour of standing before the House upon a similar duty he was performing to-night. He stood there under the leadership of as astute a Radical—he would not dwell on the name of Radical, but would say as astute a friend to liberty as ever adorned that House—Mr. Peter Taylor. On that occasion, Dr. Playfair, now Lord Playfair, spoke. He had previously declared that in Scotland they ordered things so that vaccination had stamped out small-pox. The words were hardly out of his mouth when a terrible epidemic ran its course in Scotland, and Dundee and Glasgow answered the speech of Dr. Playfair by a painful refrain. He knew that in Scotland they ordered things very roughly; their notion of the law did not square with his; they carried out the law without much listening to those who had to submit to it. But they had not succeeded in stamping out small-pox, and he would ask the hon. Gentleman who represented Glasgow whether the authorities were not at this moment under considerable tribulation? At this moment they had vaccinated up to 95 or 96 per cent., and yet the small-pox hospitals were filled with vaccinated cases. ["No, no!"] Anyone who said "No" in face of the facts brought forward it was useless to consider, as there was no hope of converting him, because he had been brought up in the belief that if a man died from small-pox after vaccination he was wrong in so doing, and had offended against the medical body. The usual resource in the case of death from small-pox was to say the patient had not been sufficiently vaccinated. He would like the House to listen to the way in which a witty friend of his illustrated the assertion of that belief in vaccination. His favourite assertion was that his children were washed with Pears' soap. They had not had measles because they had been protected against it by Pears' soap. If they had it slightly the slightness was due to Pears' soap; if they had it badly, then it was said—"Oh, yes; but if it had not been for Pears' soap they would have died." If they died they had this reflection—that they had done their duty as parents, but had not used enough of Pears' soap. That was practically the way in which the medical profession had defended this practice of vaccination and supported the compulsory law. Look where they would they found maintained a tradition of ill-success which commenced with the commencement of the practice itself, an ill-success which could no longer be denied or explained away when Lord Robert Grosvenor, vaccinated in 1801 by Jenner himself, in 1811 barely escaped with his life from an attack of confluent small-pox. Jenner was put to his wits' end; when the child got through he said—"The boy would have surely died but for having been vaccinated." The boy's friends said—"But you covenanted to protect him against the infection; have you succeeded?" "No," said Dr. Jenner, "but you ought to be grateful to me, for he would have died if he had not been vaccinated." So it was by the bedside of one of the most conspicuous of Jenner's failures that there was started the now fashionable doctrine of the vaccinal mitigation of small-pox. It had been enshrined in medical books as a fact not to be disputed; but there were many medical men who did dispute it, though to do so was to doom themselves to ostracism, to blight their future fortunes, to have every road to advancement in their profession stopped against them. There were many such, and nobly and well had they spoken out on behalf of those who had been called fanatics. He did not know why he should be called a fanatic; but he knew that those who started this war against vaccination were not the wealthy, the wise, and the educated—they were the poor who suffered from the use of the vaccinator's implement a use without care, without inquiry, and recklessly practised—and who suffered, as men and women must suffer, acutely in seeing the loss of their offspring. They had talked of mitigation and protection, but was the profession agreed? He thought it would be admitted that this claim of absolute protection had never, from the beginning, been true in fact. But more than that, he submitted, never could be true in theory. The theory had been that vaccinia—cow-pox—and small-pox were really identical diseases; that to vaccinate people was really only to carry them through the small-pox in a new way; that, in the words of Mr. Simon, "the vaccinated are safe against small-pox because they, in fact, have had it." But this theory was unsound at its very foundation. The differences between the two diseases had now been so fully set forth by Dr. Creighton and Professor Crookshank, and so convincingly laid before the Royal Commission, that few would now care to maintain the identity of the two diseases. Dr. Creighton himself pointed out the fact that, when he gave evidence on this point, no cross-examination of him was attempted. The Commission let him alone; they knew that he knew more than they did, and therefore they did not venture to handle him. Dr. Creighton on this topic said the two were not identical; and if that were so, what was the case for enforcing vaccination? He had just a word to say about the Royal Commission. It was set up by the late Government four years ago, and it would take another year before it arrived at a conclusion. He would tell them why they should not accept with implicit submission all they said. The contrary, because there was not a single avowed anti-vaccinator put upon it, though the people whose fears were to be allayed, and whose claims were to be heard, were those who had remonstrated on the ground of their disbelief in vaccination. He knew they added Mr. Charles Bradlaugh; but he was not an anti-vaccinator, though what he might have become afterwards he did not know, as he believed that what he saw and heard had a very great effect upon him. The names of several anti-vaccinators were put before Mr. Ritchie; but, acting on the advice of his Medical Department, he declined to place any of them on the Commission. Why should that be—were they afraid of the truth? On the question of efficacy he would quote Professor Crookshank, who thus concluded his work on the History and Pathology of Cow-pox—

“Unfortunately, a belief in the efficacy of vaccination has been so enforced in the education of the medical practitioner that it is hardly probable that the futility of the practice will be generally acknowledged in our generation, though nothing would more redound to the credit of the profession and give evidence of the advance made in pathology and sanitary science. It is more probable that when, by means of notification and isolation, small-pox is kept under control, vaccination will disappear from practice, and will retain only an historical interest.”

Could they tell him a name that stood higher than Professor Crookshank's, or ask him to assign any evidence more weighty? The practice of vaccination varied; they might vaccinate in any number of marks they pleased, from a single one advocated by Dr. Lee to the four which were recommended by our Local Government Board. In the Estimates that were passed every year, there was a considerable sum included as premiums paid by the Local Government Board to the medical profession not for care shown in the vaccination of unhappy infants, but for the cruel scars or “stars” produced on their arms; as to the lymph, they might try humanised lymph—arm to arm vaccination it was called—and in that way it was admitted that the ghastly risk of receiving disease was incurred. For long years the medical profession had denied the possibility of disease being inoculated by vaccination. This testimonial to the benignant nature of the operation was not merely general; it condescended to particulars. They were assured that the communication of syphilis by vaccination was not merely unknown, but impossible. Who could endorse that premise now? He should like to show the House what was the attitude maintained by the Local Government Board in this matter. He held in his hand a pamphlet, entitled, Facts for Heads of Families, and stated on its title page to be “Revised by the Local Government Board, and issued with their sanction,” and in it I read—

“The fear that a foul disease may be implanted by vaccination is an unfounded one. Such mischief could only happen through the most gross and culpable carelessness on the part of the vaccinator; and as all medical men now receive special training in vaccination, no risk of this kind need be at all apprehended. Of course, vaccination, like everything else, requires a reasonable amount of care in its performance. The alleged injury arising from vaccination is, indeed, disproved by all medical experience.”

There were several gross misrepresentations in this pamphlet; they had been brought to the attention of the Local Government Board, and he should like to know why such monstrous falsehoods continued to be conveyed to the public. He invited his right hon. Friend who was at the head of the Department, and who was not accustomed to this sort of official behaviour in reference to the public, to read this publication and set the matter right. To say that “The fear that foul disease may be implanted by vaccination is an unfounded one” was a direct falsehood. It was known beyond doubt that disease had been conveyed by vaccination over and over again. Why, then, was this statement allowed to be flaunted before the people of England as being issued with the authority of the Local Government Board? They were told that "Such mischief could only happen through the most gross and culpable carelessness on the part of the vaccinator, and as all medical men now receive special training in vaccination no risk of the kind need be at all apprehended. . . . The alleged injury arising from vaccination is, indeed, disproved by all medical experience."

Was that true? Had the Local Government Board a right to say that? If they had not it was a falsehood, and that, too, by a Department on which they ought to be able to rely implicitly. First of all, it was stated that mischief could only happen through gross carelessness. He could show them how Mr. Hutchinson, the great surgeon and syphilographer, expressed himself on this matter. In his work, Archives of Surgery, Mr. Hutchinson said—

"It is absurd to assert that inherited syphilis is always to be detected, and it is a cruel injustice to imply that all accidents have been the result of carelessness."

What was the course pursued by the Local Government Board in this matter? They had appointed a gentleman named Mr. Albert Bridges Farn to examine all the lymph on behalf of the Local Government Board—that was to say, all the supplies that were sent up from the public vaccinators all over the country before being re-issued. Mr. Farn was examined before the Royal Commission, and he was asked about the investigation he made. He stated that he had to examine all the supplies of lymph on behalf of the Local Government Board from all the public vaccinators. What did he say? He said that his examination of the lymph was mainly directed to the detection of blood corpuscles, though he did not say that blood was more likely to be the vehicle of disease than any other of the contents of the body; that he could not call it possible to distinguish between lymph which was syphilitic and lymph which was not, nor between that which was inflammatory and that which was not; and that no power he could bring to be detecting any of even if they were when he was at had ever guaranteed he replied that the words of Mr. Farn in his examination before the Royal Commission—

"Question 4173. Having regard to what you have told us, do you think it would be possible, from the microscopical examination you made, to guarantee that any lymph was pure?—No; I should not undertake to say whether it would be a guarantee that the lymph was pure. I do not know that you could do it."

It was insisted upon that every child should be vaccinated, or that the parent should be subjected to the loss of goods or sent to gaol or treated as a felon. Yet here it was admitted on the highest authority that there were no means of telling when there was true lymph or spurious lymph, which might contain the germs of disease. He begged the House to believe that if he left his case at that stage unfinished, it was but a fragment of that which he could place before them. But it was almost impossible, before what he would be excused for calling an uneducated audience in these matters, to compress into an hour and a quarter's speech all the evidence and the knowledge which had been accumulated in the course of 10 or 12 years. He was content to leave it to the House under these circumstances. Meantime, this system he had condemned went on; its martyrs were renewed from year to year; and he asked the House, in defence of these little ones, and in defence of the best interests of medical science, which concerned them all, to release the medical profession from the trammels of a law which stereotyped a remedy which was no remedy, which forbade future investigation, which bound hundreds and thousands of that profession in the bonds of self-interest to be content with that which had fallen to their lot, and muzzled or dulled their capacity for investigation. He begged to move the Resolution which stood in his name.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) begged to second the Motion, and remarked that after the somewhat exhaustive exposition which had been placed before the House, he felt that the best thing he could do was to make his remarks as condensed and as abbreviated as possible. When his hon. and learned Friend paid him the compliment of seconding the Motion,

tured to submit to his judgment whether it was opportune, seeing that a Royal Commission was sitting inquiring into the whole question, that that Commission, so far at least, had not moved in what his hon. Friend would consider a wrong direction, because the Government itself had so far manifested a complete readiness to fall in with the recommendations of that Commission, and, finally, because he could quite understand the House of Commons itself would be unwilling to anticipate by a vote one way or another the ultimate decision at which that Commission was likely to arrive. For the same reason he would suggest that it would scarcely be advisable for his hon. and learned Friend to force his Motion to a Division. At the same time, he should be glad, personally, if there was any real prospect of securing an overwhelming and decisive majority in favour of the Resolution which he ventured to second. It seemed to him there was a great deal to be said for this Resolution, and there was very little to be said for the existing law. The law appeared to him to be unreasonable, unequal, cruel, and, therefore, unjust and inexpedient. It was unreasonable, because at the best it was founded on mere presumption, and on presumption the more it was examined the weaker it appeared to be. On the one hand, it must be admitted that vaccination, apart from its supposed influence on small-pox, was an evil, and a cruel evil, to a reluctant parent. It was often a very cruel and very loathsome injury to the health of a child, and against this assured evil they had only the presumption of defence against a disease which attacked only a very small portion of mankind, and which the overwhelming majority of mankind escaped. This presumption of defence against a disease was, as he had said, getting weaker and weaker the more it was examined. The claims which were put forward on behalf of vaccination in the time of Dr. Jenner were of the extremest character. It was declared that vaccination was a complete and permanent protection and preventive of small-pox. After a while that position had to be abandoned, until now they found its advocates scarcely venturing to say more than that it was a possible, a temporary, and an occasional mitigant of the evils of small-pox. In view of the fact that even among the advocates of vaccination themselves there was an absence of any fixed or definite view, it was an unreasonable thing to make this medical rite compulsory upon a reluctant population. Some medical men contended that the danger from vaccination was small, others that it was great. One medical authority said that vaccination once was enough; another that the operation of vaccination ought to be repeated every 10 years; another every seven years, and others stated that to be really secure one ought to get vaccinated every year. Again, one medical man was of opinion that one mark was sufficient, another required two, and others from three to six, and even 12, whilst one medical man declared that the more marks there were the better, and the more frequent vaccination took place the better. It was something like those patent pills of which the advertiser said that the more you took of them the better. With regard to the lymph itself, there were contradictions and disagreements. One medical man considered that calf lymph alone should be used, and another wanted it to be humanised. Until medical men were agreed on all these points the lay population might be excused if they revolted against the proposal as to vaccination for the future. He protested against medical men setting themselves up as exclusive judges in this matter. There was absolutely nothing in the subject which required any scientific knowledge, and medical men themselves at last were driven back into statistics, and precious statistics some of them were! If they examined the statistics which had been recently compiled, and looked upon them fairly, he ventured to put forward the opinion that they made not in favour of vaccination, but against it. He thought the House would observe that statistics on this question told against vaccination rather than in favour of it. Unless a person started on their consideration with a preconceived opinion he would be absolutely driven to that conviction. He had no hesitation in committing himself to the opinion that, in the midst of a small-pox epidemic, an unvaccinated person was at least just as safe as one who had been vaccinated. Figures compiled by a German medical man showed that, in the small-pox epidemic in Germany in 1872-3, among a large number of cases that came under the observation of himself and his staff, a much larger number of vaccinated cases proved fatal than of unvaccinated cases. It was apparent, too, the law was unequal as well as unreasonable. It was unequal not only as between the rich and the poor, but as between different unions in the same county. And how was the law observed? In Gloucester 79 per cent. of the population were defaulters under the Vaccination Laws, in Oldham 71 per cent., in Luton 64, in Northampton 63, in Halifax 60, in Eastbourne 54, and in Banbury 46 per cent. A great deal more than half the children in these towns were not vaccinated; and, though he could not say that these towns were entirely free from small-pox, yet he could say that they were more free than any other towns of similar size in the country. What was the case with regard to London, where 90 per cent. of the population were vaccinated? In the epidemic of 1871, of the number of patients admitted to hospital, 91 per cent. were vaccinated; and in 1881 96 per cent. There had been three epidemics of small-pox during the last 30 or 40 years. In that which prevailed from 1857 to 1859 there were 14,000 deaths; in that of 1863-64-65 there were 20,000 deaths. While the population had increased 7 per cent., the deaths from small-pox had increased by 50 per cent. In the epidemic of 1870-71-72 the number of deaths, again, increased by 12 per cent. He held in his hand statistics derived from Indian and German sources which established the proposition that vaccination afforded no real protection against small-pox. He merely rose to second the Motion and not to detain the House, but he could not help drawing attention to these important facts. The Reports to which he referred proved conclusively that there was no protection. He asked the Government to bear in mind the Report, for instance, of Dr. Keller—a Report which contained very interesting figures. The law as it stood upon this subject was founded upon a mere presumption. The fact that so many persons were vaccinated was a proof of the weakness of human nature and the proneuess of people to follow their leaders rather than an indication of a real belief in the efficacy of vaccination. But, even if they took the opposite view, and said the community had a right to protect itself, he had to say that there was no justification for forcing vaccination on those who did not believe in its efficacy and who resented its being practised upon them. He was perfectly well aware that numbers who were opposed to vaccination obeyed the law by having their children vaccinated. That, however, was a poor argument. He believed that before many years they would see that vaccination was not adequate to cope with the evil of small-pox, and he thought they would look back with amazement at the time when this system was resorted to by a people like theirs. He had pleasure in seconding the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Law compelling vaccination of infants and young persons is unjustifiable, and ought to be repealed,"—(Mr. Hopwood),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir B. WALTER FOSTER, Derby, Ilkeston): From 35 years' experience as a practising physician, I have long been aware that the most difficult person to convince is the amateur doctor, and I am afraid the observation applies to other professions. I am sorry that the hon. and learned Gentleman who introduced the Motion has imputed interested motives in this matter to Government officials and to the medical profession. It must be manifest that the medical profession has much more to gain by epidemics of small-pox than by the small fees from vaccination, and the Medical Officers of the Local Government Board could certainly earn more in practice than they received for their official work. I must warn the House against accepting some of the statistics brought forward by the Seconder of the Motion. The figures of one authority (Dr. Keller) were thoroughly exposed in 1887 by Herr Korosi, who found that Dr. Keller had falsified the Returns in favour of the anti-vaccination side. Figures were discovered to have been altered, such as 68 to 38; and a Medical Committee, which also investigated the figures of Dr. Keller for the International Medical Congress held at Washington in 1887, arrived at the conclusion that they had been "falsified in such a manner as to raise the mortality from small-pox amongst the vaccinated, while that of the unvaccinated was lessened."

*MR. HOPWOOD wished to know whether the hon. Gentleman was aware that Korosi had himself been shown up?

MR. A. O'CONNOR said, he was not aware of any alleged exposure of Dr. Keller.

*SIR W. FOSTER : I fear that when doctors disagree charges are sometimes hurled back from one to another. I regard the Motion as inopportune, inconvenient, and injudicious. The late Government appointed a Royal Commission, on which they placed the ablest men they could obtain, to investigate this question. That Commission has displayed, during the four years it has been sitting, the greatest patience. It has devoted two years to hearing the anti-vaccination side, and has now approached within measurable distance of the time when it may report. At such a time a Resolution which directly attacks one of the main References of the Commission is inopportune, as it is evidently premature to express an opinion before there is an opportunity of considering the Evidence and the Report of the Commissioners. It is inconvenient, because many Members are pledged to await the Report of the Royal Commission. It is also injudicious, because whatever the hon. and learned Gentleman gets from the Resolution will do him very little good in the face of the Report of the Commission. He has entered on an unprofitable task, and it is injudicious on his part to challenge the vote of the House at the present time. Another point is that the Government are acting in perfect good faith in the matter, for they recognise and promise to act on the Report of the Commission as regards repeated penalties. Well, Sir, I think my hon. Friend will be better advised if he waits for the final Report of the Royal Commission. I do not myself believe in unwise compulsion. There is no heresy so foolish that it cannot be made important by persecution. In the present case a few martyrs to repeated penalties are sufficient to keep going the agitation against vaccination.

I do not accept the hon. Member's conclusions in reference to the usefulness of this particular remedy. I regard it as useful in the prevention of disease, and I am bound on three or four grounds to defend the action of the Department I represent in reference to it. In the first place, I defend vaccination because I believe it is a great means of saving life. I would ask the attention of the House to a few figures in connection with this contention. We have means of obtaining a fair and approximate knowledge of the ravages of small-pox before vaccination was invented and practised. It is calculated that before the use of vaccine small-pox killed in London about 3,000 per 1,000,000 of living people. [Cries of "Oh!"] That is the estimate of statisticians who have no interest to serve by misrepresentation, and it is similar to estimates made in foreign countries.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) : Will the hon. Gentleman tell us on what he bases these figures?

*SIR W. FOSTER : They are based on the estimated population of London and on the bills of mortality. The hon. Gentleman can, of course, say this is only an estimate; but I will give other figures which cannot be questioned in the same manner. Well, 3,000 per 1,000,000 was the estimated death-rate from small-pox in London before the use of vaccination, and the rate had fallen between 1872 and 1890 to 178 per 1,000,000. That is an enormous decrease. In England generally, putting the estimate much lower than many statisticians put it, it is calculated that the deaths from small-pox were 2,000 per 1,000,000 before the days of vaccination, whilst between 1872 to 1890 they had fallen to 90 per 1,000,000. These comparisons are open to the objection that the death-rate before 1838, when the registration of deaths was taken up, may be wrong. I will, therefore, go to a country where there has been registration of deaths both before and after vaccination came into use—namely, Sweden. If Englishmen are liable to small-pox, Swedes may be supposed to be not less liable. Registration has been in force in Sweden since 1774. In the pre-vaccination days the Swedish death-rate from small-pox was 2,008 per 1,000,000 of living persons, whilst, since vaccination, the average during the last 70 years has been 173 per 1,000,000. In Copenhagen, where they have known the number of the population and the deaths from small-pox since 1750, the death-rate from small-pox was 3,567 per 1,000,000 before vaccination was used, whilst during the last 73 years it has been, on the average, 130 per 1,000,000. You may read these figures in another fashion. In London 1 person dies now for every 17 who died before the use of vaccination; in England 1 dies for every 22 who died formerly, in Sweden 1 for every 12, and in Copenhagen 1 for every 27. The figures I have, also refer to epidemics of small-pox at different periods. Epidemics have been defined by a very high medical authority as a condition of things in which 10 per cent. of all the deaths are due to a particular disease. Taking that as the definition, during 48 years of the 17th century there were 10 such epidemics; in the 18th century there were 32 such epidemics, whilst in the 19th century there has not been one. I think that is a complete answer to the allegations respecting the epidemic diffusion of small-pox in the present day. The decline in the death-rate has had a curious relation to the progress of vaccination. The more completely vaccination has been enforced, the greater has been the decline in the death-rate. According to the Registrar General's Returns during the years 1847-53, when vaccination was merely permissive, the total number of deaths in England from small-pox was 305 per 1,000,000 of living persons. During the next series of years, from 1854 to 1871, when vaccination was compulsory but not enforced by penalties, the death-rate fell to 223 per 1,000,000. Between 1871 and 1891, when the compulsory system was enforced by penalties, the death-rate fell to 89 per 1,000,000. Thus, as I have said, there is a progressive decline of small-pox as vaccination is more and more enforced. That decline has occurred in spite of conditions which are above all likely to make a disease like small-pox more and more fatal. Small-pox most probably spreads through the atmosphere, and is certainly communicated by persons being brought into close proximity with those who suffer from it. We have gathered together in this city at the present time as the world together in a the community between them the case in olden times. Therefore, if the same condition of things existed, we might expect an infinitely greater mortality from small-pox now than we had in pre-vaccination years. It may be said that sanitation has improved, and I admit that it has; but I say that sanitation has had nothing whatever, or comparatively little, to do with the matter. [Cries of "Oh!"] If hon. Gentlemen will be patient I will give them figures which, I think, will show that such is the case. Before, however, I pass away from the present point, I want to point out that the mortality has decreased amongst certain portions of the population more than amongst others. The Motion deals specially with infants and young persons. Amongst infants under five years old the decline is no less than 89 per cent., whilst amongst children between the ages of five and 10 it is no less than 72 per cent. The decrease of deaths, therefore, is greatest amongst those who have been most recently vaccinated, although, before the days of vaccination, according to calculations based on nearly 250,000 cases, 90 per cent. of the total number of deaths from small-pox were those of children under five years of age. There is another point I must deal with. In very recent times we have had an experience of a serious epidemic of small-pox in the town of Sheffield. I admit that that was a great epidemic in a vaccinated population. A great many figures have been brought out this evening showing the number of people who were vaccinated and yet suffered from small-pox. But, of course, if you have 95 or 98 per cent. of your people vaccinated, and there is an epidemic, the larger number of those who take the disease must be vaccinated persons. Well, I find that in Sheffield, if the vaccinated children under ten had died at the same rate as the unvaccinated, judging by the behaviour of unvaccinated under 10, there would have been, instead of nine deaths of vaccinated children, no fewer than 4,400 such deaths. In other words, the unvaccinated children under 10 in Sheffield had a death-rate 480 times greater than the vaccinated.

Had he not taken the Vaccination Census nearly a year afterwards, and after a considerable amount of vaccination had taken place?

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): Before the hon. Gentleman answers, may I ask him whether it is not a fact that no re-vaccinated person in Sheffield died during the epidemic?

*SIR W. FOSTER: I am not quite sure about the point put to me by the hon. Member for Sheffield, and I hope my hon. Friend (Mr. Hopwood) will excuse me if I do not answer his question, as I do not recollect whether any such admission was made. I have every confidence, however, that the gentleman referred to took every care in the preparation of his statistics. I know the statement is not absolutely true in the form in which my hon. Friend puts it.

*MR. HOPWOOD: I assure you it is.

*SIR W. FOSTER: It may be partly true. However, if my hon. Friend objects to these figures, there are others which are sufficiently conclusive. We may put Sheffield aside for a moment, and take England and Wales during the years between 1872 and 1891. If we examine the figures respecting the vaccinated and the unvaccinated while compulsory vaccination was in force, and compare them during a period when permissive vaccination was in force, we find that there has been an enormous saving of life. If between 1872 and 1891 people of all ages had died of small-pox at the same rate as they died of that disease between 1847 and 1853 (when there was no compulsory vaccination) there would have occurred annually 7,940 deaths from small-pox instead of 2,316. In other words, over 5,600 lives have been saved, on the average, every year. If between 1872 and 1891 children under five years of age had died of small-pox at the same rate as they died of the disease in 1847-53, when there was no compulsory vaccination, there would have occurred annually 5,400 small-pox deaths amongst these children, instead of 591. Thus every year the enormous number of over 4,800 young lives have been saved from this disease. I do not want to dwell longer than I can help on this particular portion of the case. I think the figures I have given show that there is a considerable saving of life by vaccination in connection with small-pox. Next, I say that small-pox is lessened in severity by the use of vaccination. Small-pox occurs in different forms. I will not use the scientific terms, but will simply speak of mild and severe attacks. In the Sheffield epidemic of 1887-8 I find that 17·2 per cent. of the cases were severe amongst the vaccinated persons, whilst amongst the unvaccinated persons the percentage of severe cases was 81: the chances of a bad attack amongst the unvaccinated as compared with the vaccinated being nearly 5 to 1. Amongst children under 10 years of age the percentage of severe cases was 9 in the vaccinated and 78 in the unvaccinated, the chances of a bad attack being thus 8 to 1 amongst the unvaccinated as compared with the vaccinated. In Leicester, which is a town in which the anti-vaccination movement flourishes, they recently had 146 cases of small-pox, and I congratulate Leicester on having escaped so lightly and on the rigour with which the authorities carried out their isolation hospital system. I have always watched their method with the greatest interest, because I should be glad of having two methods instead of one of stamping out small-pox. Eighty-nine adults were attacked, 82 of whom were vaccinated. Of the 82 cases, only 6, or 7 per cent. of the whole, were severe. Seven unvaccinated adults were attacked, and all the cases, or 100 per cent., were severe. Of the children attacked, 50 were unvaccinated, as against 7 who were vaccinated; 44, or 88 per cent., of the unvaccinated had severe attacks, while all the 7 vaccinated children had mild attacks, 5 of the cases being absolutely abortive, the patients only having a few pocks. A similar state of things is witnessed at the present time in Manchester. There have been over 500 cases altogether; 21 per cent. of those who are vaccinated have been severely attacked, and 68 per cent. of the unvaccinated; while 5½ per cent. of the vaccinated, and 19 per cent. of the unvaccinated, have died. There is another interesting way of showing the influence of vaccination in lessening the severity of attacks. Some years ago an inquiry was made respecting children in Board and other schools in London, and over 53,000 children were examined. The examination was made with the view of finding out how many of them were pitted with small-pox, pitting indicating a comparatively severe attack. It was found that 360 per 1,000 of the children who were unvaccinated were pitted; that seven per 1,000 of those with defective marks, showing bad vaccination, were pitted, and that two per 1,000 of those with good marks were pitted. These are very remarkable figures as showing how the fair skins and faces of these little ones are saved from disfigurement and mutilation by this beneficent method of treatment. I now pass to the question of the use of vaccination in protecting people from attacks of small-pox. The protective qualities of vaccination are, I think, undoubted. We do not for a moment deny that small-pox will attack a vaccinated person, or that a single vaccination is not protective during the whole of a life. I find that the percentage of children under five years of age who die from small-pox now, as compared with the times when vaccination was not enforced, has declined 89 per cent., whilst in the case of children under 10 years of age it has declined 72 per cent. I think these figures show that, at all events, the protection extends over 10 years. A special investigation was made at Sheffield on this point. A certain number of houses were taken in which small-pox occurred among some of the inhabitants, and it was found that between 18,000 and 19,000 persons lived in such houses. Of these persons 18,020 were vaccinated, and 736 unvaccinated. They were all living under the same sanitary conditions. Of the 18,020 vaccinated persons, 4,151, or 23 per cent., caught the disease, whilst of the 736 unvaccinated persons, 502, or 75 per cent., caught it. Thus the unvaccinated were attacked more than three times as frequently as the vaccinated. Taking the whole of Sheffield, which has 98 per cent. of its population vaccinated, I find that $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the vaccinated of all ages, and 9.7 per cent. of the unvaccinated, were attacked by the disease. There was a six-fold immunity from attack on the part of the vaccinated of all ages, and a 20-fold immunity amongst children under 10. I do not think you can have figures that are more conclusive.

MR. PICTON: They are disputed.

*SIR W. FOSTER: Well, a very good test on this point is afforded by the case of those who spend more or less of their time in small-pox hospitals—I mean the nurses and attendants. The figures I can give with regard to them are exceedingly interesting, and I do not think hon. Members will be inclined to dispute them as they dispute the last I have given. I find that of 734 nurses and attendants at the Metropolitan Asylums Board Hospitals, 79 had had small-pox. Of the remaining 655, 645 had been re-vaccinated, and of these not one contracted small-pox, whilst every one of the remaining 10 have been attacked by it. The 10 performed the same duties and were under exactly the same sanitary conditions as the 645. I think these figures are conclusive as regards the preventive properties of vaccination, and also as regards the sanitation argument. There are more striking figures still. At Newcastle-upon-Tyne 14 nurses were in attendance on cases of typhus fever; nine were attacked with typhus and two died. Sanitation did not seem to help them much. The nurses attending the small-pox hospital were all re-vaccinated, except one, who had recently had small-pox. Not one of them contracted small-pox, but one did contract typhus. Thus in two hospitals with two sets of nurses under the same sanitary conditions, the one set suffered badly from typhus, while the other escaped small-pox by aid of vaccination. At Leicester, at the present time, the same kind of thing is going on; 22 of the attendants were either re-vaccinated or protected by having had small-pox, and not one of them has been attacked; six refused to be re-vaccinated, and of these four have been attacked and one has died. I think, therefore, the figures show very closely and conclusively that vaccination, at all events, has a protective power. I could give other figures that are almost equally conclusive. In the case of a small-pox ship, where possibly contact is even closer than in a London hospital, 90 nurses and attendants were employed, and they all escaped except one housemaid, who had refused to be re-vaccinated. The Epidemiological Society have reported that, out of 1,500 hospital nurses and attendants, 43 caught small-pox, and not one of them had been re-vaccinated. There are other indications of the protective power of vaccination. Taking some figures given by Dr. Gayton, we find that the protection afforded varies with the effectiveness of the vaccination.

Sir W. Foster

Amongst children under five there were no deaths in cases where the vaccination marks were good, whilst the death per 100 were 56·5 where the children were not vaccinated. Amongst children of between five and 10 the deaths were 0·9 per 100 attacks where the marks were good, and 35 per 100 where there were no marks; whilst amongst children of between 10 and 15 the deaths were 1·1 per 100 where the marks were good, and 23 per 100 where there were no marks. I agree with every word my hon. Friend has said about the horror of the communication of foul diseases through vaccination. If that argument were to any extent based upon truth, I admit that it would be terrible and conclusive. If the communication of disease is at all common, a case is at once made out, not only for inquiry, but for an alteration of the law. My hon. Friend said a certain number of cases of that kind occurred. The figures on the point are more or less interesting and meet the apprehensions he has expressed. The disease that is specially dreaded as a consequence of vaccination is syphilis. What are the facts? I find that in Scotland, where children are not vaccinated till they are six months old, 65 per cent. of the deaths from syphilis take place before the age of vaccination, and in the second half of the first year of life they fall to 11·6, less than one-fifth of the pre-vaccination half year. In England, where children are vaccinated at the age of three months and upwards the same figures hold good. In both cases some 65 per cent. of the deaths occur before the age of vaccination. The increase shown in recent years in the prevalence of infantile syphilis is a matter, we think, of improved diagnosis. At Leicester infantile vaccination has been for a long time in abeyance; and if syphilis and vaccination were at all associated, we should expect to find in that town a lower syphilitic death-rate among children than in other towns; but, as a matter of fact, we find that in England and Wales generally the syphilitic death-rate has gone up in the last 20 years in England and Wales some 25 per cent., but has gone up still more in Leicester.

MR. PICTON: Is that on a comparison with the town population or with the whole population of the country?

SIR W. FOSTER: It is on a comparison with the population of the whole of England and Wales—not with the urban population. Mr. Hutchinson's experience in that respect is entirely confirmatory of that of the Local Government Board, and it remains true to this day that, although 750,000 children are annually vaccinated, no case of unquestionable communication of the disease has come under the observation of the Board. Another disease which is said to be communicated by vaccination is erysipelas. What do we find in reference to that disease? Why, that in the last eight years the infantile mortality from erysipelas of infants has gone down by 17 per cent.; but in Leicester, where there is no infantile vaccination, the disease has increased in infants 41 per cent. It is calculated, as regards deaths, that only 1 death from primary vaccination occurred in 14,159 operations. What is the alternative? If compulsory vaccination is done away with, 4 out of 5 children under 5 years of age in houses invaded by small-pox—according to the Sheffield statistics—will catch small-pox, and 2 out of the 5 of them will die. On account of a dread of the communication of disease, a dread which may be lessened by the introduction of improved methods, we ought not, in my opinion, to relax our faith in the use of this great preventive of small-pox. With reference to the interference with the liberty of the subject, I do not think it necessary to say much; but this I will say, that I believe that in the complexity of our social conditions we are bound to do more and more in that direction, when it is for the good of others. The only justification for interfering with the liberty of the subject is when it is for the good of others. Thus we vaccinate children to protect the population amongst whom we live. Personal experience is another test, and from my own personal experience of three severe epidemics of small-pox I can assure the House that it is the greatest possible relief, when in charge of a small-pox hospital, to see the vaccination marks well-defined. We know then that there is a hope of saving the life of the patient. Dr. Russell, of Glasgow, has written words corroborating this. Finally, let me say that the care of the public health is the highest duty of the State, and with the advance of civilisation and the increased complexity of our social conditions, the care of health is less and less within the control of the individual, and he must rely more and more upon State guidance and State aid. Holding these views, we must try to exercise them for the greatest good of the greatest number. To accede to the Motion would be hurtful to the public health, retrograde in policy, and injurious by multiplying enormously the baleful and fatal influences of a disease which is at once loathsome, disfiguring, and destructive.

*MR. HUDSON (Herts, Hitchin) said, he was in Canada in 1885, in the October and November of that year, when a very severe small-pox epidemic occurred, and where no fewer than 2,800 died from the disease. The death rate amongst the English part of the population amounted to only 13 per cent., and after the French took to being vaccinated the number of deaths among them greatly diminished. Had either the Mover or Seconder of the Resolution they were debating been in Montreal at that time, he believed that in the first week they would have rushed to a medical man to be re-vaccinated. In many cases a great deal of harm had been done with human lymph, and he thought the Government ought to adopt the American plan of keeping a farm, where medical men could always rely on obtaining fresh lymph from the cows. There was in The Times of that day a letter from the highest authority in England, the Royal College of Surgeons, in which they advocated the great benefits derived from vaccination. He was connected with the management of two hospitals, and he had often asked the staffs of those hospitals their opinion on the subject, and they always maintained that vaccination was of the greatest possible use. Statistics had been laid before them as to the number of vaccinated persons who had been attacked by small-pox, but his reply was that no one suggested that the effects of one vaccination lasted a lifetime. In his opinion, vaccination ought to take place every seven years. He should vote against the Motion.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) said, that while listening to his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board, he came to the conclusion that nothing was more misleading than statistics. He ventured to suggest that the figures quoted on each side were equally unreliable. It was often impossible to tell whether or not a man or a child had been vaccinated, yet every doubtful case was returned as unvaccinated. He should vote for the Motion, because he thought it was just as reasonable for the State to compel the baptism of a child as to compel its vaccination. He was prepared to say from experience that vaccination did modify small-pox; but if they wanted to be logical, at all events they should compel vaccination every seven years. Towards the end of the '60's Professor Cowan was examiner to a large Insurance Company, and one man who wanted to insure for £2,000 was told that he must be re-vaccinated. He submitted to the process, and eight months afterwards died from small-pox. In Leicester, as the law was not enforced, the town was badly vaccinated, yet there had been no small-pox epidemic there; although Sheffield was one of the best vaccinated towns, the people had almost been decimated by the disease. Let them draw their own conclusions from that. He could only say he believed that when the Report of the Royal Commission was issued the Motion of his hon. Friend would receive much more support.

Mr. Hopwood rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said, he should very much prefer re-vaccination. As a medical man he had given considerable attention to the question, and he was perfectly satisfied with the speech of the Secretary to the Local Government Board, who had put the case with clearness, fairness, and unanswerable truth.

INDIAN AND COLONIAL VOLUNTEER DECORATIONS.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW asked the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for War whether it was true that the Government of the Dominion of Canada had been notified that Volunteer officers would be granted decorations for 20 years' meritorious service ; and, if so, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to advise the extension of the decorations to Volunteer officers in India and the Colonies ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord SANDHURST) said, as to the first part of the question, it was not correct that a communication relating to the decorations for meritorious service given to Volunteer officers in this country had been sent to the Dominion Government of Canada. With regard to the second part of the question, the announcement would be interesting to their Lordships that proposals had been made for extending the decorations now worn by Volunteer officers in the United Kingdom to Volunteer officers in India and the Colonies. Those recommendations had been graciously approved by Her Majesty. Communications to that effect would without delay be forwarded to the several Colonial Governments, and the result would be that Indian and Colonial Volunteer officers would be placed on the same terms as Home Volunteer officers.

INDIAN HOME CHARGES.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK called attention to the home charges of the Government of India in relation to the condition of the finances of India ; and moved for copy of a letter from the Secretary of State to the Governor General of India in Council (Financial), No. 152, of 18th August, 1892. He said that, since the recent discussion of the matter in their Lordships' House, the Budget Estimate had been received from India for this year. He had then used the word "alarming" in reference to the condition of the Indian finances ; but he was now of opinion that it was not so alarming as the rumours in the Press had led him to suppose. For many years the Indian Government had borne out of Revenue charges what other Governments would have provided for by means of borrowing, such as those for special defence works, for which in England money had been borrowed, but which in India had been charged to current expenses. Generally speaking, he thought that with economy, and unless a further serious fall took place in the gold value of silver, there was no reason to suppose that the Indian finances would not recover their equilibrium. As the Indian Finance Minister had recently said, the financial position of India rested upon Military Expenditure, and the condition of the exchanges in reference to the Military Expenditure in India. He was glad to observe that the Under Secretary for India in the other House, in answer to questions, had on several occasions admitted the importance of economy in the Military Expenditure. The matter of the exchanges was still before a Committee, of which the Lord Chancellor was Chairman; and, therefore, he would not go into it further than to say that all who knew anything of India must feel the great hardship which the fall in the gold value of silver imposed upon those serving in India upon salaries; and that hardship might become a matter of serious prejudice to the Public Service. He hoped some means would be found to remedy that great hardship without imposing fresh taxation upon the people of India, which would, in present circumstances, be exceedingly difficult. The part of Indian finance he desired to call attention to mainly was the Military Expenditure at home charged to India. These home charges were not referred to the Lord Chancellor's Committee. He would not go into the smaller parts of the home charges upon the Indian Revenues, such as the salary of the Secretary of State for India, or the charges for the Consular Establishments in Persia and China, which was a subject of constant protest, but would confine himself to the Military Expenditure. The management of the debt, he believed, had been put upon a satisfactory footing, and no objection could be taken to the figures respecting the debt which formed a large part of the Financial Statement. The home military charges amounted to £4,000,000 at the present time, including stores; and the whole of this £4,000,000, found by the taxpayers of India, was spent in this country, so that India did not derive any incidental advantage from the expenditure. A very careful indentation of stores ought to take place in India, and advantage might result from such an inquiry. He would ask whether it had not been proposed over and over again that the War Office charges, including stores, paid by India should be referred to arbitration; and whether, while the Secretary for War was willing, the Treasury declined to accede to the suggestion? The items that were under the control of the War Office amounted to about £1,000,000; rather more than three-fourths of this was for effective charges; and a little over £300,000 was for non-effective charges. The effective charges included the cost of recruiting and training in England—the cost of the soldier before he embarked for service in India. Every farthing of the charges after he embarked for India until he re-embarked for England was paid by the Indian Government. The non-effective charges included the pensions and other allowances paid to officers and men who had served in India and were charged by the War Office upon the Indian Revenues. He had these military charges before him when he was in India, and on his return he was asked by the Treasury to serve on the Committee which had cognisance of the effective charges for British troops in India; he had served on that Committee, with some intervals, for 14 years—in fact, until last year; and, therefore, he had had the question before him for the last 20 years. Under the régime of the East India Company, the whole effective charge was paid by the Company, bills being sent in for the actual charges of the men sent out to India. In respect of non-effective charges nothing was paid at all. There were then about 20,000 Regular Forces serving in India, and no payment was made at all by India on account of non-effective charges until 1822. Then there was a bargain made between the Imperial Government and the East India Company, under which the latter agreed to pay £60,000 per annum for all non-effective charges in India then and in future. Some quid pro quo apparently was given; but the English Government thought the East India Company had behaved very handsomely in the matter. That arrangement lasted until the direct government of India was assumed by the Crown, when the whole of the English Forces in India became the Forces of the Crown; and that, of course, necessarily obliged a reconsideration of the arrangement in respect of these payments. What he had to represent to their Lordships was that since that time the charges gradually and greatly increased, and the increase had gone on notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances of successive Governments of India and successive Secretaries of State for India in Council; but up to the present time no equitable arrangement had been made in respect of those charges. He had no intention whatever to impute to the officers of Her Majesty's Treasury or others concerned, or even successive Cabinets here, any desire whatever to do injustice to India. He was satisfied, also, the Houses of Parliament were anxious only to do what was just and right as between England and India. He attributed the inequitable result, first, to the great complexity of the subject; and, secondly, to the great pressure of business of different kinds which had weighed upon the successive Governments of this country. Parliament had last year passed an Act by which the functions of the Legislative Council in India had been extended. The Budget must now be discussed there year by year. Questions had been already asked; and it was not to be expected that this subject, which had been so long before the public in India, and which was fully dealt with in Papers laid before Parliament and available to anybody, would not be discussed freely and fully in the Indian Legislative Council. To resume a short history of the question. In 1861 these charges were met by an arrangement under which £10 per effective man in India was paid to meet the whole effective charge of the Indian Army, and £3 10s. per man to meet the whole non-effective charge, the latter charge, it was distinctly understood, being only for one year. That was done under the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 89. When that arrangement was made, his late friend and old master, Sir Charles Wood, afterwards Lord Halifax, than whom no man was more thoroughly conversant with Indian finance, laid it down that that temporary arrangement was not to be regarded as an admission that India could justly be called upon to pay charges which ought really to be borne by the Imperial Exchequer; and so early as 1861 a protest was put forward against the arrangement on behalf of the Secretary of State in Council. The effect of that change was to raise the annual non-effective charge from £60,000 to £225,000 per annum; but no complaint could be made on that score, for it must be remembered that a large number of English troops were required there in consequence of the abolition of the old Indian Army. That arrangement ceased in 1870, when a most complicated and extraordinary plan was imposed upon India, under which, year by year, the actual pensions India was supposed to be called upon to pay in consequence of the abolition of purchase in the British Army were capitalised, and the capital value, year by year, was charged upon India by the British Exchequer. This arrangement lasted for 14 years, until 1884, and the effect had been an enormous increase in the charges on the Revenue of India, an increase which was not less than £4,000,000 in those years for pensions, and so on. The present Secretary of State for India at that time made a representation to the Treasury on the subject, pointing out that charges arising from measures adopted for purposes unconnected with India, such as the abolition of the purchase system, and the consequent grant of pensions to officers, ought not to be levied upon India. It was urged that it was exceedingly unjust that the Indian Revenue should be called upon to bear any charge in order to get rid of that peculiarly English abuse, and the granting of pensions to officers on compulsory retirement on attaining certain ages, and so on. A Return upon that subject was laid before Parliament in 1884. He could not, throughout all the Papers laid before Parliament, find any answer to the argument so put forward on behalf of India. The arrangement for capitalisation of the purchase pensions ceased in 1884, and he had no materials in his possession as to what had taken place since that time. With regard to effective charges, after the arrangement as to a payment of £10 per effective man in India came to an end in 1869, a system was adopted by which bills for what was considered the actual charges were presented by the War Office and paid by the India Office. Year after year this was done, and year after year the India Office had protested against the details of these charges. They paid certain sums to account, while protesting against the whole thing. Matters, however, went on from bad to worse, and in 1874 a Committee of the House of Commons was appointed at the instance of Mr. Fawcett, who took great interest in Indian finances, to consider 'the whole subject. The Committee came to the conclusion that charges were imposed upon India which ought to be borne by England, and in their Report strongly insisted on the great importance of strict fairness in all financial arrangements between India and this country; and they stated that they had received the impression that charges had, in some instances, been imposed upon India which ought to be borne by England, and they agreed in the opinion emphatically expressed by the Marquess of Salisbury that—

“The most effectual way of securing financial justice to India was for the House of Commons to be constantly watchful on her behalf.”

The noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) was not altogether incapable of the use of sarcasm, and he might not on that occasion have intended to express his real expectation that the House of Commons was at all likely to be very watchful on behalf of the Indian taxpayer and Indian finances; but if he really entertained that expectation it certainly had been entirely deceived, because from that time to this there had been no enthusiasm shown by the House of Commons in that direction for the relief of the Indian taxpayer. No notice whatever of the representations of the Committee was taken by the Government of the day, although it was admitted by the highest Military Authorities that India was charged too much. His Government in India did all they could to put this matter on a proper footing, and they wrote home pointing out that the highest authorities had frequently admitted that India had been called upon to pay an unnecessarily high rate in connection with the home charges. The Duke of Argyll was then Secretary of State, than whom no one was keener to get justice for India; but it was certain that nothing came of those representations, and no consideration was given to India in respect of those charges for which it was admitted too much had been taken in the past. After the House of Commons Committee of 1874, a small Committee was appointed in the next year with a distinguished Member of Parliament, Mr. Bouverie, as Chairman, and they made some recommendations as to the cost of the troops; but they ignored and put aside altogether the great questions raised between the two Governments, on the ground that it did not fall within their province to examine or decide upon them. They said that these were questions for the Cabinet to determine. When the Report of that Committee was sent to the Indian Government they sent back a despatch in which it was conclusively shown that, according to the recommendations of the Committee, India would have to pay, not only the whole cost of raising and maintaining the men required for Indian purposes, but a certain part of the cost of raising and training men in the Reserve as well. No notice was taken of the criticisms upon the Report by the Government of India. Year after year the same thing went on, the charges were sent by the War Office to the India Office; and at last the Financial Committee of the House of Commons, finding that there was no probability of settling the matter, and all the arrears which were accumulating, made a strong protest, the affair was brought before the Cabinet, and the upshot of the whole matter was that a settlement was made to the end of the year 1879. About that time Colonel Stanley (the present Lord Derby) was Financial Secretary to the Treasury, and he admitted that India had been charged more in former times than she ought to have been charged; but it was suggested that a Commission should be appointed to settle a fixed rate of contribution in the future. A Commission was sitting more or less continuously from 1879 to last year; and, as Chairman of that Commission, he wished to take this opportunity of expressing his obligations to its members, especially to Sir Thomas Secombe and Mr. Knox. For years they could get no accounts, and when at last those for 1885-6 and 1887 were obtained it was found that they could not arrive at a Capitation Rate unless they could get the opinion of the Indian Government upon the matter, as they were most concerned and knew most about it. And that was also the opinion of Viscount Cross. When Viscount Cross was Secretary of State for India he requested the opinion of the Government of India with respect to the charges, because it was obvious that without receiving the views of the Government of India with regard to the claims of the War Office the Commission would not be able to deal satisfactorily with the question. They could only go into calculations. But he was happy to say that simply upon the arithmetical calculations they came to the conclusion that a very large reduction should be made in the charges. The answer of the Indian Government to the request of the noble Viscount only arrived in 1890, and the noble Viscount sent it to the Treasury with the request that it should be laid before the Commission. At the expiration of a year he received a letter from the Treasury addressed to him officially as Chairman of the Commission enclosing the Despatch of the Government of India—a long and able document—with the request that he would lay it before the Commission. That request was accompanied by a letter from the Secretary to the Treasury, in which the Treasury expressed its concurrence in the objections raised by the War Office; and in these circumstances he, as Chairman of the Commission, felt that he could do nothing less than respectfully decline to lay documents before the Commission upon two of which the Commission were told their opinion would not be taken. So that he must inform their Lordships the result was that after 14 years' work the main contention of the Government of India would not even be considered. It was put altogether on one side, and was utterly and entirely ignored. All the difficulties remained now just as they existed 20 years ago, and he would ask the Secretary for India to explain what his views at present were on the subject. The Government of India contended that when the Indian Army was used for Imperial purposes, that fact should be considered by the Home Government when they came to fix the new rate of payment for the effective charges in India; and they also urged that consideration should be given to India for the inequitable way she had been treated in the past. It was said that England and India were in partnership, and in whatever was necessary for the general advantage of Imperial interests India fairly ought to bear a proportion of the charge. If India could be consulted he thought she might be fairly asked to bear those charges; but India had hardly ever been consulted when a large charge was thrown upon her by the Imperial Government. The fact that no Capitation Rate had been settled was not the fault of the Government of India, for they had been constantly pressing for it. Whose fault it was he would not like to say, or whether it was that mysterious Body called the Cabinet, who refused to entertain the matter. What was the cause of the bad fortune or mischance which had entangled this question so miserably for the last 20 years passed all comprehension. For his own part, he thought it quite useless to appoint more Committees to inquire into this matter. Two or three sensible men in the Cabinet, with the information they could obtain from experts, could, he believed, settle the matter in a very short time. The Indian Government had constantly represented that an inequitable use had been made of the Indian Army in Imperial expeditions. The whole of the ordinary expenses in the Abyssinian Expedition were paid by India, only the extraordinary expenses being paid by the Home Government, the argument used being that India would have to pay her troops in the ordinary way, and she ought not to seek to make a profit out of the affair. But how did the Home Government treat the Indian Government when troops were sent out during the Mutiny? Did they say, "We don't want to make any profit out of this?" Not a bit of it. Every single man sent out was paid for by India during the whole time, though only temporary use was made of them, including the cost of their drilling and training as recruits until they were sent out. If this principle was to be applied in sending out troops to India, surely it ought also to be adopted when Indian troops were sent on Imperial expeditions. Surely some consideration should be shown to India for the inequitable way in which she had been treated in the past in settling the charges for the future. He would not detain their Lordships upon other points. The Indian Army was of great value to England as a training school for both officers and men, and as a Reserve Force; besides being a fruitful source of pensions. There was hardly a family in this country but some member of it was deriving his income from the Revenues of India and spending it, of course, in this country. These were all considerations why equitable and liberal treatment should be given to India in this matter. In reference to the partnership argument, a partnership in Imperial interests existed, no doubt, between England and India. Upon that point no man had a better right to speak than the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who knew the whole thing; and what had he said upon this point? In a Despatch of 10th August, 1883, Lord Ripon said—

“It was a partnership in which the rich and powerful partner was able to prescribe the conditions under which the business was to be carried on, with very little reference to the wishes or the means of the poorer and weaker partner.”

His noble Friend also said quite truly, speaking as Governor General of India in Council—

“We doubt whether, as a matter of fact, the presence of the Secretary of State for India in the English Cabinet insures that regard for India in the execution of military reforms which India has a right to expect in the distribution of military charges between the two countries”— that was, if the distribution of the charges was to be regulated on the assumption that they were partners in a joint undertaking. But it was asked of those advocating the claims of India—“Why cannot you give us some sort of idea how you suggest this is to be settled?” He would, with great humility, endeavour to make a few proposals for the consideration of the noble Earl. In the first place, he suggested to his noble Friend, for the consideration of the Government, that the effective rate ought to be reduced from £7 10s. to £5 per head for 10 years. He did not think anything less than that would be fair, taking all the considerations he had mentioned into account. It was monstrous that India should have to pay the extra charge arising from the abolition of purchase in this country. As regarded the non-effective charges, he thought India should not have to pay that charge arising from the abolition of purchase in this country. With respect to the £4,000,000 increase in non-effective charges up to 1884, one-half of that sum should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer, and one of the easiest ways of doing that would be for the Imperial Government to take over £2,000,000 India Three per Cent. Stock. Finally, he suggested that part of the charge of the special defences of India should be borne by the Imperial Government in consideration of the payments made by India for the Expedition to Egypt, and that the cost should be paid out of the profits England derived from the shares we held in the Suez Canal. If those proposals were put fairly and candidly before the other House of Parliament, he thought there would be no objection offered to such an arrangement of the matter. He would entreat the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India not to drive the question off for another 20 years, with continual correspondence upon it between the Departments, but to let it be settled for the future.

Moved, “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of a letter from the Secretary of State to the Governor General of India in Council (Financial) No. 152 of 18th August, 1892.”—(The Earl of Northbrook.)

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of KIMBERLEY): My Lords, there is no Member of your Lordships' House who is more entitled to bring this subject forward than the noble Earl, not only because he has been Chairman for many years of a Commission which has laboriously and usefully dealt with the subject, but also because he was for a long time connected with the War Office, and has filled the high position of Viceroy of India. These home charges have been the subject of constant controversy between the India Office, the Treasury, and the War Office; and I can assure the noble Earl that I welcome any assistance given me in sustaining the very unequal combat in which the Office over which I preside is always engaged against those two great Departments. My noble Friend has referred to a letter written by my direction when I was Secretary of State for India in 1884. I entirely adhere to what I said in that letter, as I have no doubt my noble Friend adheres to the opinions he expressed in the despatches he wrote. My noble Friend has referred to the subject of the home charges. Before 1884-5 the effective Army charges were £421,000 a year; but after that period they necessarily increased considerably, because in 1885 10,000 European troops were added to the Indian Army at the time Lord Randolph Churchill was Secretary of State for India. I will not trouble your Lordships with the figures for the successive years, but in 1892-3 the effective charges amounted to £548,000. That increase is due almost entirely to the additional number of British troops now in India. The non-effective charges were formerly capitalised, with the result that a very heavy yearly home charge was thrown upon the Government of India. Now, however, the system of capitalisation has been abandoned, and the charge for pensions is made according to the actual amount due each year. This change in the system has resulted in a reduction; but the amount payable will by degrees, as the pensions fall in, probably rise again in the future. The total amount of the pension charges upon the Indian Revenue was estimated at 1892-3 at not less than £1,900,000. My noble Friend spoke—and I think with great justice—of the extreme hardships which India suffers in having to provide for charges which are in large measure due to changes effected in our military system independently of India. At the time of the abolition of purchase, I may remind your Lordships that heavy additional charges were thrown upon the Government of India. Although no such great alterations are now made, yet from time to time precisely the same thing occurs. There is generally a pressure in the other House for some change in our Army system, involving increased expense; the War Office yields to the pressure, and the Indian Government finds itself saddled with additional charges which it has had really no voice in imposing. Increased burdens of that kind, I think, may reasonably be considered to constitute a grievance; but I fear that the imposition of such burdens is not likely to cease. There will be no doubt that it is extremely difficult to determine precisely what share of these burdens ought to be borne by the respective Governments. The Indian Government is in the unfortunate position of having those matters settled for it by the Government at home, and the India Office finds that schemes involving a large increase of expenditure are frequently pressed on the Department in the House of Commons largely increasing the charges against which they had originally protested, and in which they had never concurred. This was disappointing, for economists are wont to look to that House for support. Where I think India suffers is that we have no supporters, as the Home Government or the Treasury has in the other House of Parliament, which will not throw large additional taxation on this country to meet increased expenditure. I am afraid the spirit of economy is not very strong in the House of Commons now. The noble Marquess said in past years that the only hope India had of more economy was in the other House of Parliament; but that hope has vanished. The reason why proposals that must throw fresh burdens on the Government of India are so frequently made in the House of Commons is that those who make them know that their own pockets will not suffer in the desire to make things agreeable and comfortable. The taxpayers of this country exercise no check upon such proposals, and the consequence is that charges are sometimes imposed upon the Government of India which that Government thinks unjust and unnecessary. Among the subjects which my noble Friend has referred to is the subject of military stores. Recently, as far as I know, there has been no protest against stores. A more satisfactory arrangement has been made in point of management, and the Government of India have been judiciously taking steps in the last few years to render India independent of this country in the matter of military stores. As far as possible, the Indian Government now supplies its own stores. With respect to the Capitation Grant, I may remind the House that formerly the grant was £10 per man serving in India. Then it was agreed that it should be reduced to £7 10s., £3 a head having to be paid as well for deferred pay, which is a new charge, and the matter rests upon that basis at the present time. The India Office has no particular desire that the question should be re-opened and discussed anew, for bitter experience has taught the Department that the re-opening of a question of this kind generally results in the imposition of additional charges; and though it may not appear very consolatory, I am advised by those who share my noble Friend's views, and who desire as much as he does that India should obtain a good bargain in this matter, that there is no reason for urgency on our part to have a fresh inquiry into the subject. My noble Friend said, with truth, that his Commission did not embrace the important general considerations of policy which have been urged on this subject, and it is natural that it should be so. Upon those questions of general policy which I have been invited to discuss, I do not think it at all safe to express very confident views. As to the share that India should bear of the expenses of expeditions out of that country, it appears to me that if India is really interested in an expedition, it is right that that country should contribute a fair amount towards the cost of it. It is impossible to decide upon such matters beforehand. They must be dealt with at the time. All I can say is that we think India should be fairly and generously dealt with, and not charged with the cost of these expeditions unless she has a distinct interest in them. With regard to Egypt, for instance, India has a very considerable interest. Then my noble Friend went on to raise before me visions of a most agreeable kind, which I am afraid will remain but dreams—visions of a large contribution to Indian Revenues from our portion of the Suez Canal Shares. I confess I should like to be the fortunate Secretary of State for India who receives that gift. If it should come I can assure my noble Friend we shall accept it without the slightest hesitation. As to the partnership argument, there is something even with regard to Egypt, which my noble Friend overlooked. Supposing we received a considerable sum on account of the Suez Canal Shares for which we had to pay our share in the first instance, we should have to bear our share of the expenses in Egypt, which are now being increased, and that would be a matter of very considerable difficulty to us. There are other matters which have been referred to. Take, for instance, the Colonels' allowances, as they are called. They form a considerable portion of the huge sum we pay for pensions. They used to cost the old East India Company about £150,000 a year; but now, in round numbers, they come to, I should say, £550,000. They are increasing, and will increase, very considerably; and the whole of this arises from an interpretation put upon an Act of Parliament, I think it is 21 & 22 Vict., by certain Commissions. The question is incapable of any complete solution; but it is one which I am quite certain successive Viceroy and Secretaries of State will continue to press upon the Home Government—that is, that we should not have to bear so large a share of the Army expenses. We must try to reduce them, but I am not very sanguine that we shall be able to do so. We shall not fail at the India Office to do our utmost to keep these charges within a reasonable amount. With regard to military charges, I hope the Government of India will never forget that they have the clear and undoubted right to look in case of a great emergency to this country. If we have to keep up an Army in India equal at all times for all emergencies, that would put an intolerable burden on India. While maintaining an Army sufficient for all present purposes and sudden emergencies, I maintain that India has a right to look to this country for Reserves in case of need. And, above all, India may, to a certain extent, feel that the changes in the Army system have brought some compensation in the matter of the large increase of her Reserves. It is no small matter, because in the case of an emergency we could send out large and powerful Reserves. That is not paid for by India. I can only repeat that we are most anxious to obtain for India justice in regard to all these charges, and that no efforts on our part will be spared in this direction. I cannot sit down without thanking my noble Friend for bringing a subject before the House which is well deserving the attention of Parliament.

VISCOUNT CROSS: My Lords, I think the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India deserves our thanks for his very clear declaration that in case of an emergency India may rely on getting all the aid she may want from this country if it should come to a question of sending out Reserves. I am very glad to hear that definite statement, and I am sure it will give general satisfaction throughout the whole of India. No one knows better than myself the difficulties which beset the Secretary of State when he comes to deal with the Treasury and the War Office. In all these battles the noble Earl may rely upon any assistance I can give, as far as it is any use to him. I hope the noble Earl will press on the Treasury and the War Office the necessity of enabling him to carry forward the plans he has sketched out this evening. I will not trouble your Lordships with many figures. The noble Earl has mentioned the £500,000 for the Colonels' allowances. Then comes the increase of Retired Pay, which was no less than £670,000 a year when I inquired into the matter. I have here a list of charges imposed, some of them against the wish of the Indian Government, and many of them without its knowledge, from 1864 to 1883, amounting altogether to no less than £884,000 a year. Undoubtedly, therefore, India has a grievance, which is increased by the fact that this sum has to be raised in rupees but paid in sterling. Some time ago I got the India Council to appoint a very carefully selected Committee to go into the whole of those charges. The Report is private, and I cannot, therefore, place it on the Table; but the Committee went through every charge, and I believe that most of their recommendations have been carried out, and that there is every disposition to do the Indian people justice in these matters. Last year an Act was passed very much enlarging the Indian Council, and the result of that Act will undoubtedly be that a great number of persons representing different phases of opinion will be placed upon it by the Governor General and by the Governors of Madras and Bombay. This matter of the home charges is one which the Indian people have at heart. I do not mean to say they are always right in their objections; but it is a matter upon which they have set their minds to do what they can to get them reduced. And I only wish now to give this caution—that I think now that these matters are entrusted to them in Council, we shall hear much more from India about these home charges than we have hitherto. The result will be to give a lever to the Secretary of State which I hope he will use against the Treasury and the War Office in carrying out his views. Of course, the question of contribution towards the Military Expenditure is a matter of policy which neither the Secretary of State in Council nor the Government of India can regulate; but I am certain that in the course of a few years the Indian people will force us to do them justice.

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, it was now more than 20 years since he had to do with these matters; but his experience at that time had left an indelible impression upon his mind, and he was glad that the subject had been brought under the consideration of their Lordships' House. He was also glad to hear the very fair, candid, and full statement of the noble Earl opposite. The truth was that the Indian Government had been between two fires in the two large responsible Departments in this country, which were both adverse to the interests of India in this matter of money. There was no backing in the House of Commons. On the contrary, almost every year during the time he was in Office there was something else.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: It is much worse now.

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL could only say it was very bad then. As to the main subject, the principle of division of the expenses between the Imperial and the Indian Governments, the old principle was that the East India Company paid for the actual cost of all troops employed in the defence of India. It paid for nothing more than the cost of the troops sent to India from the moment they left our shores. He happened to be in Office when the abolition of purchase was effected, and he came in for all the pressure brought to bear upon the India Office upon altogether a new principle. Mr. Cardwell, at the War Office, contended that not only should India pay the whole expense of the troops actually sent out, but a full proportion of all expenses of the British Army corresponding to the proportion of men actually serving in India. Now, that was a totally different principle. The noble Earl had stated that one-third of the British Army was actually serving in India.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Rather more than a third.

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that new principle was that India employing one-third of the British Army should pay one-third of the whole cost of the British Army, whether direct or indirect, both at home and abroad. That, he maintained, was not a fair principle on which to charge the Indian Revenues. His noble Friend said that India was bound to remember that she had a Reserve Force in the Army at home. That was one of the favourite arguments of Mr. Cardwell. But, turn it round, was not the Indian Army a Reserve for England?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I did not speak of the Army as a general Reserve so much as what is called the Reserve Force itself—about 60,000 or 70,000 men.

*THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the real cause of the pressure was the Home Budget. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was under an imperious necessity, perhaps now more than ever, to diminish the charges to be borne. The Indian Government knew that it had no friends—no backing; and that the tendency of the House of Commons was to allow charges to be made against it. This was not a very safe position of affairs. They must know that though self-government was not given yet to the people of India as to the Colonies, still their attention was being directed in a more and more intelligent manner to this subject. He did not deny that, on the whole, the balance of obligation was enormously on the side of India. The Governments of India had maintained millions of people in a condition of peace, prosperity, and growing wealth. Our government of India had been a splendid boon to that country, and no native Administration could have maintained those regions in the condition of peace and prosperity in which they had been maintained. On the other hand, the charges to India had been large. The monetary difficulties had enormously increased, and he thought it would be a most unfortunate thing if the people of India should come to suspect that, in the interests of the English Budget, undue charges had been thrown upon Indian finances.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he should confine his remarks to the India Office, and to figures of less magnitude than those which had been discussed; but if there was lavish expenditure and extravagance in the India Office, there would be room for more extravagance in the larger military administration. About three weeks ago Sir Griffith

Evans, in speaking on the Indian Budget, complained of the great number of Assistant Secretaries in the India Office. He (Lord Stanley of Alderley) had compared these figures with those of the Foreign Office in the Civil Service Blue Book; and he found that, deducting the Secretary of State and Under Secretaries, the cost of the Foreign Office was £37,949, whilst deducting the Secretary of State and Council and Under Secretaries the cost of the India Office was £46,150. The work done in the Foreign Office with the Commercial and Slave Trade Correspondence probably equalled or surpassed that of the India Office. There was another matter which was capable of arithmetical computation. The Foreign Office and India Office occupied opposite sides of a quadrangle, and the Foreign Office covered a larger space than the India Office; but Sir Griffith Evans had stated that "there were 28 housemaids, two being allowed to each Member of the Council," whilst 10 were enough for the Foreign Office. His noble Friend the Secretary of State had said that the Treasury and the House of Commons were responsible for the increased charges thrown upon India; but in respect of the India Office management the Secretary of State was free to exercise economy.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: If the noble Lord will allow me to enter into the great housemaids' question for a moment, I think the noble Viscount opposite is responsible for the present Establishment. I do not think I have appointed any housemaids. But, having seen the Report to which the noble Lord refers, I have made inquiry into the matter, and I am informed that it is impossible to keep the rooms clean with a less number of housemaids. As to the work of the two Departments, I can assure the noble Lord that no comparison can be made between them, for at the India Office we have a vast Stores Department, and the entire work requires a much larger number of clerks. The noble Viscount some time ago inquired into these home charges, and he came to the conclusion that they were reasonable, and could not be further reduced. I am, at all times, most anxious to promote economy; and if it is possible to reduce these charges at the India Office, my noble Friend may be perfectly certain I shall do so. I agree to the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

UGANDA.

QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE DUKE OF NORFOLK asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—(1) About what date the Report of Captain Macdonald on affairs in Uganda was likely to be received; (2) What was the scope of the inquiry that he has been directed to make; (3) Whether the Government would give facilities for the production of any Papers and Correspondence bearing upon the subject of the inquiry? He said that, considering the many Reports that had reached this country, it was to be regretted that no official Report had as yet been made as to affairs in Uganda. He trusted that the scope of Captain Macdonald's Report would be such as would enable their Lordships to enter into a discussion on the question; because anyone, in order to discuss the question satisfactorily, must have before him the instructions of the Company to their agents. It was alleged that considerable grievances were complained of by the Catholics in Uganda, and hostilities were the outcome of those grievances. It was also alleged that offenders, if they belonged to the Protestant party, were dealt with leniently by the agents of the Company, while members of the Catholic party had been actually deprived of their land by the Company. He urged that when documents were produced upon the subject extracts from letters and papers should not be made use of alone, but that the whole Paper from which any extract was taken ought to be produced. He was bound to say he wondered very much that the Company had not been eager to produce every scrap of evidence that would justify their rule, or tend to mitigate their responsibility for the catastrophe in which that rule culminated. In the Reports made to the Company by its agents that were published the statements were very meagre as to the events which led up to hostilities; but it was stated that arms were served out to the Protestant party, who, supported by a Maxim gun, were let loose upon the Catholics, that Mengs was reduced to ruins and all the Catholic houses fired. The Catholics took refuge on the islands, but the Maxim gun was directed upon them, and many women and children were killed; and those who escaped that fate were made captive, and there was reason to fear they had been returned to slavery. Finally, the Catholics had had forced upon them the Treaty which gave them only one-seventh of the country. Their Lordships ought to have the evidence of all witnesses, Protestants as well as Catholics, bearing upon a story on which no Englishman would care to dwell. The Report ought to be a comprehensive one; it ought to go into everything connected with the administration of the East Africa Company, and it ought to be supported by the production of every document which was calculated to throw light upon the case.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Earl of ROSEBERY): I think my noble Friend will agree with me that nothing could be more inconvenient than to anticipate the production of Captain Macdonald's Report by a premature discussion of the events upon which that Report will adjudicate. Therefore I will not follow the example of the noble Duke, but I will proceed briefly to answer his three questions. As to the date when the Report may be expected, I have no means of knowing any more than my noble Friend. The cause of the delay in the production of that Report is very simple. My Predecessor in Office sent Captain Macdonald instructions—I think on the last day of June—to report on the various occurrences which had taken place in Uganda. These instructions did not reach Captain Macdonald in the country, or they crossed him on his return to the Coast, and he arrived at the Coast without having received them. Later on Her Majesty's present Advisers thought it well to reiterate these instructions by telegram to Captain Macdonald, and ordered him to return to Uganda. He then returned, and from that time to this we have had no tidings from him except that he has arrived safely at Uganda. Under these circumstances, my noble Friend will agree with me it is useless, not merely to anticipate the Report by discussion, but to speculate as to the time when it will be received. As to the scope of the inquiry, my noble Friend will find the instructions in the published Despatch of Lord Salisbury, dated June 24 last year, the first page of Africa, No. 8, 1892. We have not thought it well either to add to or to deduct from these instructions, which seemed to us adequate, and I do not doubt my noble Friend will be as satisfied with them as we are. As regards the production of Papers, I can only say we have no more Papers to produce until we receive Captain Macdonald's Report. So far as I know, the noble Duke has had access to all Papers in my charge referring to this matter; and what more I can do at this moment, though he speaks in a tone of complaint, I am at a loss to see.

*THE DUKE OF NORFOLK said, he had not spoken in a tone of complaint, but rather in hopeful anticipation. Could not the Company be asked to produce papers in its possession?

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: We have no authority to make the Company produce any papers. I am not aware they have been accused of having withheld any. My impression is they have fully and freely produced all they have. If it be not so, we have no means of compelling them to do otherwise.

CLAIMS FOR QUIT-RENTS.

QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

*LORD MORRIS asked Her Majesty's Government whether their attention had been directed to claims made by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests for obsolete quit-rents, not demanded for over 60 years, notwithstanding the Nullum Tempus Act, which was obviously intended to meet such demands? He reminded their Lordships that the Nullum Tempus Act was in reference to lapse of time being pleaded in regard to Crown debts. As regarded Ireland, however, as long ago as 1808, an Act was passed providing that the King's Majesty should not sue for any rents by reason of any title which had not accrued for 60 years next before the time of recovery. That would cover all the claims now being made by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. But there was an exception in regard to what was called in charge to Her Majesty. This, it appeared, meant quit-rents credited to Her Majesty and entered in the rolls, but not received. In 1878, in consequence of that exception, an Act was passed (39 & 40 Vict. c. 47) providing as to rents for the space of 60 years before the filing of any action. The object was to put an end to the question of liability, where no money had been received for 60 years, though credited in the books as if received by Her Majesty. So matters had remained until within the last two years, when some ingenious Adviser of the Commissioners suggested that that Act, which was brought in for the purpose of clearing up any difficulty under the 8th George III. could also be evaded, and, accordingly, a claim had been made before the Land Commissioners for the moderate period of 170 years, no quit-rent having been paid on that estate for that time. Mr. Justice Bewlay said the intention of the 39 & 40 Vict. was to put an end to any dispute; but the words there—"held, enjoyed, or taken"—only applied to cases where somebody had received the quit rents. In that case the claim was for 171 years at £1 13s. 1½d.; but the Commissioners agreed to accept five years, and asked for no costs. It was thought not worth while, in those circumstances, to run the risk of an appeal, and having to pay 171 years' rent instead of five; and the Commissioners were now furbishing up quit-rent cases which had not been received for as long as 200 years, though it was both common-sense and good law that where no payments had been made for such long periods it should be presumed they had been bought up or in some way discharged. This, as might be imagined, would constitute a charge upon land in Ireland dealt with under the Land Purchase Act, and owners found they had to pay some old claim upon a survey made in the middle of the 17th century. Many persons were being called upon to pay these claims which, though for small amounts, were a subject of great annoyance, which was not removed by their being told they were treated with great generosity in being called upon to pay only five years of those obsolete demands for 170 and 200 years' quit-rents. If they were to be persevered in it would be necessary to pass another Act, saying that the former one expressed what, in his humble judgment, it really did express.

The Earl of Rosebery

LORD INCHQUIN thought that these claims were being put forward as a mere game of brag by the Government, because he did not believe the Commissioners of Woods and Forests were at all aware whether the claims made were good or bad. They ought to have put forward the names of the gentlemen concerned in the different estates at once, whereas they had acted in such a way that it was unlikely that any individual, except one with a long purse, would try the question by appeal. He knew of one claim for 150 years, but, fortunately, the owner possessed documents going back to the time of Strafford, when, in fact, a great many of the quit-rents in Ireland began; and he was, therefore, able to show the Commissioners of Woods and Forests conclusively that the claim could not be substantiated. Whatever information the Government had got was evidently of quite recent date, and his point was that they were not taking the right course in the matter in making it absolutely impossible for these cases to be tried except, as he had said, by people with very long purses. He had no doubt that whoever had the courage to resist these claims would be successful.

*LORD KENSINGTON said, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests had not, in making these claims, done anything beyond their absolute duty. These quit-rents and Crown revenues from Ireland were not placed under the management of the Woods and Forests until 1827, when they were transferred from the Commissioners of Excise in Ireland. At that time the arrears of quit-rents amounted to about £114,000, of which upwards of £83,000 was described as "insolvent." The Commissioners of Woods and Forests encountered the greatest difficulty in the identification of the lands on which claims were leviable, but much information as to titles and otherwise became available in consequence of proceedings before the Land Commissioners. Before taking any step the Commissioners of Woods and Forests obtained the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. It was an opinion—of SALISBURY : before the noble Lord out to him that if he quotes the opinion, he will have to lay it on the Table.

LORD KENSINGTON : The opinion of a Law Officer ?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : Yes. It would be contrary to all precedent to cite an opinion of the Law Officers in that way.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : With all respect, it is constantly stated that action taken was on the advice of the Law Officers. I quite agree that the terms of the opinion may not be quoted.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : Not only not the terms, but the purport of the opinion even cannot properly be given unless the opinion is laid on the Table.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I venture to question that, because I can recollect cases in which it was stated that Her Majesty's Government had been advised by the Law Officers of the Crown in a certain direction. It has always been held that an opinion of the Law Officers need not be produced.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : Quite so; but you do not state the purport of the opinion of the Law Officers.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : When it is stated that after taking the opinion of the Law Officers a Government or a Department has done so-and-so, it becomes obvious what the purport of the opinion has been.

*LORD KENSINGTON would be glad to know, without in any way stating the opinion of the Law Officers, if it would be in Order to mention the date on which it was given, and the names of the Law Officers.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : You may mention the date.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : It is sufficient to state the course that has been taken by the Government.

*LORD KENSINGTON said, without pressing the matter, he would then simply state that the question had been referred to the Law Officers on more than one occasion; and a case having at length come before the Land Court, and it appearing that the Nullum Tempus Act did not bar the claim, the Department felt bound to make it. The amount payable in most cases was small. The Commissioners had power to accept less than the full amount of arrears due, but they had no power to relinquish the Crown rents to themselves.

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that all over Ireland those claims were being made for very small sums in the hope that the people concerned would not be able to prove that they did not owe the money. The proceedings of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests had been rightly described by noble Lords as "a game of brag and grab," and even a worse description might be given to them. It was a very questionable step altogether on their part, and he could not understand how any Law Officer could have recommended it to be taken. In the case of a claim made on his own estate, not one shilling had been paid for over 100 years; and when he showed fight the claim was quickly dropped. The Woods and Forests acted in a very extraordinary manner. They made claims for small amounts, trusting that the proprietors would not think it worth while to fight them, and thus they would get them yearly for the future. The Woods and Forests also attempted to bribe the proprietors by saying, "You will only have to pay, if you submit, five years' arrears and no costs; whereas, if you refuse to pay that, you will have to pay the claims for the last 170 years or so and all the costs." That was a distinct bribe, and he was reluctant to believe that any Law Officer would have advised anything of the kind. It was an outrageous thing that over all Ireland, in the present ruinous state of agriculture, such unjustifiable claims should be made, and he hoped that the Commissioners would stop making them in future.

*LORD LECONFIELD had only a few words to say on this matter, in addition to the remarks which had been made by noble Lords on the policy adopted by the Woods and Forests Office. In the letter they wrote to him stating that his extract from Strafford's Survey clearly showed that their claim for a quit rent in default for 171 years could not be maintained, they added a quotation from a lecture delivered by a Mr. Harding in 1864 upon the Strafford Survey which was destroyed in a fire that occurred in 1711, to the effect that copies of that Survey might still be found in the possession of some of the larger landowners in Ireland. His extract showing that he was in possession of at least a portion of that Survey, led them to ask to be furnished with particulars with regard to that portion. This, he thought, was very like Mrs. Bond's invitation to her ducks; and that if he allowed them to go to his office, and they discovered that quit-rents had been paid, but were 200 years in default, he might have to pay a very large amount. Consequently, he declined the invitation on the advice of his solicitor.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, if the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, after taking the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, believe that a debt is due to them, it is no longer a matter of discretion, but it is their business to see that the debt is paid. I do not see how the Commissioners of Woods and Forests could, in defiance of what they were advised, release the persons in question. But I would say that, in my opinion, if this is the law, it ought not to continue to be the law, as it is totally opposed to the spirit of modern legislation, and it is, I think, monstrous, if these cases are not covered by the Nullum Tempus Act, that they should not be covered by it. I am, therefore, heartily at one with the object of the noble and learned Lord who has brought the matter before the House. I hope the decision to which he has referred may, if it is wrong, be reversed; and if held to be right, that it may be counteracted, if necessary, by legislation.

*LORD ASHBOURNE said, he felt sure there was not a single Member of their Lordships' House who had heard the temperate statements of Lord Morris and other noble Lords but would be shocked by the way in which this Board administered affairs by making these old demands in Ireland. Their Lordships ought, before the discussion closed, to have a clear understanding that the obvious intent of the enactments which culminated in the Nullum Tempus Act should be given effect to. Why should any man have to pay on claims which for a period of 200 years had fallen into disuse? He should be very much surprised if the opinion of any Law Officer could be produced to show advice that rights, even if given under a technical aspect of the law, should be asserted without qualification in all cases, and it appeared it was only of late years that the claims had been made, from information derived during the sales under the Land Purchase Acts. He did not think that it was quite fair to act on information obtained in that way when landlords, in working out sales to their tenants, had to disclose their titles. The only information that ought to be supplied was what was necessary for the purposes of the sale. No matter what decisions might have been given in the Land Commission Court, it was a harsh proceeding to pursue these old and obsolete claims, and he hoped that after the very strong expression of opinion embodied in the word "monstrous" uttered from the Woolsack—rare condemnation to come from a noble and learned Lord in that exalted position—no more would be heard of them.

LORD HALSBURY said, that he must protest against the principle that every Crown right, however old and obsolete, however unjust and tyrannical it might be to exact it, it was the duty of a Government to enforce. Speaking from his own knowledge as a Law Officer, many claims might arise which it would be extremely undesirable to enforce. An opinion of the Law Officers on an abstract question of the law might be a totally different thing from the point whether it was desirable or proper to deal with the matter in particular circumstances. The opinion of the Law Officers upon the matter of law was, therefore, no justification to the Department for enforcing obsolete and extravagant claims. The question here was directed rather to the administration of the law than to what the law actually was, and therefore whatever opinion was given afforded, he considered, no ground for the course pursued.

*LORD MORRIS expressed his satisfaction with the opinion given by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and said he proposed after Whitsuntide to bring in a short Bill of two or three lines which would, with their Lordships' consent, put an end to all questions on the subject.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : Having regard to the announcement of the noble Lord, and the course which the discussion has taken, I certainly do not think the Department would be in the least to blame, or be regarded as neglecting their duty, if they were to shut their eyes for a time to the existence of these claims to arrears.

BURGH POLICE (SCOTLAND) ACT (1892)
AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 95.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1.

Verbal Amendments made.

Clause 2 agreed to.

*LORD PLAYFAIR moved, in page 3, after Clause 2, to insert the following New Clause :—

3. Notwithstanding anything contained in the said Act, its provisions shall not apply to any burgh or regality or burgh of barony which is not a police burgh as therein defined, unless and until the sheriff, upon the requisition of any seven or more householders, shall have convened a meeting of householders for the purpose of considering whether the said provisions shall be adopted, and such burgh of regality or burgh of barony declared to be a burgh in the sense of the said Act, and the sheriff shall have found and declared, after a meeting, and, if necessary, a poll, of householders, as is herein-before provided in the case of a populous place, that the said Act has been adopted, and that such burgh of regality or burgh of barony is a burgh in the sense of the said Act."

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN asked whether the noble Lord in charge of the Bill had taken into consideration the position of burghs of barony and burghs of regality as regarded the smaller populous places? He thought the same conditions should be extended to those small burghs as to the others. He had received a petition from some of them expressing regret that they were not included in the Government Bill, and it was accompanied by a statement sent up from the Scotch Office. It was quite possible, under the Bill as it stood, that seven householders in a burgh might ask to have their boundary settled, though the entire remainder of the population of the place might be against it, and the Sheriff would have no option whatever, but would be compelled to carry out the wish of the seven persons in that small burgh of barony. Perhaps the noble Lord would re-consider the clause so as to give all the householders in those cases an opportunity of stating whether they wished to remain as they were or desired to have their boundaries fixed by the Sheriff and become a police burgh. He thought it was only fair that opportunity should be given.

*LORD PLAYFAIR said, the difference between the two classes of places was that in populous places the Bill enabled the opinions of the inhabitants to be taken before they became burghs. The original Act which this Bill was to amend came into operation on that very day, and the whole of these burghs of barony, and of regality, would then become police burghs under the Act. He was informed from the Scotch Office that the Petitions to put these burghs into the position of populous places under the Bill had come from the County Councils, and not from the burghs. As the Bill would not go further until after Whitsuntide, the noble Marquess and others would have time to obtain an expression of opinion from the smaller burghs, but to give a retrospective action to the measure would be very difficult.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked whether the Amendment might be again brought forward after the Recess?

LORD PLAYFAIR said, he would consult upon that point. At all events, an opportunity would now be afforded of considering the matter.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 98.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 15th May 1893.

QUESTIONS.

INCOME FROM LAND.

MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if his attention has been called to Table 14 of the Statistical Abstract for the United Kingdom for 1892, compiled by the Commercial Department of the Board of Trade, in which, while the income from land subject to Income Tax is stated to have decreased in England and Wales to the amount of £10,432,645, and in Scotland to the amount of £1,314,854, between the years 1877 and 1891 inclusive, the income from land subject to Income Tax in Ireland has increased by £3,687 during the same period; and whether he can state the class of land to which this increase is due, and say in which portion of Ireland it is situated?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The Tables to which the hon. Member's question refers show the gross assessments to Income Tax. But, whereas these assessments in Great Britain are based upon rack-rental, in Ireland they are based on Griffith's valuation, which was, on the average, 20 or 25 per cent. below rack-rental. Until the actual rental falls below the valuation the assessment is not changed. Hence, although there may be, and, as a matter of fact, has been, a great fall in the value of land in Ireland since 1877, the Income Tax assessment in most cases shows no change. The small increase to which the hon. Member refers is believed to be due to an increase of value from the erection of farm buildings, which, for Income Tax purposes, are valued with the land. I have no figures enabling me to fix the situation of such increase.

INLAND REVENUE CLERKS.

SIR FREDERICK DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the 50 Second Division Clerks of the Inland Revenue Department who have been promoted to the Higher Division and to superior posts, how many were promoted to Higher Division clerkships in the Secretary's Office, in the Accountant and Controller General's Office, in the Controller of Stamps and Stores Office, and in the Legacy Duty Office; of this number how many were required to pass a special examination before being promoted; and of the 50 promotions mentioned, how many were appointments to Assistant Surveyorships of Taxes in the Outdoor Service, subject to a special examination?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The figures are as follows:—Secretary's Office, none;

Accountant and Controller General's Office, none; Controller of Stamps and Stores Office, 6; Legacy Duty Office, 13. Of the last 13, 8 were called upon, after selection for promotion, to pass a qualifying examination in law. 31 of the 50 cases were appointments to Assistant Surveyorships of Taxes, made after success in a competition conducted by the Inland Revenue Authorities in "the Law and Practice relating to Taxes."

THE WEST COAST OF SCOTLAND FISHERIES.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Department will provide, instead of the old sailing ship Vigilant, a steam cruiser for the North-West Coast of Scotland to protect the fishermen from trawlers?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee): The Vigilant is not an Admiralty vessel, and it is not proposed, therefore, to replace her with a steamer provided by the Admiralty.

THE CASE OF MICHAEL O'KEEFE.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if the case of Michael O'Keefe, formerly of A Troop, Madras Horse Artillery (now in the refuge for aged poor established at Montenotte, Cork, by the Little Sisters of the Poor), has been brought under the notice of the War Office; is he aware that this man fought through the Indian Mutiny, took part in several engagements, and received a medal and clasp for distinguished services in the field; and whether, in view of these services and his advanced age, he will entertain his claim to a moderate pension?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): Michael O'Keefe's service was entirely under the Honourable East India Company. I regret that he did not serve long enough to be qualified for a special pension.

MR. FLYNN: Is there any special machinery for inquiry into these cases?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir; the Chelsea Commissioners are most trustworthy, and discharge the duty most efficiently.

THE ACCOMMODATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he has observed that large numbers of hon. Members are daily unable to find seats from which they can take part in the proceedings of the House, and that when a Division is called there is a crowd of several hundred Members so jammed together at the Bar as to be unable to hear or understand what is taking place; and if, under such circumstances, the Government still persists in refusing to appoint a Committee to consider the enlargement of the present Chamber? Is it not also a fact that at 3 o'clock this afternoon there was not a vacant seat on these Conservative Benches?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I think the hon. Member has rather overstated his case. On Monday last, the first day of the Committee of the Home Rule Bill, the House was certainly most inconveniently crowded during its whole Sitting, more so than on any other day since Easter; since then, however, during the remainder of the week, although very large numbers of Members have been in the precincts of the House, and have taken part in the Divisions, I have not observed that the House has been filled except during the few minutes preceding Divisions, and there has seldom been a time when 30 or 40 more Members might not have found seats in the body of the House. I am rather confirmed by this in my view that it would be wise to wait for further experience as to the normal requirements of the present Parliament before appointing a Committee.

RETIREMENT IN THE DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

CAPTAIN BAGOT (Westmoreland, Kendal): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, on the Comptroller and Auditor General calling attention to the payment of salaries to officers of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Services when those officers were beyond the limit of age at which they should have been retired under the Order in Council of 15th August, 1890, he was informed that the provisions of the Order in Council do not, in Lord Rosebery's opinion, apply to members of the Diplomatic and Consular Services; and whether he can state the reasons which have induced the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to come to a conclusion on this point in contradiction with that of the Comptroller and Auditor General?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The Diplomatic Service has always been regarded as distinct from the Civil Service, and in many points the Consular Service must be also regarded as distinct. The Royal Commission on Civil Establishments made a separate Report on the Diplomatic and Consular Services, and their recommendations require separate consideration. No question, therefore, arose of applying the Order in Council to those Services.

COVENTRY CHARITY TRUSTEES.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry): I beg to ask the Parliamentary Charity Commissioner whether the Charity Commissioners will refuse their sanction to the ten vacancies in the body of Trustees of the general charities of Coventry being filled up on the nomination of the existing Trustees; and whether the Charity Commissioners will give effect to Sir John Swinburne's Resolution, agreed to by the House of Commons on the 18th May, 1886, by proposing a scheme placing the election of the new Trustees in the hands of the Town Council of Coventry?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire): The proceedings upon the application for the appointment of Trustees received in the month of June, 1892, have been suspended until the Commissioners shall receive from the Trustees such a further application as will enable the Commissioners to establish a scheme providing that a certain number of future Trustees shall be appointed otherwise than by co-optation.

H.M.S. "DAPHNE."

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can afford the House any information regarding the boiler explosion which occurred on board H.M.S. Daphne, twin screw, when on her way in March last from Esquimalt to Hong Kong, to join the China Squadron; whether there are no appliances in Hong Kong Dockyard sufficient to effect even temporary repairs, and that the vessel must wait until a new furnace is sent out from England; and what measures the Admiralty intend adopting for the purpose of providing appliances necessary for the repair of Her Majesty's ships in hull and machinery engaged cruising in Chinese waters?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: A furnace crown of one of the Daphne's boilers is reported to have come down on the bars. The appliances in Hong Kong Dockyard are sufficient to effect the repair. Very extensive repairs are carried out at Hong Kong Dockyard to both hulls and machinery of Her Majesty's ships on the China Station with the present plant, to which additions will be made as required.

MR. GOURLEY: How long will the repairs occupy?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: That I cannot say.

DESERTIONS FROM THE ROYAL NAVY.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether about 70 men have deserted from H.M.S. Blake, and other vessels forming the British Squadron attending the International Naval Review at New York; if so, have the Admiralty received any official information as to the cause of the desertion; if not, is it the intention of the First Lord to institute an inquiry; and whether any Consular Convention exists, applicable to seamen of the two Navies, between this country and the States, or whether similar regulations exist between the two countries with regard to desertions, as in the days of slavery?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: No official Report has been received relative to alleged desertions from H.M.S. Blake and other vessels of the British Squadron. The Treaty between Great Britain and the United States of 3rd June, 1892, respecting desertions from the Mercantile Marine does not include the surrender of deserters from ships of war. No other arrangement bearing upon the subject exists between the two countries.

THE HANSARD UNION PROSECUTION.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what fees in addition to salary are payable to the Solicitor General, under the new system recently introduced, in connection with the prosecution of Bottomley and others at the last Old Bailey Sessions?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am not yet in a position to state the amount of the fees; but the Solicitor General will be paid professional fees under Clause 5 of the Treasury Minute of December 5th, 1892. Neither under the old nor the new system did the salary of the Law Officers cover contentious work.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS: When will the right hon. Gentleman be able to state the amount of the fees? I am well aware the salary does not cover such cases as this.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I cannot say how soon.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS: I will put the question down for Thursday.

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I do not think it will be possible to give a reply before Whitsuntide.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): Are not the fees marked on the brief? Will a statement be made at any time during the Session, or will there appear in the accounts for the year anything showing the exact amount received by the Law Officers under the new arrangement?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I must ask the noble Lord to put the question on the Paper.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS: Arising out of that answer, I should like to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Civil Service Estimates are to be taken on Thursday. Will he undertake the Vote relating to this matter shall be postponed until we get the information we are asking for?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I will endeavour to get the information in time.

ATTACK ON THE EDITOR OF THE "SIAM FREE PRESS."

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is aware that on the 28th March last, as Mr. Lillie, editor of The Siam Free Press, a British subject, was on his way to meet by appointment the chief of the Bangkok Police, his carriage was stopped at the city gates by a number of natives who were lying in wait for him; that six of these natives attacked him with bamboos in the presence of the police, who did not interfere; that Mr. Lillie was knocked down insensible, and carried, bleeding from wounds, to the British Legation; and whether the British Resident at Bangkok has reported on the subject?

SIR E. GREY: No Report on the subject has been received from Her Majesty's Minister at Bangkok since an answer was given to the hon. Member's previous question on the 17th ultimo. As then stated, Mr. Lillie's proper course, if a British subject, is to make his complaint to the Siamese Authorities through the British Consul.

MR. W. REDMOND: Will the hon. Baronet communicate with the British Minister, and find out if the report is true?

SIR E. GREY: I have no objection to asking for a Report, although it is not usual.

SPIRIT DEALERS' LICENCES.

VISCOUNT CURZON (Bucks, Wycombe): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the licences coming within the provisions of the Liquor Traffic (Local Control) Bill include the spirit dealers' additional retail licence to sell spirits by retail for consumption off the premises in any quantity not less than one reputed quart bottle, and in premises occupied and used exclusively for the sale therein of intoxicating liquor; and, if not, whether it is the intention of the Government to bring these licences within the scope of the Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): Not being Justices' licences, they are not included in the Bill. It is not intended to interfere with these licences.

SOLICITORS AND BOARDS OF GUARDIANS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, having regard to the provisions of Section 14 of "The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1842," a solicitor acting professionally, personally, or through his firm, for a Rural Sanitary Authority, and receiving payment for such professional work out of the poor rates of the Union, and notwithstanding that such payment is not illegal, is capable of serving as a Guardian in such Unions; and, if not, whether, upon the facts and names being placed before the Local Government Board, they would make any representation or suggestion to the Board of Guardians, with a view of any such solicitor ceasing to serve as a Guardian?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1842, to which my hon. Friend refers, provides that, if any question should arise as to the right of any person to act as an elective Guardian, the Local Government Board may, if they think fit, inquire into the circumstances of the case, and issue such order therein as they may deem requisite for determining the question. Looking to the appellate jurisdiction of the Board in the matter, I should not feel justified in expressing any opinion, directly or indirectly, as to the right of a Guardian to act in a particular case, except on an appeal, and after the previous inquiry into the circumstances which the Statute contemplates.

THE TRALEE AND DINGLE RAILWAY.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that five houses have recently been set on fire by sparks from engines of the Tralee and Dingle Railway, and two of them burned to the ground; whether any recommendations have heretofore been made by the Board of Trade to the Tralee and Dingle Railway, with a view to preventing such occurrences; and, if so, with what effect; if he can state the number of houses set on fire, and the number of horses and cattle killed and injured by the Tralee and Dingle Railway during the past 12 months; and whether any steps will be taken by the Board of Trade to prevent the continuance of the injuries done by this railway to the inhabitants of the district through which it runs, and for which injuries they and not the railway have to pay?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I have been in communication with the Company with reference to the hon. Member's question, and I am informed that only one house has been completely burned, another slightly damaged, and a forge belonging to the Company partially destroyed. I am also informed that ten head of cattle were killed and four injured by the Company's trains within the last 12 months; but in all these cases they were trespassing on the public road by night. All the engines are fitted with the most approved appliances to prevent the emission of sparks.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg also to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that lately a train on the Tralee and Dingle line left Tralee at 2 p.m. for Castlegregory, and had to pull up twice between Camp and Castlegregory to raise steam, the delay on each occasion being for about half-an-hour; that when near Castlegregory, at a place called Kelly's Height, it was found that the engine was unable to pull the carriages up the hill, and that two of them were detached while the engine ran on with one for Castlegregory; that, before going far, the engine, going round a sharp curve, ran off the rails; that the travellers by the train had to walk into Castlegregory, where they were detained until 11 p.m., then another engine was sent from Dingle to take them back to Tralee, which place they reached after midnight; and whether, in view of the circumstance that this railway was passed by the Board of Trade Inspector as properly constructed and properly equipped, against the protest of the representative of the ratepayers of the district, the Board of Trade will take steps to have the condition of the line and the capacity of the engines investigated?

MR. MUNDELLA: The facts are as stated. A light engine was run with the train in question in place of the heavy engine, which was undergoing repairs. The engine left the rails (partially) on a straight between two curves; but the Company can assign no reason for the accident except expansion of the rails caused by the very warm weather. An inquiry will be held into the cause of the accident; but it must be remembered that the circumstances of these light railways differ from those of an ordinary railway. I am not aware of any protest against the opening of the railway in 1891.

TOTTENHAM FEVER HOSPITAL.

MR. HOWARD (Middlesex, Tottenham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, having regard to the unanimous opposition at the recent local inquiry by the authorities in the Tottenham Division to the proposal of the Metropolitan Asylums Board that the temporary fever hospital there should be made a permanent institution, he will suggest to that Board that they should complete the inquiry by themselves taking fresh evidence and making further investigation as to alternative sites within the Metropolitan area?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The inquiry with reference to the hospital at Tottenham was held by two of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board on Tuesday last, and their Report has been received to-day. I understand that the Metropolitan Asylums Board were satisfied with respect to the proposed site before they submitted it for the approval of the Local Government Board.

ALLEGED DISTURBANCE BY FOREIGNERS IN HYDE PARK.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a disturbance occasioned in Hyde Park on Sunday the 7th instant by the interference of foreigners, apparently Russians, with the proceedings of the Society of Friends of Russian Freedom; whether he has been made acquainted with the statement of a lady, an English member of that Society, to the effect that the police, instead of affording protection to her and her friends, treated her with rudeness and even violence; whether he has been informed that a young person, the domestic servant of the lady in question, was so seriously injured, owing to a refusal of police protection, that she had to be removed in an ambulance; whether he has any reason to believe that the disturbers were emissaries of the Russian police or in any way under their direction; and whether he will take means to secure to British subjects and foreign exiles effective protection against molestation of this sort?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I am informed that there was no disturbance on the occasion referred to by my hon. Friend. From the Report which I have received from the Commissioner of Police, it appears that the police constable on duty opposite the Marble Arch saw a number of printed bills tied to the park railings and two men and a lady selling papers to a large crowd. The sergeant informed them that they were infringing the rules of the park and requested them to move, and offered them police protection; but, on being informed by the lady that they had been in the same place by permission in former years, he did not interfere further until the arrival of the Inspector, when he drew his attention to the matter. The lady informed the Inspector that they had permission to be there, and declined to move the books and papers. On being asked from whom they had received permission, she stated that an Inspector had allowed them to stand there last year. The lady became excited, and, on finding a crowd was being attracted, the Inspector turned to the man and said that if the posters were removed he would take no further action; and, on this being done, he moved the crowd back, and, leaving a police constable and two sergeants to see that they were not molested, left them. The Inspector states that they were not attacked by the crowd in any way, and he noticed no foreigners around or near them, that there was no young girl present, and no ambulance was brought into requisition. There is no foundation whatever for the statement that the police were influenced or actuated in any way in their action by private persons.

MR. PICTON: Is it not a fact that papers have been allowed to be sold on previous May Days? Did not the Inspector push the lady back somewhat violently?

MR. ASQUITH: I have given the facts as supplied to me. With regard to the sale of papers on previous occasions I will inquire.

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley): Has the right hon. Gentleman seen the lady's statement? Is it not in direct conflict with that of the police? Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries as to the bona fides of this lady?

MR. ASQUITH: I have seen the statement, and submitted it to the police for their report. I do not see any reason for doubting the accuracy of the police statement.

BURIAL FEES IN WALES.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the recently appointed Rector of Llanarmon-Dyffryn-Ceiriog, Denbighshire, has declined to accept a fee of less than 10s. for conducting the Burial Service under the new Act, and has refused to agree to the customary "offering" being handed to him, varying in amount according to the means of the relatives of the deceased; whether his attention has been drawn to the proceedings of a Vestry meeting summoned in this parish on the 6th of April last, at which only five persons, exclusive of the Rector, were present, and where a resolution was passed exacting for the future the payment of a fee of 10s. and £1 for the right of placing tombstones on the graves in the churchyard, according to the size of the stones; whether such fees have, within the memory of the oldest residents, ever been demanded before; and whether such a resolution is legal and can be enforced; if not, whether he will take steps to prevent any further interference by the Rector with the rights and ancient and unbroken customs of the parishioners in regard to the churchyard referred to?

MR. ASQUITH: I conclude that the hon. Member, in referring to the "new Act," means the Burial Laws Amendment Act, 1880. That Act did not interfere with the fees for burials; and any person previously entitled by law to receive a fee is entitled, in case of a burial under the Act, to receive the like fee. But the Rector informs me that he has not declined to accept a fee of less than 10s., or a customary offering, inasmuch as, on two occasions, no payment or offering of any kind was tendered or made to him, and on the only two other cases under the Act the usual offering was made and accepted. The Rector also informs me that at a Vestry duly convened and held on the date mentioned in the question, a resolution was come to, declaring that the Rector was entitled to a fee of £1 for every inclosed grave, with a flat stone or kerb-stone, and 10s. for every head stone, and that the size of the stones was not under discussion. The Rector further informs me that fees had, previously to such resolution, been demanded and received, but that no definite scale had been fixed. I have no jurisdiction in the matter of fees collected by incumbents for burials or gravestones; but of course, if more than what is legal is demanded, payment cannot be enforced.

IRISH BANKRUPTCY LAW.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Official Assignees of the Court of Bankruptcy, Ireland, have complied with Section 68 of "The Irish Bankrupt and Insolvent Act, 1857," which provides that on or before the 1st March in every year there shall be laid before Parliament a Return by the Official Assignees in the form contained in Schedule B; whether it is the duty of the Judges or the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy to ascertain that the said Returns are duly lodged within the time named in said section; whether the Chief Registrar before certifying the said Returns, as required by the said section, takes any, and what, steps to satisfy himself of the accuracy of the same; and why the Returns for the year 1892 were not lodged by the Official Assignee for nearly two months after the prescribed time?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): With reference to the 1st and 4th paragraphs of the question, I am informed that the Return referred to has not been presented for many years back at the date mentioned. It has, however, always been presented early in the Session, and no objection has apparently ever been raised as to the requirement of the section of the Act quoted not having been strictly complied with. The Return required by the section is very long and complicated, and the time limited rather short. There appears to be no statutory enactment dealing with the point raised in the 2nd paragraph of the question; but it may be assumed that the duty devolves upon the Chief Registrar. Regarding the 3rd paragraph, there do not seem to be any grounds for supposing that the Chief Registrar has neglected his duty in this respect.

THE SUMMER NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether it is intended to make Queenstown the headquarters of this year's Summer Naval Manœuvres; and whether it is proposed to utilise this port as a rendezvous for the Channel Squadron during next winter?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: No information can be given as to the scope or plan of the Summer Naval Manœuvres. The movements of the Channel Squadron during next winter have not yet been considered.

INDIAN HEMP DRUGS.

MR. CAINE (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he can now state who are the persons composing the Commission to inquire into the growth and sale of Indian hemp drugs in Bengal, and the terms of the Reference?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, North Beds.): No, Sir. The information required by my hon. Friend has not yet been received from India. A telegram has, however, been sent to India on the subject, and I shall be happy to furnish my hon. Friend with the names of the members on the Ganja Commission, and with a copy of the Instructions to the Commission as soon as they are received.

EDINBURGH SCIENCE AND ART MUSEUM.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has received any communication from the Education Department on the claim of the clerks in the Museum of Science and Art at Edinburgh to be put on the same footing as Civil servants of the same class at South Kensington; and what steps the Treasury propose to take in the matter?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am unable to trace any such application.

INCOME TAX DEMAND NOTES.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that in many country districts the demand for Income Tax, Land Tax, and Inhabited House Duty is made upon ordinary paper instead of on official forms; the amount of assessment, rate of duty, and other particulars which are provided for in the official forms being often omitted; and whether he will give instructions for the use of proper official forms in all cases in future?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The particular form of Demand Note to be used is not specified by law; but certain particulars are required to be given therein. Collectors of Taxes are mostly appointed by the General Commissioners of Income Tax. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have no power to prescribe the special form of Demand Note to be used by such Collectors; but if a case were brought to their notice in which the form did not give the particulars which the law requires to be given, they would consider it their duty to call the General Commissioners' attention to the omission.

THE MAXIM GUN AND CORDITE POWDER.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the use of cordite in the Maxim gun has been found to injure that gun more rapidly than the powder previously in use?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is the case that cordite has been found to wear out the Maxim gun more rapidly than the powder previously in use.

THE LEE-METFORD RIFLE.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Lee-Metford magazine rifle, Mark No. 1, can be converted into Mark No. 2; if so, is it proposed to make this conversion, and what would be the cost per rifle to do so?

Mr. Paul

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Mark 1 of the Lee-Metford rifle does not admit of conversion to Mark 2; but experience has proved that the Mark 1 rifles now in the hands of the troops and in store are thoroughly serviceable weapons.

THE LEGNATRAGHTA SCHOOLMASTER.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say when the last payment of salary was made to the teacher of the Legnatraghta National School, County Cavan; has such salary been recently withheld, and why; and who is the manager of the school?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed by the Commissioners of National Education that the last payment by way of salary to the teacher of the school referred to was made in April, 1892, and that, serious complaints requiring investigation having been preferred against the teacher by the manager of the school, the salary has since been withheld. The manager is the Rev. Mr. Corr, P.P.

ALLOTMENTS IN SCOTLAND.

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland, considering that many of the inhabitants of Portree and Newtonmore, both in Inverness-shire, have applied for allotments, and the County Council refused to put its powers into operation owing to the heavy expense necessary to compel unwilling landlords to give the land asked for, will the Government take steps to simplify and cheapen the procedure by which land may be obtained by the people on fair terms?

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll): Will the Government support a Bill which I have introduced and which is appointed for Second Reading, the object being to make proceedings in the matter of small holdings by County Councils and other Local Authorities compulsory?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): In reply to the hon. Member, I find, on inquiry, that the County Council have resolved to put into operation the provisions of the Allotments (Scotland) Act, and have appointed members of their Finance Committee to be the Statutory Committee to deal with all Petitions presented thereon. As regards Newtonmore, I understand that an Amendment against the Motion in favour of the Petition was carried by 18 to 13; and that as regards Portree the Council have as yet been unable to make any arrangement for the acquisition of land. I regret that in the places named by the hon. Member the County Council has not seen its way to put the Act into force. Both in Scotland and England the provision of allotments was placed under the County Council as a body representative of the people, and it would only be in case of a general failure proved by a complete experience that the Act would be modified.

MR. MACFARLANE: But the present Bill does not contain compulsory powers. Will the Government support the introduction of such powers?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: The question of introducing the compulsory principle into the Small Holdings Bill for the United Kingdom is one for the Government to decide.

DR. MACGREGOR: If the County Council refuses to exercise its powers, what is to be done?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: It was considered that when matters were placed in the hands of the County Councils the power was really given to the people. I am inclined to think that it is so.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether there is at the present time any picture by Albert Dürer in the Collection of the National Gallery; whether the attention of the Trustees of the National Gallery was recently called to the fact that a valuable picture by that artist was for sale in London; whether any of the Trustees inspected the picture; and, if so, which of them; whether the picture was eventually purchased by the authorities of the Berlin Museum; and how it was that the opportunity of adding such an important picture to the National Collection was allowed to pass?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The National Gallery contains no picture by Albert Dürer. A small portrait ascribed to that master was lately for sale in London, and, though not then offered to the National Gallery, was inspected by the Earl of Carlisle (one of the Trustees) and by the Director, who is ultimately responsible for all purchases made. This picture has been very long known to the Director. But he has always considered, and still considers, the evidence in favour of its attribution to Albert Dürer insufficient. The fact of an offer for the picture having been made by the representative of the Berlin Museum was afterwards communicated to the Director. But, as he regarded the authorship of the picture as by no means a settled question, he forbore to outbid the offer already made in another quarter.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Is it the custom of the Trustees of the National Gallery themselves to inspect pictures on sale, or does the matter rest entirely in the hands of the Director?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The matter rests entirely in the hands of the Director.

THE METROPOLITAN MAGISTRACY.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has now come to any decision as to the action he will take with regard to the recommendation contained in the Report of the Departmental Committee on Metropolitan Police Courts, that two additional Magistrates should be appointed at once?

MR. ASQUITH: I am in communication with the Lords of the Treasury on the subject of this Report, upon which no final decision can be announced at present.

THE TRANSPORT OF INFECTIOUS DISEASE PATIENTS.

MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware of the sanitary dangers arising through the transport of persons suffering from infectious disease, beyond the area of the Local Authority to which they belong into the district of another Local Authority; whether, in the case of hospitals so established at considerable distance from the homes of the infectious sick, he has power to prevent the use of public conveyances by the persons, medical or otherwise, in attendance during their journeyings to and from such hospitals; and whether, if he has such power, he will consent to use it?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Due care should, of course, be taken in the transport of persons suffering from infectious disease, in whatever district they may be. I have no authority under which I could prohibit the use of public conveyances by persons who are employed in an infectious hospital; but the managers of such an institution can make stringent regulations with a view to such precautions being taken by persons in attendance on patients before leaving the hospital as will prevent their being a source of danger to others, and such regulations have, I believe, been made by the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District.

THE LEITRIM MAGISTRACY.

MR. P. A. M'HUGH (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that eight months ago the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was requested, by memorial and otherwise, to appoint amongst others Mr. Patrick M'Griskin, of Kiltyclogher, to the Commission of the Peace for the County of Leitrim; has Mr. M'Griskin been appointed up to the present date; has the Lord Lieutenant of the County of Leitrim been communicated with by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in regard to the appointment of Mr. M'Griskin, and with what result; has the Lord Chancellor considered the case of Mr. M'Griskin without regard to the opinion of the Lord Lieutenant; and how long has the Lord Chancellor been considering the application for the appointment of Mr. M'Griskin to the Commission of the Peace, and when may his Lordship be expected to arrive at a decision?

MR. J. MORLEY: The observations of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the particular case mentioned have not yet reached me. I must, however, deprecate the course of bringing the names of individual candidates for the Commission of the Peace before the House. The Lord Chancellor is bound to satisfy himself that a candidate has the requisite qualifications; and it may happen, however excellent the individual may be personally, that some essential qualification may be wanting. It would be clearly unfair to the candidate concerned to publish his case, and I trust the House will not expect me to give detailed answers to such questions.

MR. P. A. M'HUGH: I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that, under the late Government, Mr. Patrick M'Griskin was offered an appointment on the Commission of the Peace on condition that he would support the Tory candidate at the General Election?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have no information of the kind.

MR. P. A. M'HUGH: As the right hon. Gentleman is unable now to answer my question, I beg to give notice that I shall repeat it on an early day.

MR. J. MORLEY: In case the hon. Member places such a question upon the Paper, I warn him that, unless the House considers that a question of this kind ought to be answered, I shall probably refuse to answer it.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to give notice that I shall on some future occasion ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, considering the dissatisfaction which appears to exist, he will consider the advisability of transferring the power of making such appointments from the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster?

LICENSED PUBLICANS AS MAGISTRATES.

MR. P. A. M'HUGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has adopted any settled and definite practice in regard to the appointment of licensed publicans in Ireland to the Commission of the Peace; and, if so, will he state to the House what the practice is?

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS: May such Magistrates act as Licensing Justices?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Is it not the fact that persons engaged in the spirit trade, either as publicans or as wholesale dealers, are prohibited from sitting at Licensing Sessions? In case publicans are appointed without surrendering their spirit licences, will they be allowed to sit at Petty Sessions and adjudicate on cases of alleged breach of the Licensing Laws?

Mr. Stephens

MR. J. MORLEY : I should assume not. I will ask for information on that point. The Lord Chancellor does not propose to alter the rule as to the appointment of publicans to the Commission. That has been that, as a general rule, persons holding a retail spirit licence should not be appointed ; but, in a very few and exceptional cases, when, for instance, having regard to the wants of a district, there is no other Magistrate available, and a licensed house not being in the place where the Magistrate is to adjudicate, such appointments have hitherto been made, and the Lord Chancellor proposes to retain a discretion as to such exceptional cases.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE RETURN.

MR. P. A. M'HUGH : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what Department of the Irish Government is responsible for the delay in issuing the Return (Commission of the Peace, Ireland), ordered 10th February, and can he inform the House when the Return will be issued ?—

MR. J. MORLEY : No unnecessary delay has taken, or is taking, place in the preparation of this Return, which, as I informed the hon. Member for West Kerry on the 1st instant, is a voluminous one. It cannot be furnished before a couple of months.

THE MIDLAND GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF IRELAND.

MR. COLLERY (Sligo, N.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has had any communication with the Midland Great Western Railway Company of Ireland relative to a refund of the excessive charges put on by that Company in January last ; whether he is aware that those charges amounted in some cases to 40 and 50 per cent. on certain goods between Dublin and Sligo ; whether those rates have been voluntarily withdrawn by that Company, or whether it was owing to competition from a competing line ; and if any, or all, those increased charges are still continued on goods to intermediate stations where no competition exists ; and whether these charges are regulated by mileage rates, or by such as the circumstances of the case will permit them to make ?

MR. MUNDELLA : I have communicated with the Company, but have not had time to receive their reply.

THE CONSTITUTION OF ALDERNEY.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a Petition has been received from the inhabitants of Alderney, reciting various abuses that, as they allege, have arisen from the defects of their Constitution, praying Her Majesty to cause inquiry to be made into these alleged abuses with a view to remedy them, should they be proved to exist ; and whether it is intended to take any action in the matter ?

MR. ASQUITH : Yes ; such a Petition has been received, and is now under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

TOTTENHAM FEVER HOSPITAL.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has been made aware of the anxiety amongst the working population of Tottenham at the proposal to establish a permanent fever hospital in that locality ; and how soon the decision of the Local Government Board on the subject will be made known ?

MR. H. H. FOWLER : The Report of the inquiry which was held last week has been received to-day. The decision of the Local Government Board will be given as early as possible.

BOYCOTTING IN NORTH CORK.

MR. DANE : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a meeting was recently held in the vicinity of Ballyclogh, North Cork, to take into consideration the conduct of two families named Davidson and Connor for going into occupation of evicted farms ; that in consequence these families have since been severely boycotted ; and that members of these families are hooted at whenever they enter the adjacent village ; and what steps, if any, have been taken to afford them protection ?

MR. FLYNN : Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I should like to ask him whether the incidents referred to did not occur in 1892, long before the meeting in question was held ; and whether one of the parties named has not been prosecuted by the police for firing a revolver, and whether a claim for malicious burning has not been preferred by these people, and for reasons best known to themselves abandoned?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am not well informed with respect to the particulars to which the hon. Member opposite refers. I am, however, aware of the disgraceful proceedings that have recently taken place at Ballyclogh with regard to the little children attending the schools, and I have expressed a very strong opinion with regard to them. I have instructed the police to closely watch the case, and to afford all necessary protection to the two families named, and proceedings will be instituted against certain persons who have been guilty of acts of violence.

THE CORRATAWY NATIONAL SCHOOL.

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that Miss Dolan, a teacher, was recently dismissed without any notice by the manager of the Corratowy National School, County Cavan, and was compelled to threaten legal proceedings in order to get paid the salary due to her; what is the usual and proper notice prior to the dismissal of a teacher; is he also aware that the manager in question appointed William Monagle teacher in the place of Miss Dolan, and compelled him to refund him the amount of the salary paid her; and will the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland direct the manager to recoup William Monagle the money so paid, and prevent a recurrence of such a transaction?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am informed that Miss Dolan was the teacher of the Cree National School up to the 15th October, 1889, and that she never had charge of Corratowy National School, which did not become operative till January, 1890. A few months before the manager, the Rev. Mr. Corr, P.P., closed the Cree school he notified his intention not to appoint Miss Dolan to the charge of the new Corratowy school, and explained as his reason that he desired to appoint a teacher of higher class than Miss Dolan, who was only in the third or lowest class. There is no record in the Office of the Commissioners of National Education of the dismissal of Miss Dolan without notice by the manager, or of legal proceedings taken in the case. The usual and proper notice of dismissal of teachers by managers is one of three months; and if such notice be not given, then three months' salary must be paid, unless the summary dismissal was for misconduct or other sufficient reason. The Commissioners have no information of the alleged transaction between the manager and Mr. Monagle, the new teacher, whose appointment in succession to Miss Dolan was duly notified by the manager to the Commissioners. The Commissioners are quite ready to receive any representation which may enable them, if it be deemed necessary, to institute an inquiry into the matter.

WORKING MEN MAGISTRATES.

MR. SAUNDERS (Newington, Walworth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state the number of working men who have been appointed Magistrates in the United Kingdom since July last?

MR. ASQUITH: Thirty-six working men Justices of the Peace have been appointed in England, exclusive of Lancashire. This refers only to Borough Benches. In Scotland many working men may have been made County Justices of the Peace; but I am not in a position to give the number, having no information at hand.

MR. SAUNDERS: Then I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy how many working men have been appointed in Lancashire since the present Government came into Office?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The total number of working men appointed to the Borough Benches of Lancashire since (but not including) August last is 33.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what is his definition of a working man upon which he has compiled his statistics?

*MR. BRYCE: The question of the hon. and learned Member opposite is a difficult one to answer. It is not altogether easy to find a satisfactory definition. In the number I have given I have included certain persons who are in the employment of working men's Co-operative Associations, and have excluded some who, though practically representative of the working classes, have ceased to be actually working men. The very large majority of the 33 are actually working men.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): Is this the first occasion on which working men have been placed upon the Commission of the Peace?

MR. BRYCE: No, Sir; I believe not.

PRISON SCHOOLMASTERS.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a great number of Petitions which have been recently forwarded to him from the warder schoolmasters in the local prison service setting forth their grievances; and whether he will receive a deputation from the warder schoolmasters of the London prisons?

MR. ASQUITH: I have received Petitions on the subject referred to; but I do not think it is a case in which any good purpose would be served by receiving a deputation.

DUTCH FRUIT BASKETS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that many thousands of Dutch fruit baskets, without a mark of origin, are delivered at the Port of London, to the prejudice of makers, chiefly of the poorer class; and whether this practice is not in contravention of the Merchandise Marks Act, Clause 5?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: As I understand the policy of the Act, it was intended to prevent the importation of goods bearing false trade descriptions, and purporting to be of English make. Unless, therefore, the baskets referred to bear marks which would otherwise be illegal under the Act, no mark of origin is required to satisfy the law.

SEED LOANS IN IRELAND.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Local Government Board have considered the Resolution adopted on the 4th instant by the District Board of Guardians, protesting against the Order of the Local Government Board impounding rates of the Union to the amount of £600, being the balance of a loan to the Guardians of the Glin Union, under "The Seed Supply Act, 1890," for the benefit of certain electoral divisions of that Union, since amalgamated with the Union of Listowel; whether it is correctly stated by the Listowel Guardians that the rate for repayment of the advance could not legally be levied with the Poor Rates for 1891 in the Glin Union, as those rates were struck before the 1st of August; whether the rate for repayment of the loan has, in fact, been levied according to law with the Poor Rates of the Listowel Union struck last August, making the balance of the first instalment legally repayable to the Local Government Board next August; and whether, if the circumstances be as stated, the Order impounding the rates will be revoked?

MR. J. MORLEY: The loan obtained by the Guardians of the late Glin Union, under the Seeds Act of 1890, amounted to £1,170, payable in two instalments, the first falling due on August 1, 1892, and the second on August 1, 1893. The 6th section of the Act provides that the amount due by the purchasers of seed shall be payable in two equal instalments, to be assessed along with the ordinary Poor Rate. At the first-named date no Poor Rate was made in the late Glin Union, and the first rate made after the amalgamation of that Union with the Listowel Union was in 1892, when the first assessment was made on the purchasers in the Glin Division of the Union. When the first instalment became payable by the Guardians the Irish Government, in view of the above fact, and on the recommendation of the Local Government Board, and with the consent of the Treasury, postponed the date for the payment until the 31st of last December, and the Guardians were thus afforded an opportunity of collecting the rate between August and December. The debt was not paid at the latter date, and on the 11th April the Commissioners of Public Works certified to the Local Government Board that a sum of £587 13s. 9d. remained due, and the Local Government Board issued an Order assessing the amount on the division concerned, as the money had to be paid to the Board of Works. Under all the circumstances, I am inclined to think that a considerable indulgence was shown by the Local Government Board in postponing the issue of the impounding Order to so late a date.

THE NAVY VOTES.

MR. FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty what was the aggregate amount of the Parliamentary Vote for new works and buildings and the sites thereof, as specified in the Navy Estimates for the years 1891-2, 1892-3, and 1893-4, the amount expended thereon in each of the financial years of 1891-2 and 1892-3, and the aggregate sum of the Re-Votes for these purposes for the years 1891-2, 1892-3, and 1893-4.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The net Vote for new works and buildings and the sites thereof, exclusive of superintendence and repairs, for 1891-2, was £281,605; for 1892-3, £308,114; and for 1893-4, £234,489. The net expenditure for 1891-2 was £237,349; that estimated for 1892-3, £270,700. The Re-Votes for 1891-2, £14,900; for 1892-3, £22,100; and for 1893-4, £34,450.

IRISH POST OFFICE BUILDINGS.

*SIR J. BLUNDELL MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what is the estimated value of property located in Ireland (in freeholds, leaseholds, material, plant, &c.), now vested in the Post Office, which it is proposed to hand over, free of charge, to the Irish Government; and will these properties be transferred by deeds to the Irish Government, and will they have the power to sell the same without the consent of the Imperial Parliament?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): I cannot give any trustworthy estimate of Post Office property in Ireland which would be available under the Home Rule scheme. Such an estimate could only be obtained by making a special valuation of the property. The Government do not see the necessity for incurring the expense and time which would be necessary for making the valuation. With regard to the latter part of the question, under the Bill as it at present stands, the Irish Government will have full powers to deal with the property for all the purposes of establishing the Post Office Service.

*SIR J. BLUNDELL MAPLE: Might the value of the property in question be between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I should look upon such an estimate as entirely fabulous, though I have no means before me at present for testing its accuracy.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): May I inquire whether, in view of the fact that, under the Bill, the management of the postal rates will rest with the Imperial Government, it would not be proper to leave all the plant, by which the Imperial Postal Service is carried out, in the hands of the Imperial Government?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No, Sir. We should retain no part of the rates derived from the Postal Service in Ireland. Everything, beyond the mere fixing of the rates, will be left to the Irish Government.

COMPANY LAW.

MR. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derby, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in view of the strong remarks made by one of Her Majesty's Judges in a recent trial, if the Government will move to appoint a Committee to inquire into the working of the Limited Companies Acts, with a view of giving greater legal protection to shareholders and creditors in Limited Companies?

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): May I ask whether the attention of the Government has been called to the fact that fraudulent Directors and promoters are not now liable to be adequately punished, and that Directors giving their names to Public Companies for reward, and then scandalously neglecting their duties, are not now liable for anything but civil action; also, whether attention has been called to the Report recently presented to the Board of Trade by the gentleman who has the superintendence of the winding up of Companies, and to the startling disclosures made as to the injury caused to the country, and especially to the trade of Lancashire, by the Rules regulating Limited Liability Companies; and, further, whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware of the strong desire throughout the country, and particularly in Lancashire, in favour of the request put forward by the hon. Member for Derby for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the grievances which now exist?

MR. MUNDELLA: Last week I gave a full answer to the latter question. In reply to the question on the Paper, the remarks made by the learned Judge were apparently directed to the state of both the Civil and Criminal Law. A Committee to inquire into the working of the Companies Acts could hardly deal with the latter branch of the subject; and it is not desirable to institute a general inquiry into the working of the Companies Acts until fuller experience has been gained of the effect of the very drastic provisions contained in the Act passed so recently as 1890.

IRISH GUARANTEED LAND STOCK.

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that under the Home Rule Bill the guarantees and the Guarantee Fund prescribed by the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act will no longer exist, it is intended to make further issues of Guaranteed Land Stock under the authority of that Act after the passing of the Home Rule Bill?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: There is no intention to interfere in any way whatever with the working of the Land Purchase Act. All proceedings under that Act will go on as heretofore. It may be found necessary to introduce some Amendment into the Bill for enabling that object to be attained; but due notice will be given of any such Amendment.

+ THE IRISH REPUBLICAN FLAG.

MR. DARLING: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the report, by Dalziel's Agency on 11th May, that a number of Irishmen on board the steamer Hazel Kirke, hoisted on that vessel the Republican flag of Ireland—namely, a gold harp on a green ground, and that the American and German vessels in New York Harbour saluted that flag; if so, whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take any notice of the incident?

SIR E. GREY: No information on the subject has reached Her Majesty's Government, either from Her Majesty's Ambassador in the United States or from the Consul General at New York.

MR. DARLING: Has the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs asked for any information?

SIR E. GREY: There has been no time for any written Report to reach us. It would not be right on our part to simulate the nervousness and apprehension of the hon. and learned Gentleman by telegraphing.

MR. DARLING: Will the Foreign Office, in the interests of the honour of this country, ascertain whether any such insult was or was not offered to this country?

SIR E. GREY: If the matter has assumed the importance which the hon. and learned Member appears to attach to it a Report is probably already on its way; and if we were to ask for a Report now, it would show want of confidence in the vigilance of our Representatives.

MR. DARLING: Does not the Foreign Office continually ask for Despatches from Ambassadors abroad, and is not that done without contributing to a state of nervous excitement?

SIR E. GREY: I have stated it is quite possible that a Report is on its way.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Will the Foreign Office consult the First Commissioner of Works as to the significance of the crownless harps on green ground emblazoned round this Chamber?

[No answer was given.]

THE FINANCE CLAUSES OF THE HOME RULE BILL.

MR. WILLIAM KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Finance Clauses of the Government of Ireland Bill, the consideration of which in Committee is to be postponed, include only those numbered from 10 to 19 inclusive?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I think that Clauses 21 and 22, which relate to the management of the Post Office, will be postponed with the other Financial Clauses.

THE IRISH £20 FRANCHISE.

MR. SAUNDERS : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if sufficient Returns have been received from Ireland to enable him to form an opinion as to the number of persons in Ireland who will be qualified to vote under a £20 franchise; and if he will inform the House?

*MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : The number of persons possessing the £20 franchise is a matter which can be sufficiently estimated so far as occupiers are concerned from the Return No. 104 of the present Session, which gives 162,000 of these; deductions would have to be made for persons who are both occupiers and owners, and in respect of women occupiers. I may be asked, perhaps, what will be the estimate of owners entitled to vote under this franchise. To this I am unable at present to give an exact answer; but the Government are trying to get a reasonably approximate estimate, which will be made known as soon as the Government receive it.

MR. W. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): Will the Chief Secretary make the promised Return showing in parallel columns the numbers of female and male occupiers?

MR. J. MORLEY : Since I made the promise I have found it will be very difficult to fulfil it. The authorities in Dublin are still considering it, and if it can be obtained I will give it.

THE ATTACK ON THE REV. MR. WALSH.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) : A reply was given me by the Home Secretary on Monday last to the effect that the statement quoted from The Times as to the assault on the Rev. F. B. Walsh, after attending an anti-Home Rule meeting in Bermondsey, was exaggerated. I wish now to ask the Home Secretary whether his attention has been called to the following facts, which are taken from a letter written to The Times by the wife of the unfortunate clergyman :—

"The account of Mr. Walsh's injury was not exaggerated in the least. A stone struck his foot, and, on turning round to remonstrate, one struck the eye, cutting to the bone. Blinded with blood, he staggered to the railing, and another stone caught him at the back of the head, rendering him almost unconscious. He evidently had many blows, for he has many bruises, but everything then was a blank. The blow on the back of the head was most serious, and he is suffering greatly from shock and nervous depression. Mr. Walsh said the street was filled with a howling mob."
